Any one acquainted with music can see how nearly identical, so far as notes are concerned, these two last forms are, and that the only difference of character they can assume is by reason of different accentuation.

From the uncertainty of accent already mentioned, it will easily be seen that in different cases the same tone, and the same ending of it, would receive different accentuations according to the feeling of the compiler of the Psalter of the church in question; and this gives authority for the different versions that will be found in the modern books of Gregorian tones which are very accessible, and to which the reader is referred, as for example the following ending of the sixth tone (the one most commonly heard) compared with the one given above:

and these, which are both alleged to be the correct ending of the second tone:

It is almost needless to say that modern notation is here adopted for the sake of greater simplicity and definiteness.

The chief authority made use of here is the supplemental essay in Dyce's edition of the Book of Common Prayer, with plain tune (now rare) which gives ancient authorities, Elias Salomonis, Adam de Fulda, and the Tonale of St. Bernard, all referred to by Gerbert. Although these are of later date than the 8th century, the number of variations which they recognise, and the manner in which their recognition is made, seem to make it tolerably clear that these differences or Evovae are of much prior date to them. The view here taken by the writer receives some confirmation from the fact that a modern imitation of the word Evovae proposed by Mr. Dyce has never got into use, and is a mere curiosity, inasmuch as our means of expressing accent are more obvious. EVURTIVS, or EVORTIVS, bishop of Orleans, and confessor; deposition at Orleans, Sept. 7 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EWALDUS, or EGUALDUS, name of two English presbyters, martyrs among the ancient continental Saxons; commemorated Oct. 3 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EXACTIONES are extraordinary revenues, whether drawn from a new form of impost (census de novo impositus), or from raising the rate of an old source of revenue (augmentatio census). Such exactions were in early times condemned by the church; thus the 33rd canon of the third council of Toledo (A.D. 589) and the fifth of the sixteenth (A.D. 693) forbade bishops to levy exactions upon their dioceses; pope Leo IV. (A.D. 853) also stigmatized as "exactiones illicitae" any demands for supplies made by bishops "ultra statuta patrum." Similar decrees were also made by later authorities. It is laid down by canonists that an "exaction" must have manifest justification (manifesta et rationabilis causa) and be limited to the sum absolutely necessary to be raised (moderatum auxilium). (Corpus Juris Canon., Decret. P. ii. causa x. q. 3, c. 6; and Decr. Greg., lib. iii. tit. 39; Herzog, Real-Encycl. iv. 280.) [C.]

EXAFOTI. The Liber Pontif. tells us (p. 250, D. ed. Muratori), that Benedict III. "obtulit canistra exafoci ex argento purissimo," where the true reading no doubt is exafota (i. e. ἐξάφωτα) coronae of six lights. Compare ENAFOTIA. The same authority speaks of a corona of sixteen lights, "canistrum excaedecafotii" (ἐξκαδέκαφωτίου) (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

EXAPOSTEILARIA (Ἐξαποστοιλάρια) are TROPARIA, which probably received their name from the fact that the word ἐξαπόστοilon frequently occurred in them, as they were mainly supplications to God to send forth His Holy Spirit upon the worshippers. When other subjects were introduced into them another etymology was imagined, that the word "exaposteilarion" referred to the "sending forth" of God's servants into the world to preach the gospel.

EXAMINATION OF COMMUNICANTS. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.]

EXAMINATION FOR ORDERS. It appears always to have been the intention of the church that there should be a careful examination into the fitness of candidates for orders. As regarded their moral character, this was in some degree provided for by the public testimony of the people at the time of ordination [ELECTION OF CLERGY]. So it is said that when Alexander Severus was about to appoint any governors of provinces or other officials, he ordered that public enquiry should be made into their character, adding that this was the custom both of Jews and Christians in the selection of their priests (Ael. Lamprid. Vita Alex. Sever. c. 45). In some cases, as in that of Augustine (Possid. Vita August. c. 4), it appears that this may have supplied the place of any further examination. The third council of Carthage (c. 22), decreed that a candidate for ordination must be approved either by the testimony of the people or the examination of the bishop. But in general the duty of examination appears to have rested with the bishop. Chrysostom (περί ιερωσύνης iv. 2, § 376), speaks of the duty of the ordaining bishop to make diligent enquiry into the characters of those presented to him by the electors. The 6th canon of Theophilus, archdeacon of Alexandria (Balsamon, ii. 170), provides that when the candidates have been selected by the clergy, the bishop shall examine them. Basil however (Ep. 181), speaks of an examination conducted by presbyters and deacons, and then referred to the chorepiscopi. The canon too of Theophilus, already quoted, mentions the orthodox clergy of the district as having the right of examination in certain cases. Thomas-sin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 32, § 11-12), thinks it probable that the task of examining candidates was delegated in the first place to the cathedral clergy, and afterwards, in the provinces, to the priests and deacons.

The examination in these cases appears to have been chiefly an enquiry into the moral character and general fitness of the candidates. The fourth council of Carthage (c. 1), directs that every bishop should be examined before ordination, as to his personal qualities, such as prudence, morality, and learning, both profane and sacred, and also as to his holding the right faith as contained in the creeds. It is not said by whom the examination was to be conducted. The council of Narbonne (c. 11), forbids any bishop to ordain either a priest or deacon who is utterly unlearned. This appears to imply a previous examination into literary as well as moral qualifications. [P. O.]

EXARCH. Generically the word Ἐξάρχος is applied to any one who takes the lead. Hence it is used of one who is chief in any department or undertaking. So Plutarch in his life of Numa has Ἐξάρχος τῶν ἱερῶν in the sense of sacrorum princeps, or summus pontifex.^a In its specific ecclesiastical application it has more than one sense.

1. It is perhaps most commonly and most strictly applied to the great prelates who presided over the 'dioceses' (Διοικήσεις, see DIOCESE), as they were called, which were formed in imitation of the civil dioceses of Constantine. Each of these 'dioceses' comprehended several 'provinces' (ἐπαρχίαι), and the metropolitans of these latter were subordinated to the exarchs of the former. The 9th and 17th canons of the council of Chalcedon recognise, or give,^b a right of appeal from the decision of the metropolitan to the exarch. The word therefore became nearly synonymous with patriarch. Accordingly, in the Novels of Justinian, when imperial sanction is given to the principle expressed in the canons of Chalcedon, the word exarch is turned into patriarch.^c Yet though every patriarch had the power of an exarch, every exarch was not, properly speaking, a patriarch, the latter name being given only to the heads of the more eminent dioceses. Thus in the 'Notitia' given in Bingham, book ix. ch. 1, § 6, which seems to represent the state of things at the end of the 4th century, we find the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, but the exarchs of Asia, Pontus, Thrace, Macedonia, Dacia, and others.^d [NOTITIA.]

^b "Utrum omnes exarchi hanc potestatem ante hoc concilium exercuerint necne, incertum est: Hoc tamen certum, eam ab hoc concilio illis primò confirmatam esse," Beveridge, Pandect. Annot. in Canon. Concil. Chalced. p. 115.

^c Si vero contra metropolitam talis aditio fiat ab episcopo, aut clero, aut aliâ quâcumque personâ, diocesis illius beatissimus patriarcha simili modo causam judicet."—Novel 123, c. 22.

^d Beveridge thinks that Balsamon and Morinus are in error in speaking of a kind of metropolitans set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chal. p. 121.)

2. The word is also sometimes used in reference to metropolitans. For we find the phrase exarch of the province (ἐξάρχος τῆς ἐπαρχίας) as well as exarch of the diocese (ἐξάρχος τῆς διοικήσεως). It is used, for instance, in the 6th canon of the council of Sardica, where the sense seems beyond doubt.^e But the word is here probably used in its general sense of chief, rather than in any technical signification.

3. In later times the name exarch was also applied to certain legates of the patriarch of Constantinople, who appear to have been charged by him with the general maintenance of his rights and authority, and also entrusted with the visitation of monasteries subject to him. The name is also given to ecclesiastics deputed by him to collect the tribute payable by him to the Turkish government. These legates appear to have had large powers, and might even excommunicate, depose, or absolve in the name of the patriarch. (See Beveridge, Pandectæ Canonum, Annotations on the Canons of Chalcedon, pp. 120, 121.)

EXCAECATIO. To deprive of sight was not a mode of punishment sanctioned by the Benedictine rules. But in the 8th century some abbats had recourse to this barbarity in the case of contumacious monks. It was forbidden by Charles the Great (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 16) and by the council of Frankfurt (A.D. 794, c. 18); and abbats were strictly ordered to confine themselves to the infliction of punishments prescribed in their rule (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 25; Mabillon, Ann. Ord. Bened. Saec. IV. Praef. i. 139). [I. G. S.]

EXCEPTOR. (1) The word excipere was used in later Latin to express the "taking-down" of a person's words. Thus Augustine (Epist. 110), "a notariis ecclesiae excipiuntur quae dicimus." Hence a reporter of judicial acts and sentences—as in the case of Christian martyrs—was called exceptor. A gloss on Prudentius (apud Ducange) speaks of "exceptores" who took down the dicta of the judge and the answers of the martyr. Compare NOTARY. (Ducange's Gloss. s. v.; Bingham's Antiq. III. xiii. 5).

(2) The word is occasionally used as equivalent to ἀνάδοχος [SPONSOR], for which "susceptor" is more commonly employed. [C.]

EXCLUSION FROM COMMUNION. [COMMUNION, HOLY: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

EXCLUSIVA designates, in modern times, the right claimed by certain Roman Catholic error in speaking of a kind of metropolitans set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chal. p. 121.) Valerius (Obs. on Socrates' Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 99) calls these exarchs "minores patriarchas" and says "Patriarchae nomen interdum usurpârunt."

The present form of this right is of course modern, and arises from the political circumstances of the age in Europe; but traces of the very decided influence exerted by princes in restraining the liberty of papal elections are found at a comparatively early date. The emperor Honorius, for instance, in the case of the double election and consecration of Eulalius and Boniface, decided (A.D. 418) in favour of Eulalius, afterwards drove him from the city, and (A.D. 419) ordered the installation of Boniface (Auctarium Symmachianum, Epistt. 19–31; Baronius, an. 419, §§ 2 and 11, etc.). The same emperor, at the request of Boniface, made an ordinance that for the future, in case two candidates disputed the papal chair, neither should be pope but a fresh election should be held (Corpus Juris Canon. Dist. xvii., cc. 1 and 2; Hardouin, Concil. i. 1237). Nor was the influence of the temporal power diminished when Germans ruled in Italy. Odoacer (A.D. 483) desired that no papal election should take place without his concurrence (sine nostrâ consultatione), and little heed was paid by subsequent princes to the canon of a Roman synod under pope Symmachus (A.D. 502) condemning such interference of the secular arm (Hardouin, ii. 977; C. J. C. Dist. xcvi. c. 1, § 7). Theodoric repeated the enactment of Odoacer. On the reconquest of Italy under Justinian the confirmation of the papal election fell into the hands of the emperors, who exacted considerable sums in consideration of it, until the fee was given up by Constantine Pogonatus in the year 678 (Liber Pontif., in Agatho; C. J. C. Dist. lxiii. c. 21). Somewhat later, in the case of Benedict II. (A.D. 684) the claim to confirm the pope was also resigned by the same emperor. This, however, led to so much disorder, that it was found necessary again to invoke the co-operation of the civil power; and the fact of the necessity of the emperor's concurrence is recognised in the Liber Diurnus Pontif. Rom. (c. ii. lib. 3; see also Garnier's Dissertation in his edition of the Lib. Diurn.), probably of the end of the seventh or the beginning of the eighth century. The necessity for the confirmation of the emperor continued when the Frankish chiefs acquired the imperial dignity. Compare POPE. (Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. iv. 280.) [C.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (Abstentio, Anathemat, Excommunicatio, ἀνάθεμα, ἀφορισμός). The partial or total, temporary or perpetual, exclusion of a member from the privileges of the church.

I. ORDINARY EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunication belongs to the class of corrective or medicinal penalties (poenae medicales or censurae), not to the vindictive (poenae vindicativae). Augustine (Serm. 351, c. 12), distinguishes between "prohibitio medicinalis," and "prohibitio mortalitatis," meaning (apparently) by the one, exclusion from the mysteries, by the other, exclusion from the church and Christian fellowship altogether. The canon law (Corpus J., c. 37, can. xxiv. qu. iii.), lays down generally that excommunication is "disciplina, non eradicatio;" the excommunicated person is capable of being restored to his privileges, upon repentance [PENITENCE].

The exclusion of peccant members from social privileges is a right inherent in all societies; it was in practice among the Jews at the Christian era, and was incorporated by our Lord into the constitution of His church. It is no part of our purpose to discuss the theological bearing of the language in which our Saviour conveyed this power (St. Matt. xviii. 15–18, xvi. 19), nor to investigate the traces which the New Testament contains of the use to which the apostles put it (Rom. xvi. 17; 2 Cor. vi. 14, 17; Gal. i. 8, 9; 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11) (See Art. Excommunication in Dict. of the Bible). It is sufficient to note that a power of cutting off offenders was conferred on the apostles as rulers of the church, and was by them made a systematic part of church government. There are however two instances of direct excommunication by St. Paul, which must be noticed in more detail, because they supplied at once the language and the model after which the church framed in subsequent ages her censures. The apostle by a formal judgment delivered the incestuous Corinthian "to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor. v. 5); a sentence which cannot signify less than this—that the man was thrust outside the Christian fold. When St. Paul wrote his second epistle, some six or nine months later, the man on his repentance was readmitted into the church. A similar sentence, but producing no similar penitence, was delivered against Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20). Hymenaeus is mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, as a teacher of heresy. His case therefore formed a precedent for excommunication for heretical opinion, as that of the Corinthian for immorality. The authority for the use of the formula, ANATHEMA, (ἀνάθεμα), so common afterwards in the Penitential Canons, is to be found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9.

The proofs that the church has always claimed and exercised the power of excommunication, are everywhere patent. Fathers (e.g., Irenaeus, Haeres. iii. 3; Cyprian, De Ord. Dom. c. 18; Epist. 41, c. 2; 59 cc. 1, 9, 10, 11; Basil, Epist. 61, ad Athanas.; Leo the Great, Epist. 32, ad Faustum; Ambrose, Epist. 40, ad Theodos.), and councils (e.g., Cann. Apostl. c. 8, &c.; iv. Carth. c. 73; ii. Arles, c. 8; Venet. c. 3; Toledo, cc. 15, 16, 18), all claim the power of excommunication, of greater or less severity and duration, in the case of offenders, whether against morality or against orthodoxy. The PENITENTIAL BOOKS mention numberless cases in which excommunication is the penalty. See for instance the Penitential of archbishop Theodore (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 173).

Persons subject to Excommunication.—The power of excommunicating was held to be in some measure correlative to that of baptising; those who could admit into the church could also exclude. The unbaptised were never excommunicated, though catechumens might be, and were, put back into a lower grade, and their baptism postponed. Children were not excommunicated, nor (commonly) reigning princes or large sections of the church. With these exceptions all Christian people, men or women, might be cut off from communion with the faithful. But the sentence was invariably a personal one for personal offences; the innocent were not punished with the guilty. Such a process as laying a whole nation under an interdict for some supposed offence of the people or their rulers was not known in the early ages, nor before the 12th century.

According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. cc. 37, 38, 39) the course of discipline was that if any offender did not voluntarily come forward and acknowledge his guilt he was to be summoned by the bishop, first in privacy, then in the presence of two or three witnesses; then if he would not yield, the case was to be told to the church, and if he was still obdurate, sentence would proceed against him. No one was to be excommunicated before he had been several times admonished, according to the apostolic injunction, "him that is an heretic, after the first or second admonition, reject." Nor could any offender be excommunicated in his absence, nor without legal conviction either by his own admission or by credible witnesses. On this safeguard against abuse of power, Van Espen quotes a passage from St. Augustine, "We cannot reject any from our communion unless they have either voluntarily confessed or been charged and convicted before some secular or ecclesiastical tribunal" (St. Aug. Serm. 351 de Pœnitent.). One witness was not received as sufficient evidence of guilt, even though the one was a bishop. No one could incur excommunication for anything temporal; such matters were left to the civil courts, and excommunication in the early ages was a spiritual weapon, cutting off from spiritual privileges. Gregory the Great, writing to some bishop whose name has been lost, severely rebukes him for using for his own private ends, power conferred upon him for the good of the souls of his flock (Epist. ii. 34). It was forbidden also to excommunicate for sins of infirmity and frailty. "There are some sins," says St. Ambrose (in exhort. ad Pœnit.), "which may be daily pardoned by mere supplication to God, in that petition 'forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'" And it was necessary that the offence should be public; for it was always a maxim "De occultis non judicat Ecclesia." So St. Cyprian, "We so far as it is committed to us to see and judge, look only at the face (the conduct) of each one, his heart and his conscience we cannot investigate" (Cypr. Epist. 55).

It would be impossible within reasonable limits to enumerate the graver crimes for which the church cut off her unworthy members. They may in general be reduced under one of the three heads of uncleanness, idolatry, bloodshed. Upon the treatment which men guilty of these crimes should receive, many of the early controversies on discipline hinged. There were, moreover, many breaches of each of the commandments which rendered the offender subject to the highest censure of the church, which cannot be brought under this classification. Of these it will be sufficient to point out a few which were peculiar to the times, or which the opinion of the present day would deal with more leniently. The principle underlying the whole system of ecclesiastical censures, was the preservation of sound members of the Christian body from the evil example and contagion of the unsound. Hence, heresy was ever reckoned among the gravest sins. Hardly less dangerous, and hardly less rigorously punished in times of persecution, or during the barbarian invasions, was apostasy either to heathenism or to Judaism. Any tampering with idolatry was rigidly prohibited. A Christian was forbidden to be a public actor, or to be present at any theatrical representation, which commonly in that age ministered to lasciviousness; or to frequent the circus, for it was regarded as an appendage of false worship, and detrimental to the majesty of God; or to use divination or astrology, for that was to put destiny in the place of divine providence; or to follow any trade, such for example as the training of gladiators, which in its nature was scandalous; or to be a talebearer, a gambler, or a vagrant. See Gregory Nyssen's canonical epistle to Letoios bishop of Melitina, which contains an elaborate classification of sins, and the penalties to be allotted to them.

Degrees of Excommunication.—Morinus distinguishes three degrees of excommunication: 1st. All those who were guilty of lighter sins were punished by exclusion from the offering of the oblations and partaking of the communion; 2nd. Those who sinned more grievously were not only altogether shut out from partaking of the communion, but also from being present at that service, and were moreover "delivered unto Satan," i.e. to certain bodily austerities and mortifications; 3rd. Those who persisted in offending, or fell into deadly sin, were expelled alike from all share in the sacred mysteries, and from the very building of the church. (Morin. de Pœnitent., lib. 4, c. 11.) Van Espen considers that there were two degrees only, one of which was called "medicinalis," the other "mortalis," (Aug. Hom. lib. 1.), or more commonly, "Anathema" (Van Espen Jus Eccl. Pars iii. Tit. xi. c. iv.); Bingham also discovers two degrees, lesser and greater excommunication (ἀφορισμός, ἀφορισμός παντέλης). The former, which corresponds with the first two classes of Morinus, excluded offenders from the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful, but did not exclude them from the church, for still they might stay to hear psalms and the reading of the scripture, and sermon and prayer of catechumens and penitents, and depart when the service of catechumens ended. Greater excommunication was a rejection not only from the eucharist but from any presence in church whatever, and any association with Christian men (Bingham, Antiq. lib. xvi. c. 11). There remains a still more terrible form of censure, which undoubtedly was sometimes imposed, and which was an absolute and final excision from the church. St. Cyprian (Epist. 55 ad Anton.) speaks of some of his predecessors who closed the door for ever against adulterers, but adds, that other bishops admitted similar offenders after a period of penitence to the grace of the church. There are various canons in the council of Elvira (circa 305 A.D.), which utterly debar offenders from communion with the faithful for the remainder of their lives, "nec in fine communionem accipere" (Con. Elvēr. cc. 1, 12, 13, 71, 73). Can. 46 declares that if any persist in sin after having been already punished, he should be totally cast out, "penitus ab ecclesiā abjiciatur." The council of Ancyra (cc. 9, 16; circa 315 A.D.) fixes a limit to the penalty attached to those very crimes for which that at Eliberis had decreed final excision. It would appear therefore that total and irremediable exclusion was at no time a universal practice, but nevertheless, at certain periods, and in certain localities, where possibly the magnitude of offences required to be dealt with by a penalty of equal magnitude, it was unhesitatingly employed. The practice of excommunicating the dead had no existence in the early centuries, or if here and there it existed, was supported by no canonical authority. The second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.), first introduced it into the Eastern church, and about 100 years later it crept into the Western (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. x. c. 9).

Effect of Sentence.—The punishment inflicted by a sentence of excommunication varied not only with the gravity of the offence, but with the discretion of the bishop, the customs of the diocese or province, and still more with the age of the church in which the offender lived. In the early centuries the church was ruled with a gentler discipline than was possible when her ranks were filled up promiscuously from the multitude. The incestuous man, whom St. Paul expelled from among his Corinthian converts with such solemn denunciation, was received again on his repentance, probably within a few months, certainly within the year. And up to the time of Montanus, punishments even for grave breaches of the law of the gospel were equally lenient. The term of the penalty was left to the discretion of the bishop. Through the whole of Tertullian's Treatise de Poenitentia, and in the Apostolic Canons, with one exception, there is no mention of any time for the duration of the censure. And even in the increasing severity which prevailed for the next hundred years, punishments scarcely ever exceeded one or two years (Morin. de Poenitent. lib. iv. c. 9). Thenceforward, years would not suffice where weeks or months had been deemed sufficient before. Ten, fifteen, twenty years, were no uncommon penalties. St. Basil excludes a murderer from the church for twenty years (can. 56). The council of Ancyra decrees that a murderer should be a penitent for the rest of his life, and be received back into communion only at the hour of death (can. 22). For murder combined with other great crimes the council of Elvira (can. 11), forbids communion even in death. But at no period did any hard and fast law prevail; if an offender voluntarily confessed his guilt, a shorter term of exclusion was measured out to him; if on the other hand, a man who had before caused scandal was further rebellious and obdurate, his sentence was doubly severe. The lesser excommunication carried with it only an exclusion from communion, and from the inner mysteries and privileges of the faith. Three weeks of this separation was the punishment assigned by the council of Elvira to those who wilfully absented themselves from church for three successive Sundays; a year for some more venial forms of unchastity; another period for eating food in company with a Jew (Con. Eliber. cc. 21, 14, 50). And when the term expired they were received again to all the privileges of full communion, without being called upon to submit to public penance. Very different from this was the punishment attending the greater excommunication, anathema. For the first 300 years the punishment was exclusively spiritual, laid upon the souls, not the bodies of men, depriving them of spiritual blessings, and in no way interfering with their political relations. Heresiarchs however, and dangerous heretical teachers, were at all periods treated with exceptional severity; the church was forbidden to hold any intercourse with them, to receive them into their houses, or to bid them God speed. It was only gradually, after the empire became Christian, that the weapons of the church's warfare began to be more carnal, and the secular power was invoked to uphold the ecclesiastical. At no time before Theodosius, who declared apostates either to Judaism or heathenism incapable of making wills or receiving bequests, and whose Codex de Hæreticis attaches other pains and penalties to heretics, were any civil disabilities imposed upon those whom the church had cast off. Whatever rights a man had from the laws of God or man, as father, master, magistrate, these he retained after the door of the church was closed against him. Yet in the primitive ages, when the congregations of Christians were comparatively small and the members known to each other, and the spiritual censure was followed by an immediate and literal banishment from all sacred offices, from the society of their brethren in the faith, from all association whatever with holy men and holy things, the sentence fell with overwhelming severity. All the man most valued was taken from him. He was looked upon as under the ban of God's wrath; he was cut off from the kingdom of God on earth; like the leprous man among the Jews, he had the visible plague-spot of sin upon him; there had been passed upon him what was regarded as a presage of the future judgment, for what God had by his ministers bound on earth, he would certainly, it was believed, unless the man repented, bind in heaven. The Apostolical Canons (c. 11) forbid any one even to pray in a house with a man under anathema. The first council of Toledo (400 A.D.), ordered (c. 15), that "If any layman is under excommunication, let no clergyman nor religious person come near him nor his house. Also if a clergyman is excommunicated, let him be avoided, and if any is found to converse or to eat with him, let him also be excommunicated." His name was erased from the DIPTYCHS, [p. 561]; and there are instances of the erasure having been made after the man had died, and his sins had not come to light while he lived. His oblations were not received at the altar, and even gifts which he had presented to the church were rejected with him. His books might not be read, nor might any intermarry with him. And when his end came he was refused all sacred offices on his deathbed, and no Christian man might attend his funeral, and no Christian rite be performed at it, unless he had given proof of repentance and passed away before being formally absolved. Nor could any one hope to avoid judgment by a voluntary exile, for notice was sent to other congregations, and in the discipline of the early church, a stranger was not admitted into communion unless he brought with him COMMENDATORY LETTERS from his own diocese. A man once excommunicated was never ordained, or if it was discovered after his ordination, that he had been previously censured, he was removed from the ministry (Conc. Eliber. can. 30; Conc.

Nic. 10). This latter strictness was not invariably enforced, but the axiom "Poenitentes ordinari non debent," became universal in the Western church, although not always in practice in the Eastern.

Excommunication of Clergy.—In some cases the clergy, for offences for which laymen were excommunicated, were suspended and reduced to lay communion [DEGRADATION]; but they might incur both degradation and excommunication. The clergy were brought to trial with more legal formalities than the laity, because if found guilty they were deprived not only of spiritual privileges but of office and emolument. The Apostolic Canons (30) decree that any bishop, priest, or deacon guilty of simony shall be cut off from all communion whatever. Mention is also made of reducing clergy to "peregrina communio," communion of strangers, which would seem to signify that they were to be treated as strangers who came without commendatory letters, allowed a mere subsistence from the offerings, but denied communion [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417]. By the council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.) monks were subject to the same discipline as laity.

Form or Rite.—Judgment was delivered in the indicative mood, inasmuch as it decreed a punishment then and there inflicted. It was declared after the reading of the gospel, the bishop standing on the ambo. There is no record of any ceremony attending the delivery of the sentence in the early ages; but Martene publishes a MS. of about the year 1190 which prescribes that twelve priests ought to stand round the bishop with lamps or torches in their hands, and that after the conclusion of the sentence they should cast them on the ground and stamp out the light beneath their feet, and that the bishop should then explain to the people the meaning and effect of the ceremony they had witnessed. No recognised rite of excommunication was in general use before the 9th or 10th century. The formula ordinarily employed was founded on our Lord's words, "Let him be as an heathen man and a publican." The council of Ephesus degraded Nestorius in these terms. "Wherefore our Lord Jesus Christ, whose majesty he by his blasphemous words has assailed, pronounces Nestorius, through this sacred synod, deprived of his episcopal rank and degraded from the fellowship and office of the priesthood throughout the world." The sentence of excommunication of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by his bishop, Synesius (410 A.D.), gives a more detailed account of the penalties involved in the sentence. "The church of Ptolemais makes this injunction to all her sister churches throughout the world. Let no church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices; but let every sacred temple and sanctuary be shut against them. The devil has no part in paradise; though he privily creep in he is driven out again. I therefore admonish both private men and magistrates neither to receive them under their roof nor to their table: and priests more especially, that they neither converse with them when living nor attend their funerals when dead. And if any one despise this church as being only a small city, and receive those that are excommunicated by her, let them know that they divide the church by schism. And whosoever does so, whether levite, presbyter, or bishop, shall be ranked in the same class with Andronicus. We will neither give them the right hand of fellowship, nor eat at the same table with them, and much less will we communicate in sacred mysteries with those who choose to take part with Andronicus" (Synes. Epist. 58). [See PENITENCE.]

The following, from an Anglican Pontifical preserved at Gemblours, considered by Martene (De Rit. Ant. ii. 322; ed. Venet. 1783) to have been written in the 8th century, may serve as a specimen of the later forms. The bishop, denouncing certain persons who, not having the fear of God before their eyes, had plundered the property of the church, and who, after being thrice summoned, contumaciously refused to appear, proceeds: "These therefore we, by the authority conferred upon us by God . . . and the statutes of the canons, excommunicate and cut off from the bounds of the Holy Church of God, and expel from the congregation of Christian men; and unless they speedily come to a better mind and make satisfaction to us, we confound them with eternal malediction and condemn with perpetual anathema. May they incur the wrath of the heavenly judge; may they be deprived of the inheritance of God and His elect; may they neither in this present life have communion with Christians, nor in the life to come obtain part with God and His saints; but may they be numbered with the devil and his servants, and receive the punishment of avenging flame with everlasting mourning. In heaven and earth may they be abominable, and be tortured for ever with the pains of hell. Cursed be they in the house, cursed in the field; cursed be their food and their fruit; cursed be all that they possess, from the dog that barks for them to the cock that crows for them. May they have their portion with Dathan and Abiram, whom hell swallowed up quick, and with Ananias and Sapphira, who lied unto the apostles of the Lord and fell down dead, and with Pilate, and Judas who betrayed the Lord; may they be buried with the burial of an ass, and so may their light be quenched in the midst of darkness. Amen."

Minister of Excommunication.—The officer entrusted with the power of excommunication was the bishop of the diocese to which the offender belonged. [BISHOP, p. 231.] The administration of discipline was originally entirely in his hands; it was he who bound and he who loosed. As the church increased, the infliction of other forms of penance was delegated to the inferior clergy, but the great sentence of excommunication was a weapon which the bishop kept exclusively in the power of his own order. Within his diocese his jurisdiction was supreme; he might mitigate or increase censure at his discretion. In the exercise of this authority he was independent of his presbytery; he sat indeed with it to hear confessions which might criminate others, or to receive accusations against the brethren, or to decide rights and causes brought before him, and offences might then be divulged which would expose the offender to excommunication, but when once guilt was established, either by confession, or conviction, or notoriety, the bishop alone imposed the sentence. Instances also abound of bishops consulting with one another in special emergencies, and deciding amongst themselves the period of penitence to be allotted to special sins, but such advice or support put no limitation on each bishop's original jurisdiction. The council of Nice (can. 5) forbids any one bishop to receive delinquents cut off by another bishop, which clearly points to each bishop possessing the power to act alone. The end of the same canon decrees that a synod of bishops shall be held in each province twice a year, before Lent and in the autumn (compare Apost. Can. 38), to examine into the cases of excommunication which had taken place in the province. There was thus a right of appeal against the sentence of an individual bishop, but only to the bishops of the province. This probably explains instances of synodical excommunication, which do not imply that the bishop had not an independent power to excommunicate, but that an appeal was made from his judgment to the provincial synod, whose sentence was only a more solemn confirmation of the bishop's.

The Apostolical Canons (74) decree that, if a bishop is accused he is to be summoned by the synod of bishops, and if he refuse to come two bishops are to go for him, and on his second refusal, to go again, and if he is still contumacious, the synod may proceed against him in his absence. Accordingly the episcopal rank of Nestorius required a synodical censure, which was pronounced by provincial synods under Cyril of Alexandria and Celestine of Rome, and confirmed 431 A.D. by the council of Ephesus. And Eutyches, who was an abbot and so far allowed the privileges of a bishop, was tried at the provincial synod of Constantinople under Flavianus, and on an appeal to a general council was again condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedon, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria.

II. MONASTIC EXCOMMUNICATION.

By the Benedictine rule contumacious monks incurred the penalty of the greater or the lesser excommunication according to the gravity of the offence, but not till admonition, first private and then public, had been tried on them in vain, nor in cases where, owing to moral stupidity, flogging was likely to be more efficacious (Reg. Bened. c. 23). These two kinds of excommunication are further defined as excommunication only from the common meal (a mensa) for slighter faults, and excommunication from the chapel also (a mensa et oratorio) for faults less venial. Thus the subdivision of monastic excommunication corresponds in its main features with the more minute subdivisions of ecclesiastical discipline generally (Ib. cc. 24, 25). Even under the lighter ban the offender was forbidden to officiate in the choir as reader or "cantor," and, according to some commentators on the rule, he was to lie prostrate before the altar-steps while the others were kneeling. In the refectory he was to take his food alone after the rest had finished (Martene, Reg. Comment. cc. 25, 44).

A monk under the graver excommunication was debarred not only from the common board, but also from all the chapel services as well as from the benedictory salutation, and indeed from all intercourse whatever with his brethren (Reg. Bened. c. 25). He was to lie outstretched at the doors of the chapel till re-admitted by the abbat; nor even then might he take any public part in the services without express permission (Martene, u. s. c. 44). Any monk speaking to an excommunicated brother was "ipso facto" excommunicated himself (Reg. Bened. c. 26). But it was kindly ordered by Benedict, that the abbat should send some sympathising brother to console the offender in his loneliness (Ib. c. 27; cf. Reg. Mag. cc. 13, 14; Reg. Caes. Arelat. c. 23; Id. ad Virg. c. 10).

The duration of the punishment varied, the intention being correctional rather than merely penal. By the rule of Fructuosus, a monk for lying, stealing, striking, false swearing, if incorrigible, was, after flogging, to be excommunicated and kept on bread and water in a solitary cell for three months (Reg. Fruct. c. 17). By the rule of Ferreolus, a monk for bad language was forbidden to be present at the mass or to receive the kiss of peace for six months (Reg. Ferr. c. 25). By the rule of Chrodegang a canonius was excommunicated for what seems so slight an offence as sleeping after nocturns. It was for the abbat to fix the degree of excommunication (Reg. Bened. c. 24). Some commentators argue therefore, that the severest form of monastic excommunication cannot be tantamount to the severest ecclesiastical sentence of the kind (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 25).

Mabillon cites instances (Annal. x. 46) of monks (Columbanus and Theodorus Studita) excommunicating lay people not belonging to their order. He relates an excommunication of one of the sisterhood by an abbess in the 7th century (Ib. xii. 36). Abbats and abbesses were themselves liable to this penalty. Gregory the Great reproves a bishop for harshness in excommunicating an aged abbat of good repute. The second council of Tours in A.D. 567 decreed sentence of excommunication against any abbat or prior allowing a woman to enter the monastery (Conc. Turon. c. 16). See further Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. cc. 30–34 with Menard's Commentary, and Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v. [I. G. S.]

EXCUBIAE. [VIGIL.]

EXCUSATI. (1) Slaves who had fled for refuge to a church, and then—on the owners making oath upon the gospels that they would not punish them—been restored to their masters, were called excusati. If the master broke his oath he was punished by excommunication. See Conc. Aurel. I. cc. 1 and 3; III. c. 13; IV. c. 24.

(2) Those who under some terror or oppression had fled to a church or monastery and remained there were also called excusati (Charter of Charles the Great, quoted by Ducange, s.v.) [C.]

EXECUTORES. A name given either to the DEFENSORES themselves or to officers who performed analogous functions. In one of the canons of a council held at Carthage, A.D. 419 (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 96), it is decreed that permission should be demanded of the emperor for the appointment of five "executores," who should reside in the provinces, and be employed on all occasions of necessity on behalf of the church, "in omnibus desideriis quae habet ecclesia." These are evidently distinct from the "defensores scholastici," mentioned in the canon that follows. In a capitulary of Charles the Great, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 99, § 12), executores are mentioned in connexion with advocates and defenders, "executores, vel advocati seu defensores." Thomassin (Ibid. c. 98, § 3) speaks of the title being given to certain officials when employed in carrying into execution the will of the bishop of Rome, who is himself the executor and protector of the canons. [P. O.]

EXEDRA is explained by Ducange, Binterim, and others as a general term including all buildings annexed to a church, or contained within the consecrated area. In classical usage an exedra was a semicircular room, or large alcove with seats against the wall for the purposes of conversation (Cic. de Not. Deorum, i. 6; de Orat. iii. 5). Exedrae are spoken of by Vitruvius (vi. 5) in connection with oeci (οἶκος) as rooms for conversation and other social purposes. The two words are similarly coupled together by Eusebius (H. E. x. 4, § 44) when describing the church of Paulinus at Tyre. Here Eusebius writes "he provided spacious exedrae and oeci on each side (ἐξέδρας καὶ οἶκους τοὺς παρ' ἐκδ-τερα μεγίστους) united and attached to the royal fabric (βασιλείῃ) and communicating with the entrance to the middle of the temple." The church built by Constantine at Antioch is also described as "being surrounded with a large number of oeci and exedrae in a circle," οἶκους τε πλείουσιν ἐξέδραις τε ἐν κύκλῳ (Euseb. de Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50). Augustine uses the word in the sense of a large room or hall annexed to the great church at Caesarea (de Gest. cum Emerito). The sixth canon of the council of Nantes prohibits interments except "in atrio aut porticu, aut in exedris ecclesiae." ^a Bingham holds that baptisteries were included under exedrae. The apse of a basilica was also sometimes termed exedra from its similarity in shape to those of the baths.

(Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. 7, § 1; Augusti Christ. Archaeol. i. 387; Valesius ad Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iii. c. 50.) [E. V.]

EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES. In the earlier stage of their existence, monasteries generally availed themselves gladly of the patronage of the bishop of the diocese [BISHOP, p. 231], but as they increased in wealth and power, struggled to emancipate themselves from his control. For instance, towards the close of the 6th century the abbess of Ste. Croix at Poitiers, after the death of Radeconde the foundress, who had become one of the nuns, requested the bishop to take the convent under his protection. After some hesitation, on account of the royal rank of the foundress, or because she had placed the convent under royal jurisdiction, he consented "to govern it as the rest of his parishes" (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. VII. xxxix. xl.; Gregor. Turon. Hist. ix. 46). On the other hand, in the middle of the 7th century, or later, for the exact date of the deed is uncertain, a monastery at Vienne, apparently of monks and nuns under one constitution, obtained absolute exemption from the bishop's authority. By this deed, no bishop had any claim to any property of the monastery; no bishop, unless by invitation of the abbot or abbess, could consecrate altars or admit nuns, nor was any fee to be required for performing these ceremonies; and the diocesan was not to hinder any appeal of the monastery to the see of Rome (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. XIII. ii. cf. App. tom. 1). In another fragment cited by Mabillon in the same place no bishop even by invitation was allowed to enter the more private parts of the convent; nor was any bishop to be entertained in the convent, lest this should be an expense and a distraction to the inmates, nor to interfere with the abbess in the correction of the nuns, for she was to be responsible only to the apostolic see. Instances might easily be multiplied of the almost continual collision in Western Christendom between the bishops and the monasteries in their dioceses; in which the monasteries, almost invariably, had the support of the pope, and, frequently, of the royal authority (cf. Martene, Regul. Comment. Bened. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxi. pp. 839, 840). And the same struggle was going on at the same time in the East. Thus, in the 7th century, the emperor Mauricius granted to the monasteries of Theodorus Siceota entire exemption from all episcopal authority, except that of Constantinople (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xiv. 23). Monasteries subject only to emperor or king, were called "imperialia" or "regalia" (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). [For exemption of monasteries from taxes see MONASTERY.] [I. G. S.]

EXEMPTIONS. [IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.]

EXERCISES, PENITENTIAL. [PENITENCE.]

EXHORTATION (Exhortatio), is used in a special sense for the admonition on the duties of their office addressed by the ordainer to a person just ordained. See, for instance, the Coptic ritual of ordination, in Martene, De Rit. Ant. I., viii. 11, Ordo 23. [C.]

EXILE (Exilium, Peregrinatio). For certain offences a penitent was ordered to leave his country and pass some period of his penitence in distant lands. This mode of penance is found among the canons ascribed to some of the British councils of the 6th century; but there are strong grounds for believing that they are interpolations of a later period, and that the penance of exile cannot be traced to any earlier source than the 7th century. The Penitential of Theodore (I. ii. 16) appoints fifteen years of penance for incest, of which seven are to be passed in a foreign land (perenni peregrinatione). The Penitential of Egbert (iii.) declares seven years of exile to be part of the penance due to parricide; and (v. 9) orders a cleric who begets an illegitimate child to go into exile for either four, five, or seven years. Morinus, however, considers (de Poenit. vii. 15) that these wanderings of penitents soon led to abuses, and were checked in a capitulary of Charles the Great (vi. 373).

The practice thus begun in submission to a judicial penalty was continued as a voluntary self-discipline, and in the 10th century it began to be considered a meritorious action to leave home and country and make a pilgrimage to some spot consecrated by association with some holy man; the earliest of which places were Rome, Tours, and the supposed burial-place of St. James at Compostella. This tendency received a great impulse from the Crusades, and especially from the decree of the council of Clermont (Conc. Clarom. c. 2), which allowed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to expiate all penance whatever. [G. M.]

EXOCATACOELI. Five great dignities of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, viz. the oconomus or steward, the senior and junior keeper of the purse (σακελλάριοι), and the senior and junior chartophylax, were anciently called ἐξωκατάκοιλοι. To these, in the 11th century, the defensor of the church was added. The etymology of the word is uncertain. That of Ducange (Gloss. Græc.) that they received their name from having their seats of dignity on a raised platform, not in the lower portion of the floor (κατάκοιλοι) where less distinguished persons sat, is perhaps as probable as any. (Thomassin, Eccle. Discip. I. ii. 99, § 10; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 702.) [C.]

EXODIASTICON (Ἐξοδιαστικόν). As the departure of a Christian was frequently spoken of as ἐξοδος, the service at the death-bed is called in Greek office-books ἐξοδιαστικόν (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 608, 634). [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; SICK, VISITATION OF.] [C.]

EXOMOLOGESIS (Exomologesis, Confessio, ἔξομολόγησις, ἐξαγόρευσις). The verb in St. Matt. xi. 25 expresses thanksgiving and praise, and in this sense was used by many Christian writers (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. ἔξομολ.). But more generally in the early fathers it signifies the whole course of penitential discipline, the outward act and performance of penance. From this it came to mean that public acknowledgment of sin which formed so important a part of penitence. Irenæus (c. Haeres. i. 13, § 5) speaks of an adulteress who, having been converted, passed her whole life in a state of penitence (ἐξομολογουμένη, in exomologesi): and (ib. iii. 4) of Cerdon often coming into the church and confessing his errors (ἐξομολογούμενος). Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) considers the Greek word ἐξομολόγησις more suitable than the Latin confessio; and proceeds to define the term as "the discipline of humbling and prostrating a man." At the end of the same treatise he speaks of the king of Babylon's humiliation as an exomologesis, and of the king of Egypt's neglect of repentance and its attendant confession. The term occurs twice in Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 11, 18), and six times in his Epistles (Epist. 4, ad Pompon. c. 3; 15, ad Martyr. c. 1; 16, ad Cler. c. 2; 17, ad Laic.; 55, ad Anton. c. 24; 59, ad Cornel. c. 18, Oxf. ed.) in the sense of the course of penitence and public humiliation; three times (Epist. 18, ad Cler.; 19, ad Cler.; 20, ad Rom.-Cler. c. 2) referring to the confession of dying penitents: and once (de Lapsis, c. 19) as applied to Azariah and his companions, in the sense of confession of the lips generally. St. Basil, describing the morning service of his time (Epist. 207, ad Cler. Neocaesar.), says that after the antiphonal chant, at daybreak they all burst forth into the psalm of confession (τὸν τῆς ἐξομολογήσεως ψαλμὸν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναφέρουσι), meaning no doubt that which is emphatically a psalm of confession, the fifty-first. This psalm is also mentioned by Cassian (De Instit. Coenob. iii. 6) as occurring at the close of matins. Pacian in one place (Paraen. ad Poenit. p. 372, Oxf. ed.) following Tertullian, speaks of the degradation of Nebuchadnezzar as exomologesis; in another (ibid. p. 373), in imitation of Cyprian, applies the term to the song of the "three children." At the council of Laodicea (can. 2) it is the whole course of penitence: "As to those who sin by divers offences and persevere in prayer of confession (ἐξομολ.) and repentance." With Chrysostom it is in one place (Hom. 10 in S. Matt. c. 4) the course of penitence; elsewhere (Hom. 5, de incomp. Dei nat. t. i. p. 490; Hom. 2, ad illum. Catech. t. i. p. 240, Bened. ed.) it is confession to God only. Isidore of Seville (Etymol. vi. 19) defines exomologesis to be that by which we confess our sins to the Lord. But at the end of the same chapter he adduces an entirely different meaning of the word. "Between litanies and exomologeses there is this difference, that exomologesis stands for confession of sins only, litany for prayer to God, and imploring His pardon; but now each word has the same meaning, nor is there any difference between the use of litany and exomologesis." The 17th council of Toledo, A.D. 694 (c. 6), orders litanies (exomologeses) to be said for a whole year for the church, for the sovereign, &c. &c. And the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (Conc. Mogunt. c. 32) quotes the exact words of Isidore on exomologesis being equivalent with litany (Comp. Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; note L. on Tertull. de Poenit., in Oxford Library of the Fathers).

Of these meanings the first and last are quite foreign to the general ecclesiastical use of the word and need not be pursued any further; that which signifies the whole course of penitential discipline will be discussed under the article PENITENCE: this article will relate to exomologesis only so far as it signifies oral confession.

Public Confession.—i. Of public sins.—This was the first stage in the restoration of a penitent. So long as discipline was in force, any one guilty of a notorious crime which had subjected him to censure [EXCOMMUNICATION] was required to make an open acknowledgment of his crime at the beginning of his course of penitence. The confession took place after the Missa Catechumenorum, and when they and the hearers had been warned to withdraw from the church by the deacon. Then if any one had been recently convicted of any open sin, he confessed and bewailed it before the church, and in accordance with the gravity of his offence, his penitential station was assigned him by the bishop; sometimes, however, the bishop, yielding to the requests of the clergy and people who had heard the confession, allotted a less remote station. The bishop then addressed the congregation on the nature of the offence, and they offered up their prayers for the offender's repentance. This public confession was addressed not merely to the bishop or the priest in the presence of the congregation, but in a loud voice to the congregation at large. It signified that as the church had been scandalised by an open sin in one of its members, reparation should be made to it by an equally open admission of sin. It also manifested the earnestness of the offender's repentance that he was willing to undergo this public humiliation. But the chief object was that the offender might seek the prayers of the congregation to support and stimulate his conversion. If any one who was notoriously guilty failed or refused to confess, no one would communicate with him, in accordance with the apostle's precept (1 Cor. v. 11; Ephes. v. 11). Again, if he waited to be convicted, his censure was heavier than if he had made a spontaneous confession. The council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 46) orders that if a deacon before his ordination had committed a mortal sin, and afterwards confessed, he should be restored after three years' penitence; but if detected, after five years, and only to lay communion. Basil (ad Amphiloc. cc. 7, 61) allows alleviation of punishment on three grounds, ignorance, confession, and lapse of time. This encouragement to confession reappears in the 8th century in the Rule of Chrodegand of Metz (c. 18), "he who voluntarily confesses his lighter sins shall be visited with lighter censures." And not only was an offender urged to confess for his own sake, but any who was privy to his crime was under a similar obligation to accuse him, for if he failed or even delayed to do so, he was himself exposed to censure (Basil, ad Amphiloc. c. 71).

ii. Of secret sins.—Such confession was at no time obligatory. Sometimes, however, under the direction of a priest who had been consulted, or moved by a sudden contrition and remorse, some would charge themselves with a secret sin before the congregation. Thus (Iren. c. Hæres. i. 9) the virgins seduced by the heretic Marcus, and the wife of the deacon Asianus made a public acknowledgment of guilt which was known only to themselves. One of the three men who had calumniated Narcissus of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. vi. 9) publicly acknowledged years afterwards, when his two associates had died from some painful disorder, that his charge against the bishop had been false. Some of the priests who had joined Novatian (ibid. vi. 43) spontaneously charged themselves before the church with heresy and other crimes; one of the bishops who had been induced to consecrate him publicly acknowledged his error, and Cornelius, in deference to the intercession of the people who witnessed the confession, admitted him to lay communion. But public confession of secret sins needed at a very early period to be checked and regulated; and the people were admonished to consult their priests before divulging their sins to the church [PENITENTIARY]. Anything which would create a scandal or endanger life or liberty was forbidden to be revealed. So Basil (ad Amphiloc. c. 34) would not permit a woman who had privately admitted the guilt of adultery to acknowledge it in the church or even to perform openly the penance generally demanded for such a sin, lest she should be murdered by her husband. Similar precautions are laid down by Origen, Augustine, and Caesarius of Arles (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 13). In the 6th century the practice arose of making confession of public sins to the bishop, of private to the priest.

iii. Before the bishop and his presbytery.—Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says it is part of exomologesis for the penitent "to throw himself upon the ground before the presbytery, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God." Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 18) praises the faith of those who, having without any overt act meditated idolatry, made a confession "apud sacerdotes Dei." Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall p. 195) speaks of a certain evil which had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, from whence it had come to pass, that no person who was brought before the clergy to be examined as to his life and conversation was at all examined upon that point. Before the presbytery confessions were made which criminated others; and this frequently happened; for any one making a public confession named his confederates, unless by so doing he exposed them to legal penalties. No ecclesiastical censure, however, fell on any who denied a crime which his associate had admitted: on the principle that penitence was a privilege not a punishment. The deacon and virgin whose case is decided by St. Cyprian and his presbytery (Epis. iv. ad Pompon.) must have had an information laid against them by some associate, for their guilt had been secret. This mode of confession was affected in the East by the appointment of the Penitentiary; but in the West so long as public penitence for secret faults prevailed, so long did public confession to bishops and their assistant priests. Probably this was the origin of the custom introduced into the Benedictine Rule of confession to the abbot surrounded by his monks.

Private Confession.—i. General account.—The testimony of the fathers will be discussed in detail later; here it is sufficient to say that the early fathers Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, hardly allude to private confession at all; and among the writers generally of the first 500 years those who mention it do so with some reference more or less direct to public discipline. But it is certain that public penitence was not assigned to all sins which were secretly confessed, but only to such as in the discretion of the priest required it. It is easy to understand that offences of a trivial nature might be confided to a priest, or offences of such a character as would scandalise the church were they openly divulged; and until this spiritual direction had been given, the offender would be in doubt whether or not a public acknowledgment would be expected from him. But it is equally clear that no absolution was given after direction of this sort, or until penitence had been performed. Such at least for many centuries was the practice in the Latin church (see PENITENCE, under which the question of absolution will be discussed): in the Eastern church a practice arose of pronouncing some preliminary absolution immediately after the utterance of the confession, and a second absolution when the penance had been performed. The evidence of this practice is to be found in the early Greek Penitentials at the end of the 6th century; but Morinus would carry back its origin to the time of the abolition of the office of Penitentiary at the end of the 4th. To resort to a spiritual guide for comfort and counsel was one thing; to obtain through his ministry by confession penance and absolution, reconciliation with God and communion with the faithful was another: and there is no proof that the two were combined, and that private sacramental confession had any existence in the first 500 years of the Christian church. The term itself is not found in any of the documents of the first eight centuries: and if the definition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii. qu. 84-90) is to be accepted as a theological definition of the term, its growth must be assigned to a much later period. There existed undoubtedly from a very early period private confession followed by no penitence, but also by no absolution; there was also private confession followed by public penitence, and generally by subsequent public confession, to which the private was a preliminary: and there was after the beginning of the 6th century private confession followed by private penitence, but the penance was always exacted, and differed only from public penance in solemnity; there is nowhere to be found in canons or sacramentaries or penitentials one punishment for private penitence and another for public. The sins thus privately confessed with a view to penitence were those only of a grievous character, sins which excluded from communion or public prayer, or even from the church itself, which required a long and painful course of penance before they were blotted out, and into which if the sinner relapsed, there was, certainly in the rigour of the primitive ages, no second door of reconciliation open to him. Sozomen indeed, writing at the end of the 5th century, says in reference to penitence that there is pardon for those who sin again and again, but this is not the language of antiquity. There was but one admission to solemn penance. Moreover, sins for which penance was to be performed were described by canons and in canonical epistles, and sins which did not fall within these canons were neither confessed nor made subject to penance. Sins of frailty incidental to mankind were to be healed by daily prayer and confession to God only. So, among numerous authorities that penitence, and confession as a part of penitence, was not exacted for venial sins, Augustine (de Sym. ad Catech. t. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.), "those whom you see in a state of penitence have been guilty of adultery or some other enormity, for which they are put under it: if their sin had been venial, daily prayer would have been sufficient to atone for it." The Greek Penitentials of the end of the 6th century, and the Latin ones of a century later, give no hint of habitual confession of common infirmities, or of private confession being a matter of indispensable obligation, still less of the doctrine that one may daily confess and be daily and plenarily absolved.

ii. In the Western Church.—In the times of Tertullian and Cyprian public discipline was in full vigour, and as part of it a public acknowledgment of sins: the passages which have already been adduced from these fathers contain nothing to show that they regarded confession in any other light than as one stage of the act of penitence.

Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 6) speaks of confession, but it is confession to God. "If thou wilt be justified confess thy sins; for humble confession looses the bonds of sin." Another passage, selected by Bellarmine to support secret confession, relates manifestly to the course of discipline; for having at the end of the previous section said that "very many, out of fear of future punishment, conscious of their sins, seek admission to penitence, and having obtained it are drawn back by the shame of public entreaty," Ambrose thus proceeds (ib. c. 10), "Will any one endure that thou shouldst be ashamed to ask of God, who art not ashamed to ask men? that thou be ashamed to supplicate Him from whom thou art not hid, when thou art not ashamed to confess thy sins to man from whom thou art hid?" Another passage (in Luc. x. 22, p. 5, 1787) commenting on St. Peter's denial of Christ and subsequent repentance, is inconsistent with the existence of a custom of private confession in his time. "Let tears wash away the guilt which one is ashamed to confess with the voice. Tears express the fault without alarm; tears confess the sin without injuring bashfulness; tears obtain the pardon they ask not for. Peter wept most bitterly, that with tears he might wash out his offence. Do thou also, if thou wouldest obtain pardon, wash out thy fault with tears."

Augustine's own confessions contain no hint that he either practised or inculcated private confession. "What have I to do with men that they should hear my confession, as if they could heal all my infirmities" (x. 3). Bellarmine quotes from the same writer (on Ps. 66, c. 7)—"Be downcast before thou hast confessed; having confessed, exult; now shalt thou be healed. While thou confessedst not, thy conscience collected foul matter; the imposthume swelled, distressed thee, gave thee no rest; the physician fomented it with words, sometimes cuts it, employs the healing knife, rebuking by tribulation. Acknowledge thou the hand of the physician; confess; let all the foul matter go forth in confession; now exult, now rejoice, what remains will readily be healed." But Augustine is commenting on the text, "Sing unto the Lord all the whole earth;" and confession can be confession to God only, as surely the physician who heals by tribulation can be none other than God. In Serm. 181 (fn.) he speaks of daily prayer as the sponge which is to wipe away sins of infirmity and contrasts them with death-bringing sins for which alone penitence is performed. Elsewhere (de Sym. ad Catech. tom. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.) he again speaks of the "three methods of remitting sins in the church, in baptism, in the Lord's Prayer, in the humility of the greater penitence," and he limits penance and consequently confession to sins which deserve excommunication. And in many similar passages he is a witness that up to his time no confession was required of any sins but such as subjected a man to penitential discipline.

Leo in his Epistle to Theodorus gives plain testimony of the connection of confession with penance (Ep. 91, c. 2). But in a letter to the bishops of Campania he gives some directions which mark if they do not make an era in confession in the Latin church. The epistle is too important not to be quoted at length (Ep. 80, ad Episc. Campan.). "That presumption, contrary to the apostolic rule, which I have lately learned to be practised by some, taking unduly upon themselves, I direct should by all means be removed, and that a written statement of the nature of the crimes of each should not be publicly rehearsed, since it suffices that the guilt of the conscience be laid open to the priests alone in secret confession. For although that fulness of faith, which out of the fear of God fears not to take shame before men, seems to be praiseworthy, yet because the sins of all are not of such sort, that they who ask to do penitence fear not their being published, let so unadvisable a custom be done away, lest many be kept from the remedies of penitence; either being ashamed, or fearing that actions for which they may be punished by the laws should be discovered to their enemies. For that confession suffices, which is made first to God, then to the priest also, who draweth near to pray for the sins of the penitents. For so at length may more be stirred up to penitence, if the sins confessed by the penitents be not published in the ears of the people." In the early ages public confession was only remitted in case of danger to the individual or scandal to the church: by this constitution of Leo secret confession to the priest was to take the place of open confession, and the priest's intercession of the intercession of the church. The door thus opened for escaping from the shame of public confession was never afterwards closed, and secret confession gradually became the rule of the church.

In the pontificate of Gregory the Great, a century and a half later, there is no evidence to be found of the existence of public confession: and even after private confession it was difficult to bring men to submit to public discipline (Expos. in 1 Reg. t. iii. 15, p. 342). "The sign of a true confession is not in the confession of the lips, but in the humiliation of penitence. . . . The confession of sin is required in order that the fruits of penitence may follow. . . . Saul, who confesses and is not willing to humble and afflict himself, is a type of those who make a sterile confession and bear no fruit of penance."

In the 7th century, the stern rule that solemn confession as a part of penitence was received only once, had become obsolete, but habitual confession had not yet taken its place. The first council of Châlons, A.D. 650 (1 Cabil. c. 8), declares that all agree that confession to the priest is a proof of penitence. The Penitential of Theodore (I. xii. 7) gives a rule which shows that auricular confession was not yet obligatory. "Confession if needful may be made to God only." [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.] Bede (tom. v. Exp. in S. Jac. v.) reverting to the old practice draws a distinction between the confession of frailties and of heinous sins. "We ought to use this discretion, our daily light sins confess to one another, and hope that by our prayers they may be healed; but the pollution of the greater leprosy let us according to the law open to the priest, and in the manner and the time which he directs, purify ourselves." The second council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 32) complains that people coming to confess neglect to do so fully, and orders each one when he comes to examine himself and make confession of the eight capital sins which prevail in the world—which are then enumerated—and by implication, of no others. Theodulph's Capitulary (c. 30) draws a distinction between confession made to a priest and that to God only, and (c. 31) mentions the same eight principal sins as the council, and appoints that every one learning to confess should be examined on what occasions and in what manner he had been guilty of any of them, and consequently be subjected to no further examination. Chrodegand (c. 32) orders "confession to be made at each of the three fasts of the year, 'et qui plus fecerit melius facit'; and monks to confess on each Sunday to their bishop or prior." But there is no other document showing that confession had yet become periodical. That secret confession was not yet a matter of obligation is clear from the canon of the council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 33). "Some say they ought to confess their sins to God only, and some think they are to be confessed unto the priests, both of which not without great fruit are practised in the Holy Church . . . the confession which is made to God purgeth sins, that made to the priests teacheth in what way those sins should be purged." And so it remained an open question for the next 300 years, for Gratian (de Poenit. Dist. i. 89) summing up the opinions of different doctors on necessity of confession leaves it still undecided. "Upon what authorities or upon what strength of reasons both these opinions are grounded, I have briefly declared; which of them we should rather cleave to is left to the judgment of the reader; for both have for their favourers wise and religious men." And it was not determined till the famous decree of the Lateran council, A.D. 1215 (4 Conc. Lateran. c. 21) ordering all of each sex as soon as they arrived at years of discretion to confess at least once a year to their own priest.

iii. In the Eastern Church.—The duty of consulting a priest when the conscience is burdened is urged more strongly by the Greek than by the Latin fathers; there are consequently more distinct traces of secret confession to be found in the Eastern than in the Western church. Origen has one passage speaking directly of confession, not to God only but to the ministers of the church; the purpose of the confession however is not to obtain absolution, but spiritual guidance; after having spoken of evil thoughts which should be revealed in order that they might be destroyed by Him who died for us, he continues (Hom. 17 in Luc. fin.), "if we do this and confess our sins not only to God, but to those also who can heal our wounds and sins, our sins will be blotted out by Him," &c. In another passage, which is even more explicit, he speaks of the care required in choosing a discreet and learned minister to whom to open the grief, and the skill and tenderness required in him to whom it is confided (Hom. 2 in Ps. 37, t. 11, p. 688, ed. Bened.).

Athanasius (Vit. Ant. Erem. p. 75, ed. Augs.) narrates an injunction of Anthony to his fellow-recluses, that they should write down their thoughts and actions and exhibit the record to one another, which probably was the beginning of habitual confession among monastic orders, where there are many grounds for supposing it prevailed long before it became the custom of the church. Basil lays it down even more definitely than Origen, that in cases of doubt and difficulty resort should be had to a priest; and in his time such a priest was specially appointed in each diocese, whose office it was to receive such private confessions and decide whether they should be afterwards openly acknowledged. [PENITENTIARY.] Thus in Basil, Reg. brev. tract. (Q. 229) the question is proposed, "Whether forbidden actions ought to be laid open to all, or to whom, and of what sort?" And the answer is, that as with bodily disease, "so also the discovery of sins ought to be made to those able to cure them." Again (Q. 288) Basil asks, "he who wishes to confess his sins ought he to confess them to all, or to any chance person, or to whom?" and replies, "it is necessary to confess to those entrusted with the oracles of God." There would have been no necessity for regulations like these had not private confession been in frequent practice. In Serm. Ascet. (t. ii. p. 323, ed. Bened.) monks are directed, by a rule similar to that of Anthony, to tell to the common body any "thought of things forbidden, or unsuitable words, or remissness in prayer, or lukewarmness in psalmody, or desire after ordinary life," that through the common prayers the evil may be cured. Like instructions are found in the Reg. fus. tract. (Q. 26) "On referring everything, even the secrets of the heart, to the superior."

Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letonium, in Marshall, p. 100) in one place speaks of secret confession which is to be followed by penance: "he who of his own accord advances to the discovery of his sins, as by his voluntary accusation of himself he gives a specimen of the change that is in his mind towards that which is good, will deserve lighter correction," alluding to the well-established rule that voluntary confession was allowed to mitigate the subsequent penance: in another place he writes as if he commended the custom of confessing all transgression of positive law whether it involved penance or not, "if he who has transferred to himself the property of another by secret theft shall unfold his offence to the priest by secret confession, it will be sufficient to cure the guilt by a contrary disposition."

The abolition of the office of the Penitentiary made undoubtedly a great break in the practice of confession in the Eastern church. The account is given in Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16). [PENITENTIARY.] It is difficult to believe that the scandal which had arisen in connection with the Penitentiary had not some influence on the teaching of St. Chrysostom, who immediately afterwards succeeded to the see of Constantinople. He both recommended and enforced penance, but any confession which had not immediate reference to discipline, he taught should be made to God alone. None of the fathers bear equally strong testimony against auricular confession (Hom. 5 de incomp. Dei nat. p. 490). "I do not bring you upon the stage before your fellow-servants, nor do I compel you to discover your sins in the presence of men, but to unfold your conscience to God, to show Him your ail and malady, and seek relief from Him." So (Hom. 20 in Gen. p. 175). "He who has done these things (grievous sins) if he would use the assistance of conscience for his need, and hasten to confess his sin, and show his sore to the physician who healeth and reproacheth not, and converse with Him alone, none knowing, and tell all exactly, he shall soon amend his folly. For confession of sins is the effacing of offences." For numerous other examples compare Dailé (iii. 14, iv. 25), Hooker (vi. c. iv. 16), note on Tertull. de Poenit. in Oxford Library of the Fathers, p. 401.

From the time of Chrysostom to the time of the Greek Penitentials there is no material evidence. Joannes Climacus (cited by Dailé) has a rule which points to the existence of confession in the eastern monasteries of the 6th century: a similar notice from Theodorus Studites, in his life of Plato, shows that the practice had a greater hold on the monks of the 9th century.

It appears from the Penitentials that some form of absolution was given in the east immediately after confession, a practice of which there is no trace for many centuries later in the Latin church. Joannes Jejunator orders that immediately after the confession is over and the priest has said the seven prayers of absolution, i.e., absolution in the precatory form, he is to raise the penitent from the ground and kiss him, and exhort him thus—"behold by the mercy of God who would have all men to be saved, you have fled for refuge to penitence, and made a confession, and been freed from all your former wicked works, do not therefore corrupt yourself a second time, &c. &c.;" after this the penitence is imposed. In the contemporary Penitential of Joannes Monachus the form of absolution directly after confession is still stronger. "May God who for our sake became man, and bore the sins of all the world, turn to your good all these things which you, my brother, have confessed to me, His unworthy minister, and free you from them all in this world, and receive you in the world to come, and bring all to be saved, who is blessed for ever." But this absolution did not entitle the penitent to Holy Communion, nor do away with the necessity of subsequent penitence, which often continued for years after this, and at the end of it another and more formal and perfect absolution was granted. (Morin. de Poenit. vi. 25.) On the practice of confession among the sects which broke away from the Orthodox church, see Daniel (Codex Liturgicus, iv. p. 590).

iv. Confession before receiving Holy Communion may have been an occasional practice, but the presumption is very strong against its having been a general one. Socrates (H. E. v. 19), in his account of the abolition of the office of the Penitentiary, states that Nectarius was advised to strike his name from the roll of ecclesiastical officers, and allow each one henceforward to communicate as his own conscience should direct; a notice which seems to imply that in the time of Nectarius, who was Chrysostom's predecessor at Constantinople, it had been the custom for the people to consult with the Penitentiary before presenting themselves to receive the eucharist. But the passage is an isolated one; it is supported by no other authority; and whatever value it may have, it is a two-edged testimony, for if it proves that the custom prevailed at that time, it also proves that after that time it ceased. On the other hand there is this class of indirect evidence, that no such preparation was generally enforced. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 43), relates that during the episcopate of Cornelius at Rome, 1050 widows and destitute people received alms from the church; the Roman church must therefore at that time have consisted of many thousands, to minister to whom were the bishop himself and forty-six presbyters; and when the frequency with which the faithful communicated even at the latter half of the 3rd century, is borne in mind, it would seem to be almost physically impossible that each one should make an individual confession before communicating. Similar evidence is furnished from the ancient liturgies, in which special directions are given to the deacon to warn to depart from the church the catechumens, penitents, and others who were not allowed to communicate, but no hint is given that those who had failed to confess were to be excluded. Stronger evidence is supplied by the absence of any mention of confession among the preparations required for a worthy reception of the sacrament. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 1, p. 318, Potter) seems to imply that some ministers judged who were or were not worthy [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413], though he himself thought the individual conscience the best guide. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 in Gen. p. 268, ed. Bened.) similarly leaves each one to judge of his fitness, "If we do this [reconcile ourselves with the brethren], we shall be able with a pure conscience to approach His holy and awful table, and to utter boldly those words joined to our prayers—the initiated know what I mean; wherefore I leave to everyone's conscience how, fulfilling that command, we may at that fearful moment utter these things with boldness." Augustine also tells his hearers that their own conscience, and that alone, must determine their fitness (Serm. 46 de Verb. Dom.), "considering your several degrees, and adhering to what you have professed, approach ye to the flesh of the Lord, approach ye to the blood of the Lord; whose proveth himself not to be such, let him not approach." The second council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 46), gives detailed directions on the manner and order of receiving, but no word about confession—an omission which bears so much the more strongly upon the question, because private confession had undoubtedly begun to take the place of penitential confession in the 9th century.

v. At the hour of death.—The evidence on this head, still more than on the preceding, is negative. If confession immediately before death had been customary, some notice of it would have found a place in the narratives of the last hours of the saints and fathers of the early church. But no such records appear. Cyprian in three of his epistles (Ep. 18–20, Oxf. ed.), allows the confession of the lapsed to be received on their deathbed preparatory to imposition of hands; but this was only to meet the emergency of sudden illness overtaking penitents; it was no part of a systematic practice. Athanasius in his account of the death of Anthony (in Vit. Ant. Eremit. fin.), has no allusion to a previous confession. Equally silent is Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 21), on the death of Athanasius; and (Orat. 19), on the death of his own father, Gregory bishop of Nazianzum; and (Orat. 20), in the eulogy which he delivered at the tomb of Basil. Gregory Nyssen (de Vit. Greg. Thaum.) has no account of the deathbed confession of Gregory Thaumaturgus: nor has Ambrose (de Obit. Theod.) of that of Theodosius. Augustine (Confess. ix. 10, 11), records the last hours of his mother, but he records no last confession; his own last hours which Possidius (de Vit. Aug. c. 31) has described, were spent in penitence, but the only confession made was to God, "He was wont to say to us that even proved Christians, whether clergy or laity, should not depart from life without a full and fitting penitence, and this he carried out in his last illness. For he had the penitential psalms copied out and arranged against the wall in sets of four, and read them as he lay in bed, all through his sickness, and freely and bitterly wept. And he begged that he might not be interrupted, and that we would not go into his room except when his physicians came, or he needed food. And all that time we neither read nor spoke to him." Bede, narrating (Eccles. Hist. iv. 3), the death of bishop Ceadde, and (ib. iv. 23), the abbess Hilda, and (Cuth. Vit. c. 39) Cuthbert, states that each received the Holy Communion at the last, but not that it was preceded by confession. Similar is Eginhard's account (Vit. Car. Mag.), of the death of Charles the Great (see Daille iv. 3, where the evidence is drawn out in detail).

vi. Time and Manner.—The time of public confession was originally whenever the penitent felt moved to acknowledge his sin before the church; afterwards, in common with the whole course of discipline, the time was restricted to certain seasons [PENITENCE]. Private confession not being part of the recognized order of the church, had necessarily no time assigned to it. The capitulary of Theodulph (c. 36) indeed orders confessions to be made the week before Lent, but this is an exceptional instance. There is an example of a confession made in writing by Potamius, archbishop of Braga to the 10th council of Toledo, A.D. 656, charging himself with misdemeanours. The confession was entirely spontaneous, for the council having no suspicion of his guilt could not at first believe him; but on his reaffirming the fact, he was deposed and subjected to penitence for the remainder of his life; allowed, however, out of compassion to retain his title, his successor signing himself bishop and metropolitan. Robert, bishop of the Cenomani (Le Mans), also made a written confession, but the council to which it was made absolved him (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; v. 10).

It appears from the Greek Penitentials that confession was made sitting; the penitent kneeling only twice while making his confession, at the beginning, when the priest asked the Holy Spirit's aid to move the man to disburden his soul completely, and at the end, when a prayer was offered that he might obtain grace to perform his sentence conscientiously. The origin of this custom was the great length to which the form and process of confessing extended. The practice has since continued in the Greek church, for both priest and penitent to sit (Martene de Rit. i. 3; Daniel Codex Liturg. iv. p. 588). The Penitential of Joannes Jejunator gives the following instructions on the order and manner of confessing; "he who comes to confess ought to make three inclinations of the body as he approaches the sacred altar, and say three times 'I confess to thee O Father, Lord God of heaven and earth, whatever is in the secret places of my heart.' And after he has said this he should raise himself and stand erect; and he who receives his confession should question him with a cheerful countenance, which he who confesses should also if possible present, and kiss his hand, especially if he sees the penitent to be depressed by the severity of his sorrow and shame, and after that he should say to him in a cheerful and gentle voice" . . . and then follow 95 questions, and the priest orders the penitent, if not a woman, to uncover his head even though he wear a crown: he then prays with him: after that he raises him and bids him recover his head, and sits with him, and asks him what penance he can bear. The Penitential of Joannes Monachus directs that the priest should invite the penitent into a church or some other retired spot, with a cheerful countenance, as though he were inviting him to some magnificent feast, and exhort him to make a confession of his sins to him: the priest should then recite with him the 69th Psalm, and the Trisagion, and bid him uncover his head, and neither should sit down before the priest has minutely investigated all that is in his heart. The penitent should afterwards prostrate himself on the earth and lie there, while the priest prays for him: the priest is then to raise him and kiss him, and lay his hand upon his neck and comfort him, after that they are to sit together. Alcuin, or the author of De Divinis officiis, orders the penitent coming to confess to bow humbly to the priest, who is then on his own behalf to say "Lord be merciful to me a sinner," and afterwards to order the penitent to sit opposite to him, and speak to him about his sins; the penitent is then to rehearse the articles of his faith, and afterwards kneel and raise his hands, and implore the priest to intercede with God for all the sins which have been omitted in the confession; he is then to prostrate himself on the ground, and the priest is to suffer him to lie there awhile, and afterwards raise him and impose a penance upon him: afterwards the penitent is again to prostrate himself, and ask the priest to pray that he may have grace given him to persevere in performing his penance; the priest then offers a prayer, which is followed by six others, which are found in all the Western Penitentials; the penitent then rises from the ground and the priest from his seat, and they enter the church together, and there conclude the penitential service. Compare Morinus (de Poenit. iv. 18-19).

Literature.—Morinus (de Poenit. lib. ii. et passim) who is however hampered by the Roman doctrine of obligatory confession, and contains far fewer details on this than on the other stages of discipline. What is to be said on the distinctively Roman side of the controversy will be found in Bellarmine (de Poenit. lib. iii.); and on the Protestant side in Usher (Answer to a Challenge, s.v. Confession, Lond. 1625). The subject is more thoroughly treated from the same side in Dailé (de Auric. Confess. Genév. 1661), a very learned controversial work, and the source of most of the subsequent Protestant writings, which deal with confession. Also Bingham (Antiq. xviii. 3), Marshall (Penitential Discipline), and a long note on confession, founded on Dailé, appended by the editor of the Oxf. Lib. of Fathers to Tertullian (de Poenit.). [G. M.]

EXONARTHEX (Ἐξωνάρθηξ). Monastic churches sometimes have (besides the ordinary NARTHEX at the west end) an outer narthex, where the monks may say those portions of their devotions which bear the character of penitence without being disturbed by the influx of the general congregation. Cedrenus says that the great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had four nartheces, but other authorities attribute to it only two (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 202). [C.]

EXORCISM (ὄρκωσις, ἑξορκισμός, ἐπορκισμός, ἀφορκισμός adjuratio, incocatio) is the employment of adjuration, and especially the naming the name of Jesus Christ, with a view to expel an evil spirit. "Exorcismus est sermo increpationis contra immundum spiritum in energumenis sive catechumenis factus, per quem ao illis diaboli nequissima virtus et inveterata malitia vel excursio violenta fugetur" (Isidore, De Div. Off. ii. 20).

1. To the early Christians the heathen world presented itself as under the dominion of evil spirits; everywhere they recognized the need of driving these spirits from their ancient seats, whether in the bodies and souls of men, in the brute creation, or in inanimate objects. They saw themselves surrounded by squadrons and gross bands of daemonia, supernatural beings who worked for evil under their several captains (Origen, contra Celsum, bk. vii. p. 378, Spencer; viii. p. 399); daemonia were the great officers of the evil world, and might well have fasces and toga praetexta (Tertullian, De Idolol. 18); the gods of the nations were daemonia (ib. 20; Orig. c. Cels. p. 378, quoting Ps. xcvi. 5); daemonia were by some devilish magic compelled to inhabit the statues in an idol's temple (Minucius Felix, Oct. c. 27; Tert. u. s. 7 and 15; Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 374); the theatre was the very special dominion of evil spirits (Tertul. de Spectac. 26). Demons ruled the flight of birds, the lots, the oracles; they troubled men's minds, disturbed their rest, crept with their subtle influence into bodies and caused disease, distorted limbs; they compelled men to worship them, in order that, fed with the savour of the offerings, they might release those whom they had bound (Minucius, Oct. c. 27). And the members of this great supernatural army were driven from their seats by the mere word of a simple Christian naming over them the name of Christ (Acts xix. 13; Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. c. 8; Dial. v. Trypho, c. 85; Tertul. ad Scapulam, cc. 2 and 4, Apol. c. 23; Orig. c. Cels. iii. p. 133) with no parade of incantations or magic formulae, by mere prayers and adjurations (ὁρκώσας, Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 334), or by sentences of Scripture (ib. p. 376); and that not only from the bodies and souls of men, but from haunted places and from the lower animals; for these too fell under the tyranny of demons (l. c.). From such expressions as these it is evident that exorcism was practised from a very early period in the church.

In one form, indeed, exorcism was practised by the Lord Himself and His disciples, namely, in the casting out of evil spirits from those who were in a special sense "possessed" or "demoniac;" and such exorcism was continued for some generations in the church [DEMONIAC: EXORCIST]. But we are at present concerned with the more general form of exorcism, by which the inherent evil demon was to be expelled from some creature or substance not specially "possessed," but belonging to the "evil world."

2. It is not wonderful that when the minds of men were full of the conception of an all-pervading army of evil spirits in the world around them, they should endeavour to free from this influence those whom they received from heathenism into the holy ground of the church. Hence, at a comparatively early period, we find candidates for baptism not only renouncing for themselves all allegiance to Satan and his powers, but having pronounced over them a formula of exorcism.

It is probable that in the first instance the use of exorcism was confined to the case of those who entered the church from heathenism; but in the 4th century, if not earlier, it was clearly applied to all, for it is constantly appealed to as a conclusive proof that the church recognized the presence of original sin even in infants. Thus Optatus (c. Donatist, iv. 6, p. 75) insists that no one, even though born of Christian parents, can be destitute of a foul spirit, which must be driven out of the man before he comes to the font of salvation; this is the work of exorcism, by which the foul spirit is driven forth into the wilderness. And pope Celestinus (Ad Episcop. Gall. c. 12) says that none came to baptism, whether infants or "juvenes," until the evil spirit had been driven out of them by the exorcisms and insufflations of the clerics. Compare Augustine, Epist. 194, ad Sixtum, § 46; De Symbolo ad Catechumenos, i. 5; Contra Julianum, i. 4.

Cyril of Jerusalem (Procatechesis, c. 9, p. 7; Catech. i. c. 5, p. 18) begs his catechumens to be earnest in receiving their exorcisms (ἐπορκισμοὺς); whether they had been insufflated or exorcised (κὰν ἐμψυσθῆς κὰν ἐπορκισθῆς), he prays that they may be blessed. And again (c. 13) he says, "when ye have entered before the hour of the exorcisms, let every one speak things that conduce to piety," as if the exorcisms began the catechetical office on each occasion. These instructions are evidently for all the catechumens, and not for those only who had come over from heathenism. And Chrysostom (Catech. I. ad Initian. c. 2, p. 227) speaks of the catechumens, after instruction, proceeding to hear the words of those who exorcise (τῶν ἐξορκιστῶν); to this exorcism they went barefooted and stripped of their upper garments. There can of course be no doubt that the great body of those whom Chrysostom catechised were born of Christian families.

3. Formulae of Exorcism.—Celsus, who wrote against the Christians probably in the middle of the 2nd century, says that he had seen in the possession of certain presbyters "barbaric books containing names of daemons and gibberish (τρεπείας)" (Orig. c. Celsum, vi. p. 302); and again the same opponent says that, "to name the demons in the barbarous tongue (βαρβάρως) is efficacious; to name them in Greek or Latin is useless" (ib. viii. p. 402). Origen, in answer to this, alleges that Latin, Greek, or other Christians in their prayers use the name of God in the tongue in which they were born; but he does not deny the superior efficacy of names or formulae in one language over those in another. On the contrary, he admits (ib. i. p. 19) the mystic power of Hebrew names, and declares that Egyptian, Persian, and other names have a peculiar efficacy over certain demons; and elsewhere (In Matt. ser. 110, p. 232, ed. Wircb.) complains that those who practised exorcisms (adjurationibus) used improper books, as, for instance, books derived from Jewish sources. From all this it seems clear that formulae of exorcism which to a Roman seemed "barbaric" were in use in the 2nd century. That written forms of exorcism were used in the 4th is clear from the 7th of the Statuta Antiqua [Conc. Carth. IV.], which orders the bishop to deliver to an EXORCIST on ordination a book containing such forms.

With regard to the form of exorcism, we find in ancient authorities the following particulars.

We have already seen that to name the name of Christ was regarded as being of the utmost efficacy for the expulsion of evil spirits. The passage of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. 85; compare c. 30) which says that every spirit (δαμόνιον) is conquered and subjected on being adjured "by the Name of the Son of God and first-born of every creature, Who was born of the Virgin and became Man capable of suffering (παθητόν), was crucified under Pontius Pilate by your [the Jewish] people, and died, and rose again from the dead, and ascended into heaven," renders it probable that a recitation of the redeeming acts of the Lord accompanied the naming of his name. And the same thing seems to be indicated by the words of Origen (c. Cels. i. p. 7), who says that demons were expelled by the name of Jesus, "together with the recitation of the acts related of Him" (μετὰ τῆς ἀπαγγελίας τῶν περὶ αὐτὸν ἰστοριῶν). See Probst, p. 49.

The words of Tertullian again (Apol. 23), that the power of Christians over evil spirits derives its force from naming Christ, "and from the making mention of those punishments which await them from God through Jesus Christ the judge," make it probable that the awful punishment which was to overtake the evil ones was spoken of in the formula of exorcism. So Tertullian: "representatione ignis illius" (Apol. 23). And if in another passage—"Satanas . . . quem nos dicimus malitiae angelum" . . . (De Testim. Animae, c. 3)—we are to take "dicimus" in a ritual sense, it would appear that the exorcists of Tertullian's time cursed and reviled Satan.

That prayer was added to the exorcism proper we know from the testimony of Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 27, § 5).

The actions which formed part of the rite of exorcism were touching and breathing on the afflicted, and signing them with the cross.

As to the first, Tertullian tells us (Apol. 23), that the evil spirits depart unwillingly from the bodies of men at the touch and on-breathing of Christians (de contactu deque afflatu nostro). Vincentius of Thibari (Sententiae Episcoporum, No. 37, in Cyprian's Works), contending that heretics require baptism at least as much as heathens, distinctly refers to the imposition of hands in exorcism, quoting (incorrectly) Mark xvi. 17, 18. So Origen (on Joshua, Hom. 24, c. 1) speaks of the imposition of the hands of the exorcists which evil spirits could not resist. Similarly the Arabic canons of Hippolytus (Can. 19, § 6, and Can. 29, quoted by Probst, p. 50). The same canon enjoins the exorcist, after the adjurations, to "sign" (no doubt with the cross) the breast, forehead, ears, and mouth. And at an even earlier date, when Justin (Dial. c. 131) speaks of the outstretched arms of Moses as a type of Christ, and then immediately after of the power of Christ crucified over evil spirits, it is not improbable that he alludes to the use of the sign of the cross. So when we read (Origen on Exodus, Hom. 6, § 8) how the demons tremble before the cross which they see on Christians, we may well believe that the reference is to the use of the cross in exorcism. Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 27) distinctly mentions the use of the sign of the cross (signum passionis) for the expulsion of evil spirits. The first council of Constantinople (c. 7) describes the course of proceeding with those heretics who were to be received as non-Christians (ὡς Ἑλληνας) as follows: "the first day we make them Christians; the second, catechumens; then the third we exorcise them, after breathing thrice upon the face and ears, and so we catechise them, and cause them to stay in the church and hear the Scriptures; and then we baptize them."

The ceremony took place in the church. "Shameless is he," says Pseudo-Cyprian (De Spectac. c. 4), "who exorcises in a church demons whose delights he favours in a theatre." During the exorcism the patient lay prostrate on the ground (Origen on Matt. Hom. 13, § 7).

Most of the characteristics of the form of exorcism which we have traced in ancient times are found in existing rituals. For instance, in the ancient Roman form of receiving a heathen as a catechumen (Daniel, Codex Lit. i. 171), after the admonition to renounce the devil and believe in the Holy Trinity, the priest "exsufflat ab eo saevam maligni spiritus potestatem dicens—'Exi, immunde spiritus, et da locum Spiritui Sancto Paraclito.'" Then he signs him with the cross on the forehead and breast. At the seventh scrutiny (SCRUTINIUM), which took place on Easter Eve, after the recitation of the Creed by the candidates for baptism, the priest lays his hand on the head of each severally, saying—"Nec te lateat, Satanas, imminere tibi tormenta, imminere tibi diem iudicii, diem supplicii, diem qui venturus est velut clibanus ardens, in quo tibi atque universis angelis tuis aeternus veniet interitus. Proinde, damnate, da honorem Deo vivo et vero: da honorem Jesu Christo filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto, in cuius nomine atque virtute praecipio tibi ut ex eas et recedas ab hoc famulo Dei, quem hodie Dominus Deus noster Jesus Christus ad suam sanctam gratiam et benedictionem fontemque baptismatis vocare dignatus est, ut fiat ejus templum per aquam regenerationis in remissionem omnium peccatorum: in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos et saeculum per ignem" (Daniel, u. s. 177). Then follows the epheata [EARS, TOUCHING OF], and the anointing on the breast and between the shoulders with holy oil.

In the Vetus Missale Gallicanum, published by Thomasius and reprinted by Mabillon (Lit. Gall. bk. iii. p. 338) the essential part of the form of exorcism is as follows: "Aggredior te, immundissime damnate spiritus... Te, invocato Domini nostri Jesu Christi nomine, . . . adjuramus per ejusdem majestatem adque virtutem, passionem ac resurrectionem, adventum adque iudicium; ut in quacumque parte membrorum latitas propria te confessione manifestes, exagitatique spiritalibus flagris invisibilibusque tormentis vas quod occupasse aestimas fugias expiatumque post habitationem tuam Domino darelinquas . . . Abscede, abscede quocunque es, et corpora Deo dicata ne repetas. Interdicta sint tibi ista in perpetuo. In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, et in gloria dominicae passionis, ejus cruore salvantur, ejus adventum expectant, iudicium confitentur. Per Dominum."

The Gelasian Sacramentary (i. 33), in the Exorcismi super Electos,^a gives the following form. The acolytes, laying their hands on the candidate, after praying God to send forth His angel to keep them, proceeds: "Ergo, maledicte diabole, recognosce sententiam tuam, et da honorem Deo vivo et vero, et . . . Jesu Christo Filio ejus et Spiritui Sancto; et recede ab his famulis Dei; quia istos sibi Deus . . . vocare dignatus est: per hoc signum sanctae crucis, frontibus eorum quod nos damus, tu, maledicte diabole, nunquam audeas violare. . . . Audi, maledicte Satanas, adjuratus per nomen aeterni Dei et Salvatoris nostri Filii Dei, cum tua victus invidia, tremens gemensque discede."

And again, the foul spirit is adjured to depart, in the case of the males, in the name of Him who walked the water and stretched out His right hand to Peter; in the case of the females, in the name of Him who gave sight to him that was born blind, and raised Lazarus from his four days' death.

The form given from the Roman ritual by Probst (p. 53) presents a remarkable parallelism with the passage of Tertullian (Apol. c. 23) before referred to.

Greek forms similar in character to those given above may be seen in Daniel's Codex Liturg. iv. 493 f.

4. Representation of Exorcism.—Paciaudi (De Christianorum Balneis, pp. 136 ff., 143 ff.) describes an urn or water-vessel found near Pisaura, which he believes to be not of later date than the 7th century. One of the bas-reliefs on this vessel (see woodcut) evidently represents an exorcism. The contortions of the person on the ground seem to show that it was an exorcism of one possessed. Now, if the vessel was a font for holding the baptismal water, it would seem more appropriate to represent upon it the ordinary pre-baptismal exorcism. It seems therefore more probable that it was intended for the

^a i. e. the accepted candidates for baptism.

ATRIUM of a church, where it might be used to contain HOLY WATER.

5. Besides human beings, various inanimate objects were exorcised. Of these we may mention especially water [BAPTISM, §§ 30, 42; FONT, BENEDICTION OF: HOLY WATER], salt for use in sacred offices [SALT, BENEDICTION OF], and oil for various uses [CHRISM: OIL, HOLY].

EXORCISTS. Exorcists are only once mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xix. 13), and then without any reference to the power given to Christians to cast out devils. [See DICT. OF BIBLE.] In the early days of the church, it appears to have been considered that the power of exorcising evil spirits was a special gift of God to certain persons, who are therefore called exorcists. In the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. c. 26), it is said that an exorcist is not ordained, because the power of exorcising is a free gift of the grace of God, through Christ, and that whoever has received this gift will be made manifest in the exercise of it. It is added that if expedient an exorcist may be ordained bishop, priest, or deacon. Exorcists are not named among those who received ecclesiastical stipends, nor are they mentioned in the Apostolic Canons, though probably their office is alluded to in the direction that a Gentile convert who has an evil spirit may not be received into the church till he has been purified (καθαρισθῆις, Can. 70). Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 30, § 1, 8), thinks that exorcists were either priests or deacons. So Eusebius makes mention of one Romanus, as deacon and exorcist in the church of Caesarea in Palestine (De Martyr. Palest. c. 2).

Tertullian speaks as if all Christians were exorcists, driving away evil spirits by the exorcisms of their prayers. Thus (De Idol. c. 11), he forbids Christians to have anything to do with the sale of things used for the purposes of idolatry, asking with what consistency they could exorcise their own inmates, to whom they had offered their houses as a shrine (cellarium); and in another place (De Cor. Mil. c. 11), uses as an argument against Christians entering the military service, that they might be called upon to guard the heathen temples, so as to defend those by night whom by their exorcisms they had put to flight during the day.

But it is evident that in later times they were reckoned among the minor orders of clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 69, Mag. Fil.), speaks of exorcists as casting out devils by man's word and God's power, and in his epistle to Firmilian (Ep. 75), says that one of the exorcists, inspired by the grace of God, cast out a certain evil spirit who had made pretensions to sanctity. Cornelius in his epistle (Euseb. H. E. i. c. 43) names forty-two exorcists among the clergy of the church of Rome. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 21), mentions them among the clergy, ranking them with the hermeneutae, immediately after the deaconesses. Paulinus of Nola (De S. Felic. Natal. carm. 4), speaks of St. Felix as having been promoted from the order of lectors to the office of exorcist. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), mentions them among the minor clergy, placing them between the singers and the doorkeepers, and, in another canon (c. 26), forbids any to exorcise either in church or in private houses, who had not been appointed to the office by the bishops. The council of Antioch (c. 10), places them after the subdeacons, among the clergy who might be appointed by the chorepiscopi. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), provides an office for the ordination of an exorcist. He was to receive from the hands of the bishop a book, in which were written forms of exorcism, with the bidding, "Take and commit to memory, and receive power to lay hands on energumens whether baptized or catechumens." The same council also provided that exorcists might lay hands on an energumen at any time (c. 90), and (c. 92) gave it into their charge to provide the energumens with their daily food while remaining in the church. [DEMONIACS.]

The names of four exorcists, designating themselves by no other titles, are found among the signatories of the first council of Arles (Routh's Relliq. Sac. iv. p. 312).

There seems little reason for connecting the exorcists with the form of exorcism that was used in the case of all catechumens. Their work, as expressly allotted to them by the 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), lay among all energumens, whether baptized or not. [P. O.]

EXPOSING OF INFANTS [compare FOUNDLINGS]. The frequency of the exposition of infants among the ancient heathens is a fact to which both the mythology and the history of Greece and Rome bear frequent witness. Among the early Christian writers we find exposition, together with actual infanticide, constantly cast in the teeth of their Pagan opponents. "I see you," writes Minucius Felix, "now casting forth the sons whom ye have begotten to the wild beasts and to the fowls of the air" (Octavius, c. 30, § 2; 31, § 4). Lactantius (bk. vi. c. 20) inveighs against the false pity of those who expose infants. Justin, Tertullian, Augustine and others might be quoted to much the same effect.

A law of Alexander Severus, which has been retained in Justinian's Code (bk. viii. t. lii., l. i.; A.D. 225), allowed the recovering of an infant exposed against the will or without the knowledge of the owner or person entitled to the services of its mother, whether slave or adscriptitiu, but only on condition of repaying the fair cost of its maintenance and training to a trade, unless theft could be established—an enactment obviously framed only to secure the rights of slave-owners, and not inspired by any consideration of humanity for the infants themselves. There is something of a higher spirit in a law of Diocletian and Maximin, A.D. 295 (Code, bk. v., t. iv., l. 16), enacting that where a female infant had been cast forth by her father and brought up by another person, who sought to marry her to his own son, the father was bound to consent to the marriage, or in case of refusal (if we construe the text aright), to pay for his daughter's maintenance. Constantine (A.D. 331), by a law contained in the Theodosian Code (bk. v., t. vii., l. 1), but not reproduced by Justinian, enacted that whoever took up an infant cast forth from its house by the will of a father or master, and nourished it till it became strong, might retain it in whatever condition he pleased, either as a child or as a slave, without any fear of recovery by those who have voluntarily cast out their new-born slaves or children. The growth of Christian humanity is shown in a constitution of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian, adopted by Justinian (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 2; A.D. 374), which absolutely forbade masters or patrons to recover infants exposed by themselves, if charitably saved by others, and laid down as a duty that every one must nourish his own offspring. A constitution of Honorius and Theodosius, in the Theodosian Code (A.D. 412), repeated the prohibition, observing that "none can call one his own whom he contemned while perishing," but required a bishop's signature by way of attestation of the facts (bk. v., t. vii., l. 2).

The law last referred to may seem in some degree to explain a canon of the council or synod of Vaison, A.D. 442. There is a universal complaint, it says, on the subject of the exposition of infants, who are cast forth not to the mercy of others, but to the dogs, whilst the fear of lawsuits deters others from saving them. This therefore is to be observed, that according to the statutes of the princes the church be taken to witness; from the altar on the Lord's day the minister is to announce that the church knows an exposed infant to have been taken up, in order that within ten days any person may acknowledge and receive it back; and any who after the ten days may bring any claim or accusation is to be dealt with by the church as a manslayer (cc. 9, 10). A canon almost to the same effect, but in clearer language, was enacted by the slightly later 2nd council of Arles, A.D. 452, indicating that which serves to explain both the law of Honorius and the two canons just referred to, viz., that it was the practice to expose infants "before the church" (c. 51). The council of Agde, in 506, simply confirmed former enactments.

In the East, the full claims of Christian humanity were at last admitted by Justinian, as towards foundlings themselves, though without sufficient consideration for parental duties. He not only absolutely forbade the re-vindication of exposed infants under any circumstances, but also the treating of them, by those who have taken charge of them, either as slaves, freedmen, coloni or adscriptitii, declaring such children to be absolutely free (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 3; A.D. 529; see also bk. i., t. iv., l. 24; A.D. 530). This applied to infants cast away either in churches, streets or any other place, even though a plaintiff should give some evidence of a right of ownership over them (bk. viii., t. lii., l. 4). The 153rd Novel, however, shows that it was still the practice in certain districts (Thessalonica is specified) to expose new-born infants in the churches, and after they had been brought up to reclaim them as slaves; and it again expressly enacts the freedom of exposed infants.

The Wisigothic law contains some rather remarkable provisions as to the exposition of infants (bk. iv., t. iv., cc. 1, 2). Where a person has out of compassion taken up a foundling of either sex, wherever exposed, and when it is nourished up the parents acknowledge it, if it be the child of a free person, let them either give back a slave in its place or pay the price of one; otherwise, let the foundling be redeemed by the judge of the territory from the ownership of the parents, and let these be subject to perpetual exile. If they have not wherewithal to pay, let him serve for the infant who cast it forth, and let the latter remain in freedom, whom the pity of strangers has preserved. If indeed slaves of either sex have cast forth an infant in fraud of its masters, when he has been nourished up, let the nourisher receive one-third of its value, the master swearing to or proving his ignorance of the exposing. But if he knew of it, let the foundling remain in the power of him who nourished it.

In a collection of Irish canons, ascribed to the end of the 7th century, is one "on infants cast forth in the church," which enacts, in very uncouth and obscure Latin, that such an infant shall be a slave to the church unless sent away; and that seven years' penance is to be borne by those who cast infants forth (bk. xli., c. 22).

A capitulary of uncertain date (supposed about 744) enacts, in accordance with the canon of the synod of Vaison before referred to, that if an infant exposed before the church has been taken up by the compassion of any one, such person shall affix—probably on the church door—a letter of notice (testationis ponat . . . epistolam). If the infant be not acknowledged within ten days, let the person who has taken it up securely retain it (c. 1).

The "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the law of the Roman population of Italy in Lombard times, contains a less liberal provision on this subject, founded on the earlier imperial law. If a new-born infant has been cast out by its parents either in the church or in the precincts (platea), and any one with the knowledge of the father or mother and of the master has taken it up and nourished it by his labour, it shall remain in his power who took it up. And if a person knew not its father or mother or master, and wished nevertheless to take it up, let him present the infant before the bishop (pontificem) or the clerics who serve that church, and receive from the hand of that bishop and those clerks an epistola collectionis, and thenceforth, let him have power either to give such infant liberty, or to retain it in perpetual slavery (bk. v., t. vii.). [J. M. L.]

EXPULSION FROM A MONASTERY.

So soon as there began to be any sort of discipline among the ascetics who dwelt together in a community, expulsion inevitably became a necessary part of it. In the so-called "Rule of Pachomius," expulsion (or a flogging) was the penalty for insubordination, licentiousness, quarrelling, covetousness, gluttony (cf. Cass. Inst. iv. 16). Menard, however, thinks that this was only expulsion for a stated time (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regg. xxxi. 5). By the Regula Orientalis

(c. 35) obstinate offenders are to be expelled. Benedict, with characteristic prudence, prescribed expulsion for contumacy (Reg. c. 71), on the principle that the gangrened limb must be lopped off, lest the rest of the body should be infected with the poison (ib. c. 28), while with characteristic gentleness he allowed such offenders to be re-admitted, if penitent, so often as thrice, on condition of their taking the lowest place among the brethren (ib. c. 29). Some commentators, however, take this permission as not extending to the case of a monk expelled for such vices as could hardly fail to corrupt the community (Mart. Reg. Comm. loc. cit.). The Benedictine reformers generally made expulsion more common and readmission more difficult. Fructuosus orders all incorrigible offenders to be expelled (Reg. cc. 8, 16); and the Regula Cujusdam, still more severe, enacts expulsion for lying, fornication, persistent murmuring, and even abusive language (cc. 6, 8, 16, 18). At a later period, under the stern discipline of Cîteaux, a monk was to be unfrocked and expelled, even for theft above a certain value (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 33). Obviously the frequency or infrequency of such a penalty as expulsion depended on the monastery being regarded rather as a reformatory or as a place of ideal perfection. [I. G. S.]

EYES, TOUCHING OF. 1. The first council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) laid it down (c. 7) that Arians and certain other heretics were to be received into the church, without re-baptism, on renouncing their heresy and being crossed or anointed with holy unguent (μύρον) on the forehead, eyes, &c. So in the form of baptism given by Daniel (Codex Lit. iv. 507) from the Greek Euchologion, the priest after baptism anoints the neophyte with holy unguent, making the sign of the cross on forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, saying, "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Amen." Compare Martene, De Rit. Ant. i. 1, 17, Ord. 24, 25.

2. In extreme unction, the eyes are anointed with holy oil. Thus, in the Ratold MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 549, ed. Ménard), the priest is directed to anoint the eyes, with the words: "Ungo oculos tuos de oleo sanctificato, ut quicquid illicito visu deliquisti per hujus olei unctionem expietur."

3. It seems to have been the custom to touch the eyes, as well as the other organs of sense, with the moisture remaining on the lips after communicating (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Myst. v. 22: see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413; EARS, TOUCHING OF). [C.]

FABRICA ECCLESIAE. [CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388.]

FACE, BRANDING IN THE. It was enacted under Constantine (Code, lib. ix. tit. 47, l. 17), that branding should not be in the face, as disfiguring the heavenly beauty [CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS, p. 470]. [C.]

FACITERGIUM (also facietergium, faciistergium, facietergula; faciēdis, faciēde). This, as its name indicates, is a handkerchief for wiping the face ("facietergium et manitergium, a tergendō faciē vel manus vocatur." Isidore, Etym. xix. 26). Mention of this is occasionally found in various monastic rules. It is appointed as part of the furniture of a monk's couch in the Rule of St. Isidore (c. 14; p. 127, part 2, in Holstenius, Codex Regularum; ed. Paris, 1663). See also Magistri Regula, cc. 17, 19, 81 (op. cit. pp. 214, 216, 257). The last passage ordains that there shall be dealt out "singula facietergia per decadem." Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum, viii. 8; p. 1191, ed. Ruinart) speaks of the value set upon the "facietergium dependentibus villis intextum, quod Sanctus [i.e. Nicetius Lugdunensis] super caput in die obitus sui habuit." The facietergia used by nuns were at times embroidered (Caesarii Regula ad Virgines, c. 42; Holstenius, part 3, p. 22). Again, Venantius Fortunatus, in his life of St. Radegundis of France, describes her on one occasion as "circa altare cum faciistergio jacentem pulverem colligens" (c. 2; Patrol. lxxii. 653). One more example may suffice, where the word, perhaps, appears in the transitional state of its meaning: "donata etiam particula sancti orarii, id est

siario, etc.*, in Anast. Biblioth. Collectanea; Patrol. cxxix. 685). For further examples, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv. [R. S.]

FAITH. [SOPHIA.]

FAITHFUL. The present article is intended to give an account of the principal names applied to Christians in early times, whether by themselves or by others.

The names most common among Christians in the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages seem to have been Saints (ἅγιοι), Elect (ἐκλεκτοί), Brethren (ἀδελφοί), and Faithful (πίστοι), often followed by the words, ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ.

The words πίστος and Fidelis were also used in a special sense to distinguish the baptized Christian from the catechumen. Thus Augustine (Tract. in Joann. 44, c. 9) says that if a man tells us that he is a Christian, we have to ask further, whether he is catechumen or "fidelis." Hence such an inscription as CHRISTIANA FIDELIS (Le Blant, Inscript. de la Gaule, i. 373) is not a mere pleonasm. So the council of Elvira (C. Elib.
c. 67) seems to distinguish between "fidelis" and "catechumena." In the liturgies, the portion of the office at which catechumens were not allowed to be present was called Missa Fidelium, and the Lord's Prayer Fidelium Oratio. See Suicer's Thesaurus, s.v. Πιστός. Eusebius (Praep.
Evang. i. 1) repudiates the charge that Christians were called πίστοι from their credulity.

Fidelis is a frequent epithet in inscriptions, particularly in the case of young children, who might otherwise be supposed to have died un-baptized. Thus an inscription given by Maran-goni (Acta S. Victorini, 103) runs thus: HIC
REQUIESCIT IN PACE FILIPPUS || INFAS FIDELIS.
Similar inscriptions are given in the case of a child who died at the age of a year and nine months (Ib. p. 109), and of another who died at the age of five years and five months (Ib. p. 96).
Another may be seen in Cavedoni (Ant. Cimit. di Chiusi, p. 33). On a marble at Florence (Gori, Inscr. Ant. Etrur. iii. 314) it is said of a child of three years and three months, ΠΙCΤΗ ΕΤΕΛΕΥ- ΤΗCΕΝ. In one case given by Marini (Frat.
Arval. p. 171), the inscription describes an ancestress (major) begging baptism for a child at the point of death: PETIVIT AB ECCLESIA UT FIDELIS DE SECVLO RECECISSET (i. e. recederet).
In another case (Oderico, Inscr. Vet. p. 267), one of two brothers, who died at eight years old, is described as NEOFITVS, while the brother, who died at seven, is described as FIDELIS. And again a guardian described as FIDELIS, erects a monument to a nursing who was yet among the "audientes" or catechumens: ALVMNAE
AVDIENTI (Gori, u. s. i. 228).

Such inscriptions as VIXIT IN PACE FIDELIS, or REQUIESCIT FIDELIS IN PACE, are too common to need particularizing (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Fidelis).

Other names given to Christians were perhaps either (1) Designations of some peculiarity of their practice or profession, rather than recognized titles; more epithets than names; or (2) names given them by the outside world, either in derision or by mistake.

I. Under the first head may be classed (a) Ἰεσ- σαῖοι, Jessaeans, a name which Epiphanius (Haer.
29, n. 4) says may be derived from Jesus, or (as seems far-fetched and improbable) from Jesse, the father of David. Epiphanius (u. s.) considers this name earlier than that of "Christian."

Another such name was (b) γνωστικοί, applied to Christians by Clement of Alexandria (Strom.
i. p. 294; ii. p. 383; vi. p. 665; vii. p. 748) as having the true knowledge. Later we find Athanasius (ap. Socrat. Hist. Eccl. iv. 23) using the term of the Ascetics of Egypt, and Socrates (ibid.) tells us that Evagrius Ponticus wrote a book for the use of these Ascetics, called "The Gnostic, or Rules for the Contemplative Life."

(c) Θεοφόροι, a name claimed by Ignatius in his interview with Trajan (Acta Ignat. ap. Grabe, Spicil. t. ii. p. 10), because he "carried Christ in his heart," and seemingly conceded especially to him, was commonly used of all Christians, as Pearson (Vind. Ignat. par. ii. c. 12, p. 397) shows by quotations from many writers of the 2nd century.

Clement of Alexandria, agreeing about the meaning of the name, gives the varieties of it Θεοφορών and Θεοφορούμενος, and Eusebius (viii.
10) quotes a letter of Phileas, bishop of Thmuis, to his flock, in which he calls the martyrs Χρισ- τοφόροι.

(d) St. Ambrose (de obit. Valentin. t. iii. p. 12) speaks of Christians as Christi, i. e. "anointed," and justifies his use of the title by reference to Ps. cv. 15, "nolite tangere Christos meos," all Christians receiving the unction of the Holy Spirit, and Jerome commenting on the passage (Ps. civ. [cv.]), justifies it by the same reference.

(e) The name Ecclesiastici was used within the Christian body (Bingham, i. 1, § 8) to distinguish the clergy from the laity, and with a modification of this meaning of the word Eusebius
(iv. 7) speaks of "ecclesiastical writers;" and it was also used of Christians generally in contrast to those who did not belong to the ἐκκλησία, as Jews, infidels, and heretics. Bingham quotes
Eusebius (iv. 7, v. 27), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 15, n. 4), as employing the word in this sense, and Valesius (not in Euseb. i. ii. c. 25) finds the same use of it in "Origen, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others" [ECCLESIASTICUS].

(f) Bingham asserts that Christians were called οἱ τοῦ δόγματος, "They of the Faith," giving as his authority for this statement the rescript of Aurelian against Paul of Samosata, quoted by Eusebius (vii. 30), in which the bishops of Rome and of Italy are called ἐπί-σκοποι τοῦ δόγματος.

(g) Christians also called themselves CATHOLICI [see the word]; and (h) Pisciculi, alluding to the mystic Fish [BAPTISM, p. 171; FISH].

It is to be observed, says Bingham (i. 1, § 6) that all these names express some relation to God or to Christ, and that none of them were taken from the names of men, as was the case with the heresies and sects. He quotes Chrysostom (Hom. 33 in Act.), Epiphanius (Haer. 42.
Marcionit., also Haer. 10.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 31, p. 506) and others as noticing these opposite tendencies. The name of Christian was neglected by the heretics for the names of their leaders, while the Christians thought it enough without any other title derived from parents, country, city, quality, or occupation; see the case of the deacon Sanctus martyred in the reign of Antoninus, related by Eusebius (v. 1).

II. Among the names given to Christians from without their body are probably to be reckoned

(1) Χρῆστοι, a name which would easily arise from a misunderstanding or mispronunciation of the name Χριστοί, and was naturally not refused by Christians; referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 4), Lactantius (Inst. iv. 7), Tertullian (Apol. c. 3), and others.

(2) It was quite to be expected that they would be called Jews by the heathen world, and there is evidence of this. Bingham (i. 1, § 10) refers to a passage in Dio's Life of Domitian, in which he speaks of the Christian martyr Ocilius Glabrio (Baronius, an. 94, § 1), being put to death for turning to the Jews' religion.

Again, Suetonius says (Claud. c. 26) that Claudius "expelled the Jews from Rome because they made disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus;" and Spartianus (in Caracal. c. i.) says that Caracalla's playfellow was a Jew, Caracalla, according to Tertullian (ad Scapul. c. 4), having been "lacte Christiano educatus."

(3) There remains to be considered the word Christian, a name which differs from those already spoken of in being traceable to a particular locality, and with great probability to a particular year. The reason why the name arose when and where it did, is probably to be found in the long stay—"a whole year"—(Acts xi. 26) made in Antioch by Paul and Barnabas after their return from Tarsus, in the assembly of the church there for the same time, and in the publicity given to the teaching of Christ by frequent addresses to the people.

The question whether the Christians assumed the name themselves or received it from the Jews, or from the Gentiles, can only be determined with an approach to certainty.

(a) The only reason for thinking that the Christians assumed this name is the language of Acts xi. 26, χρηματίσαι τε πρῶτον ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τοὺς μαθητὰς Χριστιανούς, because χρηματίζω, when used of acquiring a name generally means to assume one; but on the other hand, both in the Acts and in the Epistles, Christians speak of themselves as "brethren," "believers," "disciples," "saints," and only in three places in the N.T. is the word Christian used (Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Peter iv. 16), in only one of which, and there doubtfully, is the word used by Christians of themselves.

(b) Nor is it likely that the Jews would give them a name which would virtually concede the claim made by Christians, and so strenuously denied by Jews. For "Christ" being the Greek equivalent of "Messiah," to call the followers of Christ "Christians" would be to acknowledge Christ as the Messiah; nor would they have used so sacred a name in derision even for the sake of insulting a despised and hated sect. When they wanted to designate them, they used a name derived from a place they held in contempt (John i. 46, vii. 41; Luke xiii. 2), and called St. Paul "a ringleader of the sect of the 'Nazarenes'" (Acts xxiv. 5).

(c) But it is not unlikely that the Gentiles, seeing the wide aim of this new community, its readiness to admit all sorts of people, and even to dispense with the rite of circumcision in its converts, should have early come to distinguish it from the sects of the Jews, with which they very naturally at first confounded it, and so should have attached to it a new name. And this probability is increased when we remember that "Christ" was the title of the head of the new sect, represented his peculiar office to them, and was the name by which he was generally known in their letters and conversation. It would be adopted, of course, by the Gentiles from them, as we know it was (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44), and in a city like Antioch, "notorious for inventing names of derision, and for turning its wit into channels of ridicule" (cf. Procopius, Bell. Pers. ii. 8, quoted by Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 130), the new society would soon get its name. The form of the word indicates its Roman origin (cf. Sullani, Pompeiani, and later Othoniani and Vitelliani), and that it was first used as a term of reproach may be gathered from the use made of it by Tacitus in the passage referred to above, "quos per flagitia invisos vulgus Christianos appellabat." The great increase in the number of Gentile converts would soon turn what was at first a nickname into a title of honour, and the predominance of Rome in the world naturally made the Roman name what it has become, the universal one. It is interesting to contrast with "Christian" the name "Jesuit," as unlike the other in its comparatively modern date and Greek form as in its history and significance.

See Conybeare and Howson (vol. i. p. 129 ff.), from whom this note on the word Christian is derived.

[E. C. H.]

III. The following names were appellations of scorn, or "nick-names," given to Christians by their enemies.

1. That they should be called Atheists was inevitable in an empire in which the vulgar at least knew of no gods that could not be represented by art and man's device. And Atheism was in fact a common charge against them. See Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. c. 3) and Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 6). "Down with the Atheists" (αἶρε τοὺς ἀθεοὺς) was a mob-cry against the Christians (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 6).

2. From the time that Christians were first recognised as a sect, they were contemptuously called Nazarenes (Acts xxiv. 5; Epiphanius, Hæres. 29, c. 1; Jerome on Isaiah XLIX.; Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 25). This no doubt at first designated the supposed origin of the Lord and the disciples from Nazareth; but the variety of ways in which the word is written (Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαράοι, Ναζωραῖοι, Ναζηραῖοι, Ναζιραῖοι) seems to show that in later times various senses were attached to it. It was also, perhaps, sometimes used to designate a sect of Judaizing Christians, rather than the whole body of the church.

3. The name Galilæi was one which the philosophic emperor Julian (Epist. 7) endeavoured to fix upon the Christians (see Gregory Nazianz., Orat. iii. p. 81; Socrates, H. E. iii. 12), meaning, no doubt, to express the contempt of a cultivated man for a sect which arose in a despised district of Palestine, among shepherds and fishermen. His last words were, according to Theodoret (H. E. iii. 21), νενίκηκας, Γαλιλαῖε, "Thou hast conquered, O Galilaean!" Cyril of Alexandria (c. Julian. iii. p. 39) sets himself to show that the name "Galilaean," if it implied roughness and want of culture, was no more applicable to Christians than to Julian and his friends (Gibbon's Rome, ch. 23; iii. 162, ed. Smith).

4. Graecus, Graeculus. It was probably with reference to the falseness and want of principle attributed to the Greeks, in the days of the empire, that Christians came to be called "Greeks," that is, impostors. The Christian in the streets was saluted with the cry, ὁ Γραικὸς ἐπιθέτης (Jerome, Epist. 10, ad Furan.). If his tunic was not white, he was "impostor et Graecus" (Ib. Epist. 19, ad Marcell.). The recognising a Christian by the want of the "tunica alba," perhaps indicates a time when the ALB had become with them almost wholly a ministerial dress.

5. Sybillists was an appellation given to Christians by Celsus (Origen c. Cels. bk. v. p. 272, Spencer). The early Christians did in fact pay great respect to the Sibylline books (Tertullian, ad Nationes, ii. 12), and discovered in them clear prophecies of Christ. Celsus accused them of having interpolated these books.

6. From peculiarities, or supposed peculiarities, of their worship, they were called cross-worshippers, σταυρόλατραι, or Crucicolae, a reproach as old as the days of St. Paul, often repeated (Tertul. Apol. 16 and Ad Nat. i. 7, 12), and from which they were not slow to vindicate themselves (Minucius Fel. Oct. 29). Whether Christians in general, or a sect of them, were called οὐρανολάτραι, Coelicolae, sky-worshippers, seems somewhat doubtful; and the same may be said of Hypsiastarii. That they were called Sun-worshippers and Ass-worshippers is certain. [ASINARI; CALUMNIES AGAINST CHRISTIANS.]

7. The miracles of the early church procured Christians the reputation of being Magicians. [MAGIC.] Hence Suetonius (Nero, c. 16) calls Christians "gens hominum superstitionis maleficae," a set devoted to the black art. The steadfast endurance of torture was often thought the effect of some charm. Asclepiades (Prudentius, Peristeph. xii. 868), ascribed to magic the endurance of Romanus the martyr; and St. Ambrose (Serm. 90, in Agnem) mentions that the crowd shrieked against her, "Tolle magam! tolle maleficam!"

8. Several nick-names were given by the heathen to the Christians in consequence of their inexplicable endurance of martyrdom. They were βιοθάνατοι, as dying violent deaths, often, as it seemed, little better than suicides. They were Parabolani (παράβολάνοι) and Desperati, as freely risking their lives. They were Sarmentitii, from the faggots (sarmenta) which consumed them; and Semiixii, from the stake (semiaxis) to which they were bound. (Tertul. Apol. 50). They were Cinerarii, from the respect which they paid to the ashes of their martyrs.

(Bingham's Antiq. i. ii.; Augusti's Handbuch der Christl. Archäol. II. i.) [C.]

FALDESTOLIUM, or FALDISTORIUM. The first form of this word points to its true etymology and signification. It is connected with the German falde, "to fold," and stuhl, "a chair," and indicates a folding-chair, "sella plicatilis," answering to our modern "campstool" (Muratori, tom. iii. p. 646, not. 18). A false etymology, often given, "fandistolum quasi fandi locus" is at variance with its use, and would better apply to a pulpit. Faldistorium originally employed for any portable seat, became limited in ecclesiastical use to a low armless folding-chair, in which a bishop or mitred abbot sat at the altar after his enthronisation, or on other solemn occasions, offered himself to the gaze of the people in his full official attire. According to Maeri (s. v.) it was also placed at the epistle corner of the altar for the bishop, when celebrating in a church in which he had no jurisdiction, or if a superior dignitary was present (Maeri, Hierolex. s. v.; Ducange, s. v.; Augusti, Hdbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 556). [E. V.]

FALSE WITNESS. [PERJURY.]

FAMILY. The influence of the Christian religion upon the customs and habits of family life was very considerable, even from the first; although it did not aim at making any abrupt or sudden changes, except in those things which were necessarily sinful.

The great Christian doctrines which so powerfully affect the feelings, hopes, and whole inner life of those who heartily receive them, led at once to the renunciation of idolatry in all its forms, and of the excesses and licentiousnesses then so common and so little thought of; and inculcated new principles of thought and action, which operated more or less powerfully in every direction. But the ordinary usages of domestic life, which were not directly connected with the religious and moral obliquities of the old polytheism, were apparently left untouched by any positive interference or command. Christianity proved itself the salt of the earth by gradually interpenetrating the surrounding mass of pagan civilisation, and not by shrinking from all contact with it.

The elevation of the female sex was one of the most conspicuous of the indirect results which rapidly followed the reception of the new religion. The position of women among the Jews, and the manner in which Jesus had received them as his disciples and friends, must have taught the apostles, if they needed any such teaching, what place women were entitled to hold in the social economy of the church. And accordingly, wherever Christ was proclaimed, women were invited and welcomed into the Christian communities, and were admitted equally with men to all Christian privileges. Hence in a Christian family the wife and mother held an honourable place; and the conjugal union, the source of all other family relationships, being thus honoured, communicated a happy influence throughout the household.

Another result, only less important than the former, was the amelioration, and, in the course of time, the abolition of slavery. Apostolic Christianity did not endeavour to remove this nefarious but inveterate evil by any direct or violent denunciation, which, if successful, would have rudely upset the existing framework of society, and would have proved as ruinous to the slave, as it would have seemed to be unjust to the master; but it distinctly taught the equality of all men in Christian privilege and religious position;—it taught most emphatically the duty of caring for others;—it taught the master that he had a Lord over him who was no respecter of persons, and the slave that he was Christ's freedman. And thus slavery in a Christian family was relieved from some of its most galling burdens. This happy change, however, it must be remembered, depended entirely upon the personal feeling and will of the master; for slavery was not legally and publicly alleviated to any great extent, until the time of Justinian, who did much to promote its extinction, after which it was gradually discontinued or changed to serfdom (Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 343, and Latin Christ. i. 391; and SLAVERY in this work). In the mean time Christians in general did not think it wrong to have bondmen in their service (Clem. Alex., Paedag. iii. 12).

But besides particular results of this nature, Christianity to some extent changed the general habits of men, and tended to make them more domestic and less public in their feelings and pursuits. More especially, while Christians were small communities separate and distinct from the general mass of the population, they felt it necessary to withdraw themselves in some degree from public affairs; they were less frequent in their attendance on courts of law; they could not, without scruples and repugnance, be present at many of the ordinary amusements and popular festivities, mixed up as they were with the idolatry and some of the worst moral abominations of paganism. Thus they were thrown back more upon the society of each other, and upon their own family life. And although afterwards, when the new religion became dominant, and was at length the religion of the people, the objections to public life greatly disappeared, the family life with its attractions and its virtues continued to maintain a wholesome influence, which has indeed never since been lost. (See Milman, Hist. Christ. iii. 134.)

But to look more closely at the family life of Christianity, it must be observed that the abnegation of idolatry caused a displacement of the household and hearth gods—the Penates and Lares of the Romans,—together with all family rites which savoured of idol worship, and a substitution of Christian observances in their stead. And as it seems to have been the custom of religious Romans to offer their prayers the first thing in the morning, in the Lararium, or household shrine (Lampridius, Alex. Sever. 29. 31); so family prayer, in which the different members of a Christian household joined, appears to have had its place from the beginning of the new religion. Such united prayer seems to be alluded to in the remark, "that your prayers be not hindered" (1 Pet. iii. 7). And Clement of Alexandria, at the end of the second century, testifies to the same thing when, commenting on the words, "where two or three are gathered together in my name," he says that the three mean a husband, a wife, and a child (ἄνδρα, καὶ γυναῖκα, καὶ τέκνον τοὺς τρεῖς λέγει, Stromat. iii. 10). And the same author speaks expressly of "prayer and reading of the Scriptures (εὐχὴ καὶ ἀνάγνωσις) in Christian families (Paedag. ii. 194).

It is evident from the words of Tertullian (ad Uxorem, ii. 4) and subsequently of Cyprian (De Lapsis, c. 26) that Christians were in the habit of taking home portions of the eucharistic bread, and eating a small piece of it every morning, as an act of devotion [EULOGIAE, p. 629].

The practice also of making the sign of the cross upon the forehead, to which at a later period so much efficacy was superstitiously ascribed, had become before the beginning of the third century a perpetually repeated ceremony in Christian families, being used "on getting up and going to bed, on putting on their clothes or their shoes, on walking out or sitting down, at table or at the bath;" in short in every act or movement of the day (see Tertullian de Cor. Mil. § 3). This little symbolical action may in the early times have been a useful memento to Christians in the midst of so many things of a contrary tendency, however much, like some other practices once innocent and salutary, it was subsequently used in the service of formalism and error. And the same desire of being constantly reminded of their Christian position led them to adorn their goblets with the figure of a shepherd carrying a lamb, and their seal-rings with a dove, an anchor, and other similar devices. (Neander, Hist. Christ. p. 399.)

Besides these there were other domestic observances which from time to time interested the piety as well as the natural affections of Christian households, especially those which were connected with the baptism of children, marriages, and funerals, more particularly noticed in separate articles [BAPTISM, CHILDREN, MARRIAGE, BURIAL]. Christians cherished the memory of departed relatives as those with whom they trusted to be reunited in rest and glory, and not unfrequently held family banquets over their remains in a room provided for that purpose [CELLA MEMORIAE].

But besides these festivals which were exclusively Christian, there were some celebrations of an older date, in which, as they were not mixed up with any idolatrous rites, Christian families might unite with their pagan neighbours, and which they might retain for their own use. Even Tertullian, who was so strict in forbidding all semblance of participation in idol worship, saw no objection to Christians joining in the domestic ceremony of "putting on the toga virilis," which corresponded with our "coming of age," or to their being present at weddings, or the "naming of children" (Nominalia or Dies lustrici; Tertul. de Idolol. 16).

As the facility of divorce was a primary principle of corruption in Roman social and family life; so Christianity, having invested marriage with a religious sanctity, and not allowing divorcement under any circumstances, except those mentioned by Christ himself, drew more closely together not only the husband and wife, but all other members of the family.

The relationship between parents and children was greatly influenced for good. The barbarous practice of infanticide, which prevailed among the Greeks and Romans, was immediately discontinued. Under the old Roman law parents might at any time put their children to death, or sell them as slaves; but this severity was at once voluntarily softened in Christian families; and the power was afterwards taken away by Christian emperors; who further directed that in cases of great poverty, when parents might be tempted to sell their children, relief might be given them out of the public revenues, thus affording an example of an incipient poor-law (Cod. Theod. vi. 27, in Bingham, xvi. ix. 1).

Parental authority, however, and family ties were strongly upheld. Children were not allowed to marry without the consent of their parents (Tertul. ad Uxor. ii. 9), and, under the Christian emperors, in the case of daughters thus marrying, the most dreadful punishments were ordered to be inflicted on all who were consenting parties to the marriage (Cod. Theod. ix. 24).

The education of their children assumed a new interest with Christian parents, but at the same time caused them new anxieties and cares; since in "bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," it was needful, more especially in the earlier times, to guard them from the evil influences in the midst of which they lived,—from the contact of idolatry all around them,—from the contagion of companions on every side. Further difficulties too presented themselves in connection with the future occupation of their children, inasmuch as many employments open to others were closed against them. For a Christian had to avoid all the numerous trades and arts which were connected with idols and idol-worship, together with some offices of civil and military life.

While children were young their superintendence and education engaged especially the mother's care and vigilance; but besides this and other strictly domestic duties, it was usual for Christian women to devote a portion of their time to doing good beyond their own homes; and Tertullian shows that in his days it was expected, as a matter of course, that they would attend on the sick, go round to the houses of the poor, relieve the needy, and visit imprisoned martyrs (Tertul. ad Uxor. ii. 4).

One source of uneasiness was, it must be confessed, introduced into the household in Christian times, which had not existed previously. After the institution of monastic orders, a husband, a wife, or a child might desire to adopt the "religious" life, even without the consent of those who had a claim upon their services and society. Where the persons interested consented, as in the cases of Ammon and his wife (Socrates, H. E. iv. 23; Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca. c. 8), and of Martianus and Maxima (Victor Uticensis [or Vitenis], De Persec. Vandal. i. 5), no harm was done; but in many cases monastic fanaticism disturbed the peace of households and sundered their members. It is evident from the references to the matter (for instance) by Paulinus (Epist. 14, ad Celant.) and Augustine (Epist. 45 [al. 127], Armentario et Paulinae; Epist. 199 [al. 262], ad Ecdiciam), that in the 4th century the question of the relative claims of domestic duty and ascetic life was felt to be a pressing one. Basil the Great in the Larger Rule (Qu. 12) directs that a married person offering to enter a monastery should be questioned as to the consent of the other party; yet he thinks that the precept about hating father, mother, wife, or children to be Christ's disciple (Luke xiv. 26) applies to this case; and in another place (Epist. 45, ad Monachum Lapsun) he certainly mentions a man's declining domestic cares and the society of his yoke-fellow, for an ascetic life, without the smallest censure. Jerome (Epist. 14, ad Heliod.) expresses similar views. The feeling of the church on this subject was distinctly pronounced in the 6th century, for the legislation of Justinian (Codex, lib. i. tit. 3, De Episc. et Cler. leg. 53) allowed married persons to desert their yoke-fellows for "religion" with impunity, and to reclaim their own fortunes. So in the case of children. The council of Gangra in the 4th century (c. 16) anathematized children—especially children of Christians—who should withdraw from their parents on pretence of religion (Θεοσεβείας) and refuse them due honour. So Basil (Reg. Maj. qu. 15) enjoined that children should not be received into monasteries unless offered by their parents, if the parents were alive. But here again the legislation of Justinian (u. s. leg. 55) betrays the presence of a feeling that "religion" might override domestic obligations, in that it forbids parents to restrain their children from becoming monks or clerics, or to disinherit them for that cause alone. And this feeling, in spite of the not unfrequent protests of jurists, was very prevalent from that time onward. On the other hand, the power of parents to devote their children to "religion" became in time almost absolute; they who had been devoted by their parents were as much bound as those who had entered of their own accord in mature age (Conc. Tolet. IV. c. 49, A.D. 633; see OBLATI).

In our view of the family life of Christians, their use of music and singing must not be unnoticed. Among the Greeks especially, and to some extent among the Romans also, their songs occupied a conspicuous place in their social life. These, however, from their generally expressing and encouraging some of the worst evils of the old religions, could not be used in the Christian family circle. But the want was rapidly supplied. Christian songs and hymns were soon composed and extensively multiplied; and these became an abundant source of recreation to all the members of the household, while at meal times, and in all family or friendly unions, they thus expressed their habitual faith, and hope, and joy.

Before Christianity became the prevailing and established religion, families were in continual danger of being molested by popular violence, and of being utterly broken up in times of legalised persecution. But besides these dangers and troubles there were sometimes others hardly less painful within the family itself, when only a part of the household had become Christians. The antagonism and consequent discomfort, if not positive misery, must then have been almost perpetual; and the difficulty of maintaining religious faithfulness, without losing family affection or breaking family ties, must have been very great. Jesus himself had warned his disciples beforehand that "a man's foes might be those of his own household;" and that his religion, in such cases, might bring "not peace but a sword." St. Paul, while desirous that this difference of religion should not actually separate a husband and wife, admitted that it would and must sometimes have this effect. Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii. 4) describes in detail the sort of hindrances, opposition, and ridicule, which a Christian woman must expect if she married a husband who was an unbeliever; and how impossible she would find it to fulfil in peace, if she could fulfil at all, her Christian duties,—even if nothing worse occurred. But in times of persecution, or of any strong excitement of antichristian feeling, it was not merely difficulties and discomforts that had to be encountered. The strongest words of Christ were then often literally realised, when the most powerful natural affections were shattered, and Christians were betrayed and denounced by their nearest relatives and given up to the persecutor's sword. See an early instance of this in Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 2. [G. A. J.]

FAMILY—THE HOLY. The subject which bears this title in modern art is generally a group consisting of the Virgin Mother bearing the Sacred Infant, of St. Joseph, and frequently of the younger St. John Baptist, and occasionally of St. Elizabeth. It is frequently treated in an academic or purely artistic spirit, and chosen mainly for the sake of opposing the age of St. Elizabeth or maturity of St. Joseph, to the high ideal of feminine, infantine, or youthful beauty in the Blessed Virgin, the infant or St. John. As a complete and isolated group of this kind the subject is hardly ever treated in art of the earliest Christian age, unless the three Oranti given by Martigny (from Bosio Roma Sott. p. 279; see woodcut) are to be considered as representing it. He is inclined to think so, though Bosio, Aringhi, and Bottari consider the group as an ordinary Christian family in the attitude of prayer, and though the boy is more decidedly in that attitude than either the father or the mother. He mentions another lately discovered, but also somewhat conjectural monument, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and says that the subject, occurs on sarcophagi of the South of France, naming one in the museum of Arles, No. 26, where St. Joseph leads the Saviour by the hand to the Virgin Mother, probably representing Luke ii. 48, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" FAN. [FLABELLUM.]

FANATICI. From their frequenting Fana, shrines of heathen deities, all heathen were sometimes called "fanatici"; thus Clovis before his conversion, 's said (Gesta Reg. Franc. c. 10), to have been "fanaticus et paganus." In a special sense, priests of idol-temples were "fanatici" (Iso Magister on Prudentius, quoted by Ducange, s.v.); and those who professed to prophesy by the aid of the demon attached to the place [EXORCISM; and see Jerome on Isaiah,

c. 6, and Augustine on Psalm 40]; these were condemned with others who practised such evil arts (Code, lib. ix. tit. 16, l. 4; Macri, Hierolex. s. v.; Bingham's Ant. xvi. v. 4). [C.]

FANDILA, presbyter, martyr at Cordova; commemorated June 13 (Mart. Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

FANON. (1.) A head-dress worn by the pope when he celebrated mass pontifically. It is described by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. 239) and Macri (Hierolex. s. v.) as a veil variegated, like the Mosaic ephod, with four colours, symbolising the four elements, put over the head after the pope was vested with the alb, and tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, the tiara or other head-dress being put on above it. The lower part was concealed by the planeta (Bona, Rev. Liturg. i. 24. 15). Ciampini gives the annexed figure from a small brass statue on the doors of the oratory of St. John Baptist at the Lateran. At the Pedilavium the "Caerimoniale Romanum" directs that the pope should wear the fanon alone without the mitre.

(2.) The napkin or handkerchief, mappula, sudarium, used by the priest during the celebration of the mass to wipe away perspiration from the face, &c. (Bona, Rev. Liturg. i. 24. 5; Rab. Maur. de Inst. Cler. i. 18; Augusti, Handbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 504). [FACITERGIUM.]

(3.) In later times the white linen cloth in which the laity made their oblations at the altar. "Populus dat oblationes suas, id est panem et vinum, et offerunt cum fanonibus candidis," Ordo Romanus; "cum fanonibus offerunt," Amalar. de offic. Miss.; Martene, de Eccl. rit. lib. i. c. 4, § 6; Augusti, u. s. ii. 649. The word is sometimes erroneously spelt "favones."

(4.) A still later use of the word is for the church banners, "vexilla Ecclesiastica," employed in processions. This is perhaps not earlier than the French and German writers of the 11th century (Augusti, u. s. iii. 348, 355).

(5.) The strings or lappets of the mitre (Willem, Monuments inédits. pls. 68, 76, 90) [E. V.]

FARA, virgin, of Meaux; "Natalis" Dec. 7 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FAST OF CHRIST IN THE DESERT. THE, is commemorated in the Aethiopic Calendar on Feb. 4 (Daniel's Codex, iv. 252). [C.]

FASTING (νηστεία, jejunium, abstinentia). Fasting was total or partial abstinence from food for a certain period; it also signified abstinence from pleasure, or from the celebration of birthdays or marriages or church festivals; and it had the further spiritual signification of abstinence from sin. See the passages collected in Gunning (Lent Fast, pp. 130-150) on the spiritual meaning of fasting.

1. The stated fasts of the Western church were these:

(i.) The great ante-paschal Fast of LENT (Quadragesima).

(ii.) The fasts of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, called also EMBER FASTS, or the fasts of the four seasons (Jejunia quatuor temporum).

(iii.) The weekly fasts of the STATIONS, Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta, stationes, semijejunia, τερὰς καὶ παρασκευή).

(iv.) The ROGATIONS (rogationes, litaniae).

(v.) The Vigils or Eves of holy days (pernoctationes, pervigilia).

2. The Greek church kept in addition to Lent three fasts of a week each: 1st the Fast of the Holy Apostles, immediately after Pentecost [APOSTLES' FESTIVALS AND FASTS]; 2nd the Fast of the Holy Mother of God (Sanctae Deiparae) in August; 3rd the Fast of the Nativity (Suicer Thesaurus s. v. νηστεία; Neale Introduction to Eastern Church, p. 731). Some have supposed (Morinus de Penit., Appendix, p. 124) that the Fast Sanctae Deiparae at one period lasted forty days, and began originally on 6th of July and afterwards on 1st of August, and that the Fast of the Nativity was also one of forty days, and began on 15th of November.

3. Other fasts had only a local or partial observance. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) introduced into Spain fasts of superposition (jejuniorum superpositiones) for every month in the year except July and August. It does not appear on what days of the month they were kept, but their name implies that they were something over and above the usual fasting days. Bingham (Antiq. xxi. 11 § 5) quotes from Philastrius the mention of a fast of three days before Epiphany. In the Dialogue of Egbert of York (Haddan and Stubbs' Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 413) there is the appointment, in addition to the Ember fasts, of a period of twelve days before the Nativity to be spent in fastings, watchings, prayers, and alms; on which twelve days not only were the clergy but laity also, with their wives and households, exhorted to resort to their confessors. The seventeenth council of Toledo A.D. 694 (c. 6) orders litany-fasts (exomologeses) to be kept every month in the Spanish and Gallic churches to supplicate "for the safety of the sovereign, for the preservation of the people, and the pardon of their sins, and the expulsion of the devil from the hearts of the faithful." The fasts to be observed throughout the year in the western monasteries are given in detail by the second council of Tours (A.D. 567, c. 17): "From Easter to Pentecost let dinner be served to the brothers every day except on Rogation-days; after Pentecost let them fast an entire week; thence till the 1st of August let all, except those who are suffering from illness, fast three days a week, second, fourth, and sixth days. In August because the Missa Sanctorum is daily celebrated, let them eat their dinner; through the whole of September, October, and November, fast three days a week, and in December every day till the Nativity. And because between the Nativity and the Epiphany all days are festivals, with the exception of the three when private litanies are to be said, they shall eat their dinner; and from Epiphany to Lent fast three days a week."

4. Special fasting was occasionally ordered or advised in a diocese by the bishop, as Tertullian (de Jejun. c. 13), after he became a Montanist unwillingly bears witness. It was also one of the means used for preparing for the reception of a sacred ordinance. Fasting before Holy Communion, if not invariable, had become a common practice in the 4th century [COMMUNION]. Fasting before baptism can be traced to a much earlier date. Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 61) mentions among the customs of the Christian church that candidates "are taught to pray fasting, we fasting and praying with them." Tertullian (de Bapt. c. 20) exhorts those who are about to receive baptism to pray with frequent prayers and fastings. And the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 85), appoints abstinence from wine and meat among the preparations for baptism (Apost. Constt. vii. 22). The only authority which Martene (de Rit. viii. 4) discovers for the practice of fasting before ordination is from Leo, who (Ep. ad Diosc.) with reference to ordinations taking place on Sunday, speaks of the Saturday's fast continuing both for candidates and bishop till the ordination was over. No notice of fasting before confirmation is to be found before the 13th century (Martene de Rit. iv. 1).

5. Penitential Fasting.—For the first 500 years fasting does not appear to have been imposed as a special penance, or to have taken place of other penitential exercises; but in all ages, so long as penitential discipline was in force, a penitent was required to abstain from delicacies of food as from all other bodily gratifications during his period of punishment. Tertullian (de Penit. c. 9) defines a true exomologesis to consist, among other duties, in "the use of simple things for meat and drink, and in cherishing prayer by fasts." Pacian (Paraen. ad Penit. c. 19) makes his penitent, when invited to a feast, reply, "These things belong to the happy, but as for me I have sinned against the Lord." In the 6th century fasting began to be inflicted as a special and separate mode of penance. One of the canons of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 60), appoints to those who lapse into heresy, in place of the longer term of penitence allotted by the early church, a fast of two years, to be kept on the third day of the week without any break; if at least that is the meaning of the rather obscure language of the canon (ut biennio tertio sine relaxatione jejunent). The penance of fasting is found in the early British penitential canons attributed to Gildas; and in the Penitential of Theodore sentences of a fast of so many days or weeks, or even years, are very common (Penitential I. viii. 3, 4, 8, 9; xii. 8; xiv. 9), and no less so in the Penitential of Bede (iii. 5; vii. 11), and in that of Egbert (iv. 6; v. 3; xiii. 4). The crimes for which these sentences were inflicted in these early English penitential books are such as could exist only among a people just emerging from heathenism. In the Penitential of Theodore (II. xiv. i.) is found the first notice of the appointment of three regular fasts of forty days in the year (tria legitima quadragesima), forty days before Easter, forty days before the Nativity, and forty days after Pentecost. The Rule of Chrodegang (c. 32) with reference to the same observance, orders confessions to be made at each of these three annual quadragesimal fasts. And the Capitularies of Charles the Great (vi. 184) repeat in identical words the injunction of Theodore on the three quadragesimal fasts, and add that "although some of them lack canonical authority, yet it is well for all of us together to observe this custom in accordance with the practice of the people and of our forefathers." These fasts were probably first appointed as appropriate penitential seasons for the performance of long periods of penance; afterwards, as may be inferred from the canon in the Capitularies, they came into partial use with the people at large. There is no evidence that they existed earlier than the 7th century, for the councils prior to Theodore which are strict in ordering the people to keep Lent (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 12; 4 Conc. Aurelian. c. 2), contain no hint of there being more than one such season in the year; and the canon of the second council of Tours which enumerates the fasts of the monks, and approaches nearer the time of Theodore, evidently recognises no Pentecostal Quadragesima, for it orders monks, whose self-denial would be more severe than that of the rest of the church, to fast only three days a week from Pentecost till August. Hence it is probable that Theodore introduced these as penitential fasts into the Western church from the East, for in the Greek Penitential of Joannes Jejunator two fasts of forty days in addition to Lent are imposed upon penitents, the former of which was called the Quadragesima of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the latter the Quadragesima of St. Philip. One of the councils of the Carolingian kings, about A.D. 821 (Conc. apud villam Theodonis cc. 2-5) held for the purpose of devising means for the protection of the clergy, inflicts five quadragesimal fasts on any one slandering or wounding a sub-deacon, six on the slanderer of a deacon, twelve of a priest, and a lifelong fast on the slanderer of a bishop. Even after absolution, a penitent was sometimes ordered to fast one day a week for the remainder of his life—a sentence opposed to the earlier practice, by which admission to communion was a sign of the forgiveness of all past offences.

The penitential fasts were observed with various degrees of severity. In the East the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator allows penitents on the second, fourth, and sixth days of the week to eat oil and beans with oil, but orders them to abstain from cheese, eggs, flesh, and fish; on the third and fifth days eat everything freely except flesh; and on the first and seventh days use wine and flesh as if under no punishment. In the Anglo-Saxon church Egbert (Penitential iv. 15) directs penitents to fast three days each week, without specifying the days, from wine, mead (medo), and flesh, till the evening, and eat only dry food; and also keep three quadragesimal fasts in the year on dry food, two days a week till the evening, and three days till three o'clock. Burchard (Decret. xix. 9, 10) referring to this direction from the Penitential, states the following to have been the manner in which a fast of two years on bread and water was kept. "For first year fast three days in each week, second, fourth, and sixth, on bread and water; and three days, third, fifth, and seventh, abstain from wine, mead (medo), beer flavoured with honey (mellita cervisia) flesh and blood, cheese, eggs, and rich fish of various sorts, and eat only small fish if they are to be got, but if not, fish of one kind only, and beans, and herbs, and apples, and drink beer." This list makes no mention of Lent, because it is assumed to be spent entirely on bread and water. "The next year the penitent should fast two days, second and fourth, till the evening, and then refresh himself with dry food, i.e. bread and dry cooked beans, or apples, or raw herbs; let him select one of these three, and drink beer sparingly; on the sixth day let him fast on bread and water." In some cases no additional time of abstinence was imposed, but only a greater rigour during the ordinary ecclesiastical fasts. A very old sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to the 8th century, directs the actual incarceration of a penitent through Lent; "Take him in the morning of the first day of Lent and cover him with ashes, and pray for him, and shut him up till the Thursday of Holy Week (feria quinta in coena Domini), and on the Thursday of Holy Week he may come forth from the place in which he has performed his penance." A Gothic codex from the monastery of Remigius of Rheims, dating probably from the next century, also orders imprisonment through Lent, but instead of the whole body of the penitent being covered with ashes, directs that a few should be sprinkled on his head, and that they should be blessed. This severity was relaxed before the 10th century, and penitents were assigned a parish or district in which to confine themselves through Lent. But both incarceration and confinement within bounds were deviations from an older practice of shutting up a penitent in a monastery (1 Conc. Matiscon. cc. 5, 8).

6. Exemptions from Fasting.—A superstitious abstinence from flesh and wine on pretence of keeping a stricter fast was forbidden. The Apostolical Canons (cc. 52, 53) direct that if any of the clergy abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise, but abhorrence, forgetting that God made all things very good, they shall be deposed (Conc. Ancy. c. 14; Conc. Gangr. c. 2). The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 14), orders, under pain of excommunication, clergy who have been in the habit of abstaining from meat, to eat vegetables boiled with meat, in order to avoid the suspicion of being infected with the Priscillian heresy.

Fasting was strictly forbidden on all Sundays throughout the year in every part of the church. The reason of this prohibition was that fasting was held inconsistent with the observance of so high a festival. [LORD'S DAY.]

The observance of Saturday was, as is well known, one of the points in dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. In the East it was always observed as a festival, with the exception of the Paschal Vigil, the Great Sabbath, in which Christ lay in the grave, which was kept as a fast both in East and West (Apost. Const. ii. 59; v. 15, 20; vii. 23; viii. 33; Conc. Laod. cc. 49, 51; Conc. in Trull. c. 55). [SABBATH.]

It was not customary to fast on any festivals, nor consequently to hold festivals during seasons of fasting. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (c. 51), forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, but orders them to be kept on Saturdays and Sundays. Another canon (c. 52) forbids the celebration of marriages or birthdays in Lent. The Greek church held no festival through Lent except the Annunciation, a festival which the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656 (c. 1), ordered to be held eight days before Christmas. [MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] The church at Milan held no missa sanctorum whatever throughout Lent.

The non-observance of a fast was permitted in the case of weakness or sickness (Apost. Can. 68, 2 Conc. Turon. c. 17). To these grounds of excuse the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653 (c. 9), adds old age or strong necessity. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) had allowed the Spanish churches to omit the monthly fasts in the sultry heat of July and August.

7. Manner of Fasting.—A fast day in the early church was kept by a literal abstinence from food till the evening, and then a simple meal was eaten. Ambrose (de Elia et Jejun. c. 10) speaks of the fast during Lent continuing through the whole day; and Chrysostom (Hom. 6 in Gen. p. 60; Hom. 8 in Gen. p. 79) rebukes the folly of those who abstain all day from food and do not abstain from sin. There was no restriction upon the kind of food eaten at the evening meal, provided only it was partaken of sparingly. Many, no doubt, refused meat or wine during the greater fasts, and contented themselves with bread and water, Xerophagia (Tertullian de Jejun. c. 11); but that there was no settled rule, and that the choice of diet was left very much to individual discretion is evident from the account given by Socrates (H. E. v. 22) of the variety of the observances of the Western church; "some abstain from every sort of creature that has life; others eat fish only of living creatures; others eat birds as well as fish, because, according to the Mosaic account of the creation, they too sprung from the water; others abstain from fruit covered with a hard shell, and from eggs; some eat dry bread only, others not even that; others again when they have fasted till three o'clock eat varieties of food." The Greek church kept Lent very strictly, eating neither fish, nor eggs, nor milk, nor oil; but on the other fasts, except on the fourth and sixth days, these were allowed. The great Sabbath fast of the Paschal Vigil was sustained not only till the evening, but till cockcrow on Easter morning (Apost. Const. v. 18). But the other appointed seasons were kept with less rigour than that of Lent, and the fast, instead of continuing till the evening meal, was broken at the ninth hour (three o'clock), the hour on which our Lord expired on the cross. This was the hour at which the fast of the Stations ceased (Epiphanius Expos. Fid. c. 22). And the English council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 16), orders the Rogations to be kept till three o'clock. The food which was thus saved by abridging the number of meals it was considered a pious act to bestow upon the poor (Origen, Hom. 10. in Levit.; Leo, Serm. 3 de Jejun. Pentecost.; Chrysost. Serm. 8 de Jejun.). Another practice mentioned by Tertullian (de Orat. c. 18) was refraining from the kiss of peace while a fast lasted. A change of dress during fasting was confined chiefly to penitents [PENITENCE], although Tertullian (Apolog. c. 40), if his language is not merely rhetorical, speaks of pious Christians in contrast with heathen self-indulgence, "being dried up with fasting and prostrating themselves in sackcloth and ashes." And at a much later date the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 33), orders the greater Litany to be observed for three days by all Christians, "not riding nor clothed in rich garments, but barefoot and clothed in sackcloth and ashes." [G. M.]

8. Fast after Communion.—St. Chrysostom, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks as follows: "Before receiving thou fastest, that thou mayest by any means appear worthy of the communion. But when thou hast received, it being thy duty to persevere in self-control, thou undoest all. Not that sobriety before this and afterwards are of equal importance. For it is our duty, indeed, to exercise self-control at both times, but especially after receiving the Bridegroom; before this indeed that thou mayest be worthy to partake; but afterwards that thou mayest not be found unworthy of that of which thou hast partaken. What! Ought we to fast after partaking? I do not say so, nor do I use constraint. For indeed this also is good, but I am not enforcing it, only advising you not to be self-indulgent to excess" (Hom. xxvii. ad c. xi. v. 27.) We should infer from this passage that the hearers of St. Chrysostom neither had themselves, nor knew of, any custom of abstaining from ordinary food, for however short a time, after receiving the Holy Communion. Nor have we any evidence that his advice led to the formation of such a habit in the members of the Greek or Oriental churches. In the West, on the other hand, we meet with occasional notices of the practice from the 6th century downwards; and it is probable that it survived, as the pious custom of a few, to the 14th, or even later. A canon of the council of Mâcon held in 585 contains the earliest reference, if the writer mistake not, to this post-communion fast. We give the decree in full: "Whatever relics of the sacrifices shall be left over in the sacrum after the mass is finished, let innocent children be brought to the church on Wednesday or Friday by him whose business it is, and, let them, being enjoined a fast, receive the said relics sprinkled with wine" (Can. 6; Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 982). Among the Forged Decretals is an epistle purporting to be written by Clement of Rome to St. James the Lord's brother. The greater part of this epistle appears to have been composed in the 8th century, and in that earlier portion we find a direction to this effect, viz. that the remainder of the consecrated elements "is not to be kept till the morning, but is by the care of the clerks to be consumed with fear and trembling. But they who consume the remainder of the Lord's body, which has been left in the sacrum, are not to assemble forthwith to partake of common food, nor to presume to mix food with the holy portion . . . If therefore the Lord's portion be given to them at an early hour, let the ministers who have consumed it fast till the sixth; and if they have received it at the third or the fourth, let them fast till evening" (Præcepta S. Petri, inter Opp. S. Leonis, ed. Baller. tom. iii. p. 674). There is a law of Charlemagne, A.D. 809, with this heading, "Touching those who have communicated, that they wait three hours, on account of the mixing of the food." The decree itself says "two or three hours" (Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. i. col. 1213. Similarly col. 1224). Regino (De Eccl. Discipl. lib. 1. c. exev.) at the beginning of the 10th century, and Gratian (Decr. P. iii. Dist. ii. c. xliii.) in the 12th give the passage from pseudo-Clement as above quoted. It was therefore well known during the latter part of the Middle Ages. In the 13th century we find it cited from Gratian by Thomas Aquinas, who acknowledges the principle, while he declares the rule obsolete (Summa Theol. P. iii. Qu. lxxx. Art. viii. ad 6m). There is, however, as we have already intimated, some reason to think that the practice which Aquinas evidently considered altogether gone by was yet observed by some long after his time. In England John de Burgo, A.D. 1385, refers to our subject in this manner: "After taking the eucharist it is meet for reverence thereof to abstain for some time from food, but not very long. For preparation by abstinence and devotion is more required before receiving the eucharist than after. For the sacrament has its effect at the reception itself, and therefore actual devotion is required then; but after the reception habitual devotion suffices" (Pupilla Oculi, P. iv. c. viii. ad lit. H.). It is also thus mentioned by Duranti, who was murdered by the partisans of the League in 1589, "Not only ought men to be fasting when about to sacrifice and communicate, but they ought also in honour of the sacrament to abstain from all food some time after" (De Rit. Eccl. L. ii. c. vii. § 6.) [W. E. S.]

FATHER (Pater). 1. A name rhetorically given to the priests of any religion (Arnobius, Adv. Gent. lib. 4, c. 19).

2. Commonly applied to Christian bishops. Epiphanius (Hæres. Adv. Aërian. n. 4) says that the reason of the title is that by their right of ordaining they beget fathers to the church. Jerome (Ep. 52, ad Theoph. ed. Migne) says that bishops are content with their own honour, for they know that they are fathers and not lords. Augustine (Comm. in Ps. 44) says that the church itself calls them fathers. Chrysostom (Hom. 3, ad Pop. Antioch.) speaks of looking to the bishop's throne and not seeing the father upon it. The decrees of the council of Nice are usually cited as those of the 318 fathers (I. Conc. Nic. Proem.; I. Conc. Constantin. c. 1).

3. To a godfather. In the life of Epiphanius it is said that one Lucian became his father in holy baptism (Epiph. Vita. n. 8). So Rufinus (in Hieron. Invect. c. 1) says that the same person was his instructor in the creed and his father.

4. It is said that Charles Martel sent his son Pepin to Luitprand, king of the Lombards, who cut his hair according to custom, "juxta morem," and thus became his father, "ei pater effectus est" (Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Longobard. vi. 53).

5. To the priest by whom baptism was administered. Avitus of Vienne (Hom. de Rogat.), says that Mamertus was both his predecessor and his spiritual father by baptism, "spiritualis a baptismo pater." So (Theodori Cantuar. Poenitentiale, II. iv. 8) it is stated that one father is sufficient to administer baptism, "in catechumeno et confirmatione et baptismo unus potest esse pater."

6. To a confessor. One of the Benedictine rules provided that no monk should become a spiritual father without the consent of the abbot (Reg. Tarnat. A.D. circa 570; Migne's Patrol. t. 66, coll. 977).

7. The title "father of fathers" was sometimes assigned to eminent bishops. In one place it is given to the apostle Paul (Quæst. ad Orthodox. c. 119, apud Justin Mart. Opp.). Athanasius (ad Solitar. Vit. Agent. c. 1) speaks of Hosius as being by universal consent called the father of bishops. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 19; De Funeb. Patr. § 44) says that his father was called the father of all the bishops (ἀρχιεπείας). Gregory the Great (Epist. vi.) addresses Lupus of Troyes, as "father of fathers, bishop of bishops." In a letter from the African bishops which was read at the 1st Lateran council, at the close of the epistle, Theodore, bishop of Rome, is styled "father of fathers." In a letter read at the 6th council of Constantinople (Act 13), Sergius is addressed in the same manner. At the 2nd council of Nice, A.D. 787 (Act 6), Gregory Nyssen is said to have been called "father of fathers" by universal consent.

8. The head of a monastery was naturally called Pater by Latins, as Abbas by Orientals; thus Augustine (De Mor. Eccl. Cath. i. 31) speaks of the respect to be paid by the Decani to the one "quem Patrem appellant;" and Gregory the Great (Dial. i. 1; cf. ii. 3; iii. 23) speaks of one who was "Pater" in a monastery over 200 monks. FEET, WASHING OF. [BAPTISM, §§ 34, 67; MAUNDY THURSDAY.]

FEILIRE, THE, OF AENGUS THE CULDEE. The word Feilire, derived from "feil" the Irish equivalent of vigilia, is applied to the metrical festology composed by Aengus the Culdee about the year 780. It is the most ancient of five martyrologies belonging to Ireland. The others are (1.) The martyrology of Tamhlacht, which must have been written after 845. (2.) That of Maelmuire ua Gorman, dating from between 1156-1173. (3.) The Saltair na Rann, which, however, contains only four Gaelic entries; and (4.) The Kalendar of the Drummond Missal, published in Bishop Forbes' Kalendars of the Scottish saints.

Of the personal history of Aengus we know that he was educated in Cluain Ednach in Queen's County, and travelling into Munster founded Disert Aengusa in co. Limerick. At the time of the expedition of king Aedh Oirdnidhe against Leinster in 799 he was residing at Disert Bethnach near Monasterevin. Latterly he went to abbot Maelruain at Tamhlacht, when he from humility concealed his gifts, and passing himself as a serving man was entrusted with the charge of the mill and kiln, till at last his learning was discovered by accident.

The Feilire consists of three parts. 1. Five quatrains invoking a blessing on the poet and his work. 2. A preface of 220 quatrains; and 3. The festology itself in 365 quatrains for every day in the year (O'Curry, Early Eccl. MSS. of Ireland, pp. 359-371. [A. P. F.]

FEMORALIA or FEMINALIA. These are drawers or breeches covering the thighs and loins, as the derivation implies. (See Isidore Hispal. Etym. xix. 22.) They were an essential part of the dress of the Levitical priesthood (Ex. xxviii. 42, 43), and as such are often referred to by the fathers (see e. g. Jerome, Epist. 64, ad Fabiolam; i. 360, ed. Vallarsi), many of whom are delighted to find a symbolical meaning in this as in other vestments.

The injunction as to the wearing of breeches during divine service is repeated in sundry monastic rules. Thus the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara, when settling the dress to be worn by monks, permits the use of femoralia to all, but "maxime his qui ministerio implentur altaris" (Regula S. Fructuosi, c. 45: in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 139, ed. Paris, 1663; cf. Grimlaici Solitariorum Regula, c. 49; op. cit. p. 341). For general rules as to this and other articles of monastic dress see Magistri Regula, c. 81 (op. cit. p. 257). The Rule of St. Benedict enjoins that monks who were going on a journey should borrow femoralia from the Vestiarium, and on their return should restore them thither washed:—"femoralia, ii qui diriguntur in via, de Vestuario accipiant, qui revertentes lota ibi restituant" (c. 55; p. 117, ed. Venice, 1723). For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv., and Menard's note to the Concordia Regularum (Patrol. ciii. 1235).

FENCING-MASTERS. [GLADIATORS; LANCISTAE.]

FERETRUM, a bier on which the corpse, after washing, was placed and carried to burial [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]. It was as a rule made of wood, in which Ambrose (in Luc. vii. 14) sees a mystical allusion to the resurrection, drawn from the miracle at Nain (Durant. de Ritib. lib. i. c. 23). The feretrum of Constantine the Great appears to have been of gold, like his coffin (Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66). The bier was covered with a pall, more or less costly, according to the rank of the deceased. That of Constantine was of purple (ἀλουργική ἀλουργίδι). That of Blesilla, the daughter of Paula, was of cloth of gold, against which Jerome remonstrated vehemently as an unchristian extravagance (Hieron. Ep. 25). Constantine's bier was surrounded with a circle of lights burning in golden candlesticks (Euseb. u. s.). The bier was carried to the grave sometimes by relations or near friends, sometimes by officials designated to that duty (Copiatæ, decani, lectionarii), and in the case of persons of high dignity or sanctity by bishops and nobles, e. g., Basil by his clergy (Greg. Mag. Orat. xx.), his sister Macrina by Gregory Nyssen, and other clergy (Greg. Nys. Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 201); Paula, by the bishops of Palestine, "cervicem feretro subjicientibus" (Hieron. Ep. 27). [E. V.]

FERIA. The proper sense of this word is that of a holiday, of a festival viewed in the aspect of a day of freedom from worldly business. It is in this meaning that we find the word in classical Latin, though here it occurs exclusively in the plural. Besides this, however, the word has been used in a special sense in the Christian church from very early times to denote the days of the week, feria secunda, tertia, &c., for Monday, Tuesday, &c.

The origin of this system of notation cannot be stated with absolute certainty. It is explained by Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) as arising from the fact that the week following Easter Day was appointed by the emperor Constantine to be observed as one continuous festival, and that originally the year began with Easter. Hence the Monday, Tuesday, &c., of Easter Week would be respectively secunda feria, tertia feria, &c., and in this way, following the example of the first week of the year, the names passed to all other Mondays, &c., of the year. The great objection to this view, which seems to have found many supporters (see e. g. Pelliccia, De Christianæ Ecclesiæ politia, i. 277, ed. Colon. 1829), is that long before the time of Constantine we find Tertullian speaking of Wednesday and Friday as quarta and sexta feria (de jejunio adv. Psychicos, c. 2).

It seems more reasonable to explain the phrase as being akin to and probably derived from the Jewish system of notation under which such an expression as e. g. ἡ μία τῶν σαββάτων (Mark xvi. 2; Acts xx. 7, and often in the New Testament) means the "first day of the week." This extension of the word Sabbath, which, besides the instances adducible from the New Testament, occurs also in the Targums (see e. g. Esther ii. 9), is merely a natural transference of a word from its primary meaning of the point of time, as it were, to express the periods marked out by such points; and an exact parallel is found in the Hebrew חֵרֶשׁ, which is primarily the new moon, and hence the month, or period between two new moons. The real feria then being Sunday, the other days of the week are reckoned as in the above instances with reference to this. On this view see Heinichen on Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. (vol. iii. p. 87). The explanation given by Durandus (Rationale divinorum officiorum, vii. 1. 11) deserves to be quoted, though of course not admissible as a solution—"vocantur ergo feriae a feriando, quia toto tempore a vitii feriari, id est vacare, debemus, non quod sit a necessariis vitae operibus feriandum."

With the seventh day of the week the name Subbatum was so closely associated that it was nearly always used instead of septima feria, though Ducange (s. v.) gives an example of this last phrase. In like manner, the first day of the week, from its association with the Resurrection, became "the Lord's Day" from apostolic times, and thus though the phrase prima feria does now and then occur (see e. g. in one of the spurious sermons once attributed to Augustine, Patrol. xxxix. 2005), Dominica is the regular word for Sunday in ancient liturgies. The days, however, from Monday to Friday inclusive are habitually designated as secunda feria, &c., of which practice an examination of, e. g., the Gregorian Sacramentary will furnish abundant examples. A good illustration, showing how completely the word feria had passed into this new sense, is furnished by the use of the phrase feriae legitimae in the Libri Poenitentiales of Theodore of Tarsus and of Bede, as when for some offence a special fast is enjoined "praeter legitimas ferias" (see e. g. Patrol. xcix. 968), that is, in addition to those days of the week which were fasts under all circumstances.

For further remarks on this subject see Ducange's Glossarium, (s. v.), and Augusti's Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie, i. 467 sqq. [L. S.]

FERIALES (i.e. Libri) were books containing a record of the festivals of the martyrs. Thus Chromatius and Heliodorus, writing to Jerome (Hieron. Epist.), beg him to search for the Feriales from the archives of Eusebius of Caesarea, as a guide to the feast-days of the martyrs [CALENDAR: MARTYROLOGY] (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

FERMENTUM. I. The earliest Ordo Romanus extant, which is supposed to represent the ritual of Rome in the age of Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, orders a portion of reserved eucharist (Sancta) to be brought into the church before the celebration by a subdeacon, to be delivered by him to the archdeacon after the canon, and to be put into the chalice by the latter, saying, "The Peace of the Lord be with you always." (Ord. R. I. nn. 8, 17, 18, in Mss. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 8, 12, 13). The bishop of Rome is supposed to be present, and to celebrate. The particle thus used was called Fermentum, the leaven, n. 22, p. 16. If the pope was not present, "a particle of the leaven, which had been consecrated by the apostolical, was brought by the oblationary subdeacon, and given to the archdeacon; but he handed it to the bishop, who, signing it thrice, and saying, 'The Peace, &c.,' put it into the chalice." The reason of the name Fermentum is now obvious. Leaven is dough reserved from one baking to be mixed with that prepared for another, and may be said to make the bread of both one. The eucharistic leaven connected successive celebrations with each other in the same manner, and was at the same time a token of union between congregations locally separated from each other. If we may trust to the Liber Pontificalis, the custom of sending the Fermentum to the several churches in Rome originated with Melchisedech, A.D. 311. The same authority tells us that Siricius, A.D. 385, "ordained that no presbyter should celebrate masses through the whole week unless he received a certified (declaratum), consecrated (portion) from the bishop of the place appointed (for a station), which is called the leaven" (Anast. Biblioth. de Vitis Pont. Rom. nn. 32, 39, pp. 12, 22). The custom is noticed at some length in a letter ascribed to Innocent I., A.D. 402, but apparently composed by a later and inferior writer. From this document we learn that the pope "sent the leaven per titulos," i.e. the churches within the city only (those without being in the suburbicarian dioceses), and that it was done on Sundays, "that the presbyters who on that day could not meet him (in worship) on account of the people committed to them, might not, above all on that day, feel themselves cut off from communion with him" (Innoc. Ep. ad Decent. in Cigheri, V. PP. Theolog. Univ. tom. iv. p. 178). The writer had been asked by another bishop, if it was proper to send the Fermentum about through a diocese (i.e. beyond the walls of an episcopal city). The question shows that the practice had spread. In the writings of Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, we meet with a story which proves incidentally that it was not unknown in France. We are told of a certain deacon, in a town in Auvergne, who, "when the time to offer the sacrifice was come, having taken the tower in which was kept the mystery of the Lord's Body, began to carry it to the door (of the church), and entered the temple to place it on the altar," &c. (Mirac. L. I. cap. 86).

Before the custom became obsolete, its observance was, it appears, reduced by authority to a few days in the year. For in an ancient gloss on the letter ascribed to Innocent, found by Mabillon in the library of St. Emmeran at Ratisbon, the following statement occurs: "Touching the leaven, which he mentions, it is the custom of the Romans that a portion be reserved from the mass which is sung on Maundy Thursday and the Easter-Eve, and on the holy day of Easter, and at Pentecost, and on the holy day of the Lord's Nativity, throughout the year; and that of the said mass there be put into the chalice, everywhere at the stations, if the pope himself be not present, when he says, The Peace, &c. . . and this is called Fermentum. Nevertheless, on Easter-Eve, no presbyter in the baptismal churches communicates any one before there be sent to him of that very same holy thing which the Lord Pope hath offered" (Mabillon, Itin. German. Descript. p. 65; Hamb. 1717). The rite was observed at Rome under the second Ordo Romanus, now extant (pp. 43, 9), which is probably at least a century later than the first. Amalarius, who wrote about the year 827, cites some words that relate to it from Ordo II. § 12 (p. 49); but there can be little doubt that he understood them of the "commixture" of a particle of the newly-consecrated oblate (De Eccles. Off. lib. iii. c. 31).

II. There was another use of the reserved element, somewhat similar to the above, at the ordination of bishops and priests. The earliest notice occurs in a very ancient Roman directory, and refers (as indeed all the strictly Roman documents do) to bishops only. The pope at the communion which followed the consecration, gave a whole oblate to the newly-made bishop, of which he took a part at the time, but "reserved the rest of it to serve for communions for forty days" (Ordo VIII. p. 89). The practice may have spread from Rome, but it was at one time so widely observed that we are compelled to assign its origin to a very early though not primitive date. In the opinion of Morinus (De Sacr. Ordin. P. III. Exerc. VIII. c. ii. § iv.), it sprang up in Italy in the 8th century. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, who was born in the 10th century, asserts that it was observed by all the bishops of his province at the ordination of presbyters, and he believed it to be universal (Ep. II. ad Einard. apud Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. L. I. c. viii. Art. IX. n. xx.). Rubrics prescribing it at the consecration of bishops are found in old pontificals of Concha, in Spain (Martene, u. s. Art. X. n. xxi.); of Saltzburg (Ibid. Art. XI. Ord. VIII.); of Toulouse, Rouen, Rheims (Morinus, de Sacr. Ord. P. II. p. 281; and P. III. p. 130), and the Latin church of Constantinople (Mart. u. s. Ordo XIV. note at end), where the term was forty days; and of Mayence (Morinus, P. II. p. 278), where it was thirty. The pontificals of Compiègne (Mart. u. s. Ord. VII.) and of Saltzburg (Ibid. Ord. IX.) testify to the custom at the ordination of priests, the former fixing forty days for them, and the latter only seven. In the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamea in Syria, the pope, who is supposed to consecrate, is directed to give a "whole Host" to the new bishop, but its use is not mentioned. Afterwards, however, it is said that "for forty days from the day of his consecration he ought, if possible, to sing mass daily for the people committed to him." (Mart. u. s. Ord. XIV.) This evidently indicates the original purpose, and makes it highly probable that wherever in the west we find an order that the newly ordained shall celebrate for forty days (and this was a common rule: see Morinus, P. III. Exerc. VIII. c. ii. § vii. p. 132), there had also existed in connection with it the custom of reserving for those celebrations from the communion at the ordination.

Maillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. p. xxxix.) states expressly that the particles of the reserved oblate were put day by day into the chalice by the newly-made bishop or priest, as in the rite before described. This is more than probable; but it is right to mention that he gives no reference, and that no direct evidence of the fact has come within the knowledge of the present writer. [W. E. S.]

FERREOLUS. (1) Presbyter, martyr at Besançon with Ferrutio, the deacon; commemorated June 16 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Vienna; commemorated Sept. 18 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FERRUTIO. [FERREOLUS.]

FERTUM is "the oblation which is brought to the altar, and sacrificed by the priest" (Dun-cange, s. v. quoting Isidore and Papias); i. e. the element of bread offered on the altar and consecrated. [C.]

FERULA. [NARTHEX; PASTORAL STAFF.]

FESTIVAL (ἐορτή, festum, dies festus). The history of the first rise of festivals in the Christian church is a subject involved in much obscurity. During the first few years, while the essentially Jewish character of the church continued, the Jewish yearly festivals were doubtlessly observed, especially the Passover and Pentecost, which later events had raised to a far higher pitch of dignity. The Sabbath also continued to be observed, and with it the first day of each week became a lesser Easter day.

As time went on, the Jewish element in the church became proportionately diminished, with the breach between it and the Gentile part continually widening. Indeed the tone of the language used by Christian writers in the 2nd century, with reference to the Jewish nation, is on the whole one of undisguised hostility. It is obvious therefore that the tendency would be from the nature of the case to reject such Jewish festivals as had not in some sort been made Christian, and thus, e.g., though some have seen in Christmas a higher form of the feast of the Dedication, it may be considered that the inheritance of the younger from the older church, so far as festivals are concerned, consists of the ennobled Passover and Pentecost. The "first day of the week" was no doubt a Christian festival from the earliest times. Up to the end of the 2nd century, we have no evidence of the existence of any other festival than these three. Gradually, however, from a belief in the lessons of good derivable from a celebration of great events in the history of our faith, and perhaps too from the analogy of the numerous festivals of the older religions, fresh commemorations arose, the earliest being that of the Epiphany, from which afterwards arose the celebration of Christmas as a separate festival. The exact time of the first rise of these, and of the connection between the two, is uncertain; reference may be made to the separate articles. [CHRISTMAS, EPIPHANY.] The time, too, from Easter to Pentecost came to be viewed as one long festal season, and in this period a special distinction began to be attached to Ascension-day, in the 3rd or more probably in the 4th century. Together with these festivals and similar ones which were gradually added (e.g. those of the Presentation and Annunciation in the 6th century), all commemorative of the great events in the foundation of the faith, we find also festivals of another kind, the celebration of the anniversary of a martyr's death, viewed as his natal day into the better life. These would be at first confined more or less to special churches, but would subsequently obtain in many cases a general observance. Thus by the end of the 4th century we find a wide-spread observance of festivals of e.g., St. Stephen, SS. Peter and Paul, and the Maccabees. The festival of St. John the Baptist, which at an early period became one of great importance (see e.g. the canon of the council of Agde, cited below), is not however of the above class, being a commemoration of the actual birthday, as one intimately associated with that of the Saviour Himself.

We find, however, considerable diversity of feeling in the primitive church on the subject of festivals. On the one hand, it was most justly felt that a festival, as being a cessation from the world's everyday cares and pleasures, should claim regard as a special means of help for the soul in its heavenward way; on the other hand, it was urged with equal truth, that when the shadows of Judaism had become the realities of Christianity, to lay any special stress on the observance of times and seasons was at any rate to incur the danger of losing sight of the reason why festivals were established at all, and the rather that in Christianity every day was in a new sense consecrated to God. It was the disregard of one or other of these two co-ordinate truths to which must be attributed much of the false ideas that have been held on the subject of festivals. Protests on the second point were deemed necessary by our Lord Himself (Matt. xii. 8; Mark ii. 27), and by St. Paul (Romans xiv. 5, 6; Gal. iv. 9-11; Col. ii. 16). In like manner too, Origen (contra Celsum viii. 22) urges that the Christian who dwells on the thought of Christ our Passover, and of the gift of the Holy Ghost, is every day keeping an Easter and a Pentecostal feast. Similar remarks are found also in Chrysostom (Hom. i. de S. Pentecoste, c. i.; vol. ii. 458, ed. Montfaucon; cf. Hom. xv. in 1 Cor. c. 3; vol. x. 128). These passages, however, are not to be viewed as objections brought against the celebration of festivals, but rather as answers to those who saw in them but a relic of Judaism. Tertullian, in very sweeping language, condemns the practice of holding festivals altogether on this ground,—“Horum igitur tempora observantes et dies et menses et annos, galaticamur. Plane, si judaicarum caeremoniarum, si legalium sollemnitatum observantes sumus. . .” and asks why in the face of St. Paul's language as to times and seasons, Easter is celebrated, and why the period from thence to Whitsunday is spent as one long season of rejoicing (de jejunio adv. Psychicos, c. 14). Jerome, on the other hand, while endorsing such views as those which we have referred to as held by Origen and Chrysostom, proceeds further to maintain the definite advantages arising from the observance of festivals (Comm. in Gal. iv. 10; vol. vii. 456, ed. Vallarsi; cf. Socrates, Hist. Eccles. v. 22).

We shall now briefly notice the chief points in which a festival was specially distinguished in its observance from ordinary days. (1) The essential idea of a Christian festival was obviously such as to make ordinary festivities, other than those of a religious character, unseemly at such times; and thus numerous imperial edicts were promulgated from time to time, prohibiting public games, etc. on Christian holy days (Eusebius, Vita Constantini iv. 18, 23; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. i. 8; Cod. Theodos. lib. xv. tit. 5, ll. 2, 5; vol. iv. pp. 350, 353, ed. Gothofredus; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, l. 11; p. 208, ed. Gothofredus). Of the two references to the Theodosian Code, the former enjoins that “Nullus Solis die populo spectaculum praebeat,” the latter specifies Sundays, Christmas, the Epiphany, Easter, and the anniversary of apostolic martyrdoms as the days to which the prohibition extended, “. . .

omni theatrorum atque Circensium voluptate per universas urbes earundem populis denegata.” (2) In like manner all legal business had to be suspended. (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. 8, ll. 1, 2; vol. i. pp. 118, 121; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, ll. 7, 11; pp. 207, 208). A special exemption was allowed in the case of emancipation or manumission (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. 8, l. 1; supra). (3) The celebration of public worship was of course a necessary concomitant of a festival. The council of Eliberis [305 A.D.] condemns the man who on three consecutive Sundays was absent from the church (can. 21; Labbe i. 973). The council of Agde (506 A.D.) while sanctioning generally the practice of communicating in private chapels, forbids it elsewhere than in the public assembly on the more important festivals. These are specified in another canon of the same council as Easter, Christmas, the Epiphany, Ascension-day, Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, “vel si qui maximi dies in festivitibus habentur.” (can. 18, 21; Labbe iv. 1386; cf. Concil. Aurel. iv. [541 A.D.] can. 3; Labbe v. 382). (4) Fasting was a thing utterly foreign to the idea of such days; indeed it was a distinguishing mark of sundry heretics to turn the festivals into seasons of fasting. The so called Apostolic Canons censure those who would fast on the Lord's day or the Sabbath (i.e. Saturday, which, it will be remembered, was regarded in the East as a day of distinctly festal character), and orders that any of the clergy who does so shall be deposed (καταπεσθω, can. 65, al. 66, Labbe i. 40); and a previous canon (52 al. 51) had spoken of a bishop, priest or deacon, who abstained from flesh and wine on a festival as “a cause of scandal to many.” (See also Tertullian, de Corona Militis c. 3; Concil. Gangrense [circa 324 A.D.] can. 18; Labbe ii. 424; Concil. Carthag. iv. [398 A.D.] can. 64; Labbe ii. 1205). On these days in earlier times were held Agapae [AGAPAE], a custom which was afterwards changed into the plan of the richer members of a Christian community feeding the poorer (cf. e.g., Tertullian, Apol. c. 39). (5) Among minor but significant ways of distinguishing a festival it may be added that at such times it was usual to offer prayer standing, not kneeling; “die dominico nefas . . . de geniculis adorare. Eadem immunitate a die Paschae in Pentecosten usque gaudemus” (Tertullian, de Corona Militis c. 3). Irenaeus, in referring to the same practice, speaks of this absence of kneeling as figurative of the resurrection (Frag. 7; vol. i. p. 828, ed. Stieren; cf. Justin Martyr, Quaest. et Resp. ad Orthodoxos 115; Jerome Dialogus contra Lucifercianos c. 8; vol. ii. 180; Epiphanius Expos. Fidei c. 22; vol. i. 1105, ed. Petavii; Isidore of Eccl. Off. i. 33; Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. ii. 42. See also Concil. Nicaenum i. [325 A.D.] can. 20; Labbe ii. 37; also Dr. Pusey's note to the Oxford translation of Ephrem Syrus, pp. 417 sqq.).

Festivals may be divided into ordinary and extraordinary (feriae statutae, indictivae), according as they came in regular course in the Christian year, or were specially appointed in consequence of some particular event. The former may again be divided into immoveable and moveable (feriae immobiles, mobiles), according as they did or did not fall on the same day in every year; those in the latter division obviously consisting of such as depended on Easter, the time of which, depending on the Jewish or lunar calendar, to which the Paschal festival originally belonged, varies with reference to its place in the Julian or solar year [EASTER]. It follows that the number of Sundays between Christmas and Easter, and again between Easter and Christmas, is variable. Besides the obvious divisions of feriae majores, minores, there is further that into feriae integrae, intercisae, according as the festival lasted for the whole or part of a day. Such divisions as those made by the Roman church of festum simplex, duplex, semiduplex, to say nothing of further subdivisions (principale duplex, major duplex, etc.), fall quite beyond our period. (For information concerning them see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. Festum.) On the subject of the repeated commemorations of the more important festivals, see OCTAVE, and for the preliminary preparation for festivals, see VIGIL.

Among the literature on the subject of Christian festivals may be mentioned the following:—Hospinianus, Festa Christianorum; Tiguri, 1593. FINES (multa, emenda, ἐπιτίμια). Multa signified a fine paid by way of penalty to the judge: emenda, satisfaction made to the injured party. On the variations from this usage, see Du Cange, s. v. Emenda. Fines are found in the records of the early English church among the penalties inflicted for ecclesiastical offences. The laws of Ethelbert of Kent, A.D. 597–604 (c. i.) require the following compensation to be made for injuries; "to the property of God and the church twelve fold, a bishop's property eleven fold, a priest's property nine fold, a deacon's six fold, a clerk's property three fold." The laws of Ine, king of Wessex, A.D. 690 (c. 2), order a man to have his child baptized within thirty days, "if it be not so, let him make 'bot' with thirty shillings, but if it die without baptism, let him make 'bot' for it with all that he has;" (c. 3) a lord to pay thirty shillings who compels his 'theoman' to work on Sunday, a freeman working without his lord's command to pay sixty shillings; and (c. 13) any one committing perjury before a bishop to pay one hundred and twenty shillings. In the laws of Wihtred of Kent, A.D. 696, it is decreed (c. 9) that if an 'esne' do work contrary to his lord's command from sunset on Saturday to sunset on Sunday, he must make a 'bot' of eighty shillings. The Penitential of Egbert (vii. 4) directs an offender for certain crimes either to do penance or pay a fine to the church, or divide money among the poor; and elsewhere (xiii. 11) allows a fine to take the place of fasting; but this latter instance is rather of the nature of a Redemption than a direct penance. FIR-TREE OR PINE. See Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 632–3. "Praeter cupressum, et pinus quoque et myrtus pro mortis symbolo, etc. Et pinus quidem, quia semel excisa nunquam reviviscit et repullulascit." These are rather general or human reasons for choice of the pine as an emblem of death, than as conveying any specially Christian thought. See Herodotus vi. 37, on the threat of Croesus to the people of Lampascus. But the fir, or some tree much resembling it, accompanies the figure of the Good Shepherd, Aringhi, ii. 293, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla. Also at pp. 75 and 25; and it is certainly intended to be represented among the trees which surround the same form in vol. i. 577. The latter painting is from the Callixtine, and is certainly an adaptation from the common fresco-subjects of Orpheus. The shepherd bears the syrinx or reeds, but sits in a half-reclining position, as Orpheus with the lyre; and various trees are surrounding him. This association of the fir or pine with the Good Shepherd, and of both with Orpheus, would account for the introduction of different species of "trees of the wood," the fir being also characteristic of the mountains or wilderness in which the lost sheep is found. Herzog thinks it was placed on Christian graves (as well as others), as an evergreen tree, and therefore a symbol of immortality; which is by no means unlikely. [R. St. J. T.]

FIRE, KINDLING OF. In the first Ordo Romanus (c. 32, p. 21; cf. p. 31), among the ceremonies of Maundy Thursday, the following is mentioned. At the ninth hour fire is produced by a flint and steel sufficient to light a candle, which ought to be placed on a reed; a lamp lighted from this is kept unextinguished in the church until Easter eve, to light the Paschal taper, which is to be blessed on that day. The directions of pope Zacharias (Epist. 12, ad Bonif.) are different. He says, that the tradition of the Romish church was, that on Maundy Thursday, three lamps of more than usual capacity were set alight in some hidden spot in the church, with oil sufficient to last till Easter eve, and that from these on the latter day the baptismal tapers were to be lighted. "But," he continues, "as to the crystals which you mention we have no tradition." The latter words seem to prove incontestably that the custom mentioned in the Ordo Rom. I., of striking fire from flint or "crystal," was not introduced at Rome in the time of Zacharias (†752), when it was already practised in some churches—probably in Gaul or Germany—known to Boniface. Pope Leo IV., however (†855), recognises it as an established custom to produce fresh fire on Easter eve, saying (Hom. De Cura Past. c. 7), "in sabbato paschae extincto veteri novus ignis benedicatur et per populum dividatur." Amalarius (De Ord. Antiph. c. 44) says that he learned from Theodorus, archdeacon of Rome, that no lamps or tapers were used in the Roman church on Good Friday, but that on that day new fire is kindled, the flame from which is preserved until the nocturnal office. Compare Martene, Rit. Ant. IV. xxiii. 6.

FIRMAMENT. The male figure observed beneath the feet of our Lord, in representations of the dispute with the doctors (see Bottari, tav. xv., Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, and woodcut No. 1) is said to be intended for Uranus, or the firmament of heaven. It is always holding a veil or cloth above its head, which appears to symbolize the stretching out of the heavens like a curtain, Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22; and more particularly Ps. xviii. 9, of "the darkness under God's feet."

In another instance, from a tomb in the Vatican (Bottari, tav. xxxiii., woodcut No. 2), a feminine bust is shown holding a floating drapery over its head, which seems inflated by the wind. The figure above seems to walk firmly over it. On the significance of this, see Buonarruoti, Vetri, p. 7; Bottari, i. p. 41; Visconti, M.P.C. tom. iv. pl. 418. Garrucci (Hagioglyphia, p. 92, note 1) does not assent to the common belief that this represents the firmament. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., s. v. Ciel.) [R. St. J. T.]

FIRST FRUITS (Primitiæ, of animals or men, πρωτότοκα; of raw produce, πρωτογενήματα; of prepared produce, ἀπαρχαί. Aug. Quæst. in Num. xviii.). Compare FRUITS, OFFERING OF.

The custom of dedicating first fruits to God obtained early in the church (Orig. c. Cels. viii. 33, 34). Irenæus thinks that Christ enjoined them when he took bread and wine at the last supper (Hoer. iv. 32), and that they ought to be paid (Oportet, ib. 34). Origen says their payment is becoming and expedient, and refusal is unworthy and impious, yet he distinctly states that the Levitical law of first fruits is not binding in the letter upon the Christian church. (Num. xviii. Hom. xi.). But as the idea grew that the clergy had succeeded to the position and to the rights of the Levites, first fruits were considered obligatory, to withhold them was to defraud God; they are more incumbent upon Christians than Jews, for Christ bids his followers to sell all they have, and also to exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees; the priest whom they support will bring a blessing on the house by his prayers, the offerer by his spirit of thankfulness. (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.; in Mal. iii.; Greg. Naz. Epist. 80, Orat. 15. Apost. Const. ii. 25.) Yet, though the payment was so vigorously pressed, we find in Cassian (Collat. xxi. 1 seq.) that abbot John regards first fruits as voluntary gifts, while Theonas says he has not even heard the reason for paying them before. The council of Friuli (A.D. 791, can. 14), quotes Malachi iii. as conclusive proof of the obligation of first fruits.

Most stress is laid upon paying first fruits of the corn-floor and the wine-press, but the Apostolic Constitutions mention others and regulate their distribution. First fruits of the corn-floor and wine-press, of sheep and oxen, of bread and honey, of wine in cask, are to be paid for the support of the priests, but of clothing, money, and other possessions for the orphan and widow (Const. vii. 30). The bishop alone has the right to receive and apportion first fruits (ii. 25). At first they were brought with the other oblations at the celebration of the eucharist. This was found inconvenient, and it was ordered tural or anagrammatic meaning is perhaps the most popular at the present day. In Matt. xiii. 47-49; Luke v. 4-10; it is used in the parable of the net for the members of the church; and our Lord there assigns it its significance; His parabolic use of it is frequently imitated in early Christian art, where the fishes in the church's net, or caught by the hook of the fisher, correspond exactly to the lambs of the fold, or to the doves, which also represent the faithful on many Christian tombs and vaultings (see s. vv.) But the anagrammatic use of the word IXΘΥC appears to have been very early. It was derived, as all know, from the initials o. the word; 'Ιησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ. This appears to be in the mind of St. Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. iii. c. 11, p. 106), and to have been so well understood in his time as to have required no explanation, since he recommends the use of the symbol on seals and rings, without giving an explanation of its import. The other devices he commends are the dove, ship, lyre, and anchor. At so early a period as the middle of the 2nd century, and under the continual dangers of persecution, the use of such a symbol for the person of the Lord was perfectly natural, as it (Canon. Ap. 4) that they should not be brought to the altar, but to the bishop and presbyters, who would distribute to the deacons and other clerics. The church of Africa (Cod. Can. Afr. 37), made an exception in favour of honey and milk, which were needed as accompaniments of the sacrament of baptism.

The payment of first fruits was accompanied by a special formula (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.); lo, I have brought to thee first fruits of the produce of the earth, which thou hast given me, O Lord. The priest replied with the blessing written in Deut. xxviii. 3. A special form of thanksgiving is found in Apost. Const. viii. 40.

The amount of first fruits was not fixed by the Levitical law, but left to the liberality of the worshipper. Tradition handed down one-sixtieth as the minimum, those who were more religious gave one-fortieth, the rest something between. (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.; Cassian Coll. xxi. 3). [J. S.]

FISH. [See EUCHARIST IN CHRISTIAN ART, p. 625.]

The Fish is a symbol of almost universal occurrence in the painting and sculpture of the primitive church. Like the Dove or the Lamb it is used in more than one sense; and its non-scripwould attract no notice from the outer world; and in the same manner, with even more obvious reasons, the form of the cross was frequently disguised up to the time of Constantine. [See CROSS.] But see also Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 1) "Nos pisciculi secundum ixθy nostrum in aquâ nascimur." Also Jerome ad Bonosum, Ep. 43, "B. tanquam ixθy filius aquosa petit." [BAPTISM, p. 171.] But the mystic senses assigned to the emblem by various fathers often seem to the modern mind somewhat gratuitous and ill-founded. They strain their imaginations, apparently, to find reasons in the nature of things for a devoutly ingenious arrangement of initial letters; and seem to assume that there must be real analogy between the Divine Lord and the fish, because the initials of the name and titles of the one made the Greek name of the other. The pleasure derived from the anagram, or the facility it may have given for concealing Christian doctrine from the heathen, seem occasionally to have overcome the thought that the Lord Himself used the fish as an emblem of His people only, not of Himself—of the sheep, not the Shepherd. Aringhi dwells more naturally on the Scriptural meaning, and the various examples he gives (vol. ii. p. 684; ii. p. 620; also that from the inscription made in Stilicho's consulship, A.D. 400, vol. i. p. 19) all speak of the fish in the Scriptural sense as a type of the disciple. The lamp in Aringhi (ii. 620; see woodcut) has the monogram on the handle, and the two fishes on the central part. He also refers to the dolphin as king of fishes, speaking of its reported love for its offspring; with reference to the tomb of Baleria or Valeria Latobia, now in the Vatican. Martigny states that because Christ is man, He therefore is a fish of His own net, and gives prophetic significance, following Aringhi, to the story of Tobias and the fish which delivered Sara from the power of the evil spirit. This he literally accepts, and follows the various attempted connexions of the anagram with the fish of the last repast at the sea of Galilee; and sees in them the sacramental representatives of the body of our Lord, quoting St. Augustine, (Tract exxiii. in Joann. xvi.) and Bede's observation on the same passage, Piscis assus, Christus est passus. These analogies are difficult to follow, especially when we consider the Scriptural use of the emblem from the Lord's own mouth.

The fish as the believer, (Ambrose, iv. in Luc. v. "piscis qui hanc enavigant vitam") is more frequently represented on the hook of the gospel fisherman, than in the net of the church. [See FISHERMAN.] Bread and fish are the universal viands of the representations of earlier Agapae, as frequently in the Callixtine catacomb. The genuineness of some at least of these paintings is generally allowed, and Dr. Theodore Mommsen mentions in particular an Agape with bread and fish, in the vault named after Domitilla, the grand-daughter of Vespasian, on the Ardeatine way and near the ancient church of SS. Nereus and Achilles. In this painting so impartial and accurate an observer has full confidence, as coeval with the vault; though he thinks the case incomplete for the vault itself being so early as 95 B.C.; and observes that the painting of this subject, as of those of Daniel, Noah, and the Good Shepherd, is less excellent than that of the vine in the vaultings of the original chamber of Domitilla without the catacomb, which is quite like a work of the Augustan age.

The use of this emblem is connected by Martigny with the "disciplina arcani" of the early church. There can be little doubt that reverent mystery was observed as to the eucharist, and that in ages of persecution, till Constantine's time, no public use of the cross was made, as a sign of the person of the Lord. Till then, the fish-anagram was perhaps in special and prevailing use, and it may have yielded its place from that time to the cross, the sign of full confession of Jesus Christ. For the secret discipline after the time of Constantine seems to have consisted mainly in the gradual nature of the instructions given to catechumens, and the fact that for a time the chief doctrines of the faith were not brought before them.

[R. St. J. T.]

The tesserae given to the newly-baptized were frequently in the form of the symbolical fish, as pledges or tokens of the rights conferred in baptism (Alleganza, Opusc. Erud. p. 107). Of this kind is probably the bronze fish given by Costadoni (Del Pesce, iv. 22), inscribed with the word CWCAIC. See woodcut.

Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 516) discovered in the catacombs three glass fishes, with a number inscribed upon each; thus, x. xx. xxv. The purpose of the numbers is altogether uncertain.

The custom of decorating baptisteries with fish has a similar origin. In the ruins of an ancient baptistery near the church of St. Prisca at Rome, two beautiful mosaics representing fish were discovered, which are now in the Kircher museum (Lupi, Dissert. i. 83). See BAPTISM, p. 171. [C.]

FISHERMAN. Our Lord or His disciples are frequently represented as the fishers of men in ancient art, St. Clement of Alexandria uses the simile for both. Hymn to the Saviour, v.

No. 1.

24 sqq.; Paedagog. iii. 106. See also Aringhi, ii. 620. Martigny gives an example (see cut No. 1.) from an article by Costadoni, Del pesce (vol. 41, p. 247, in the collection of Calogera, Venice, 1738-1787), representing a man clothed in the skin of a fish, bearing a sporta or basket, which may, as Polidori supposes, represent the divine or apostolic fisher, or the fish of the church's net. The net is more rarely represented than the hook and line, but St. Peter is represented casting the net, in an ancient ivory in Mamachi (Costumi i. prefaz. p. 1). The net of St. Peter, with the Lord fishing with the line, is a device of the papal signets. In the Callixtine catacomb (De Rossi, IXOTC tab. ii. n. 4) the fisherman is drawing forth a huge fish from the waters which flow from the rock in Horeb (see cut No. 2). See also Bottari, tav. xlii., and a cornelian given by Costadoni, Pesce tav. xxx., on a small glass cup given by Garrucci (Vetri, vi. 10), a figure in tunic and pallium (supposed to represent the Lord) holds in his hand a large fish as if just drawn from the sea (cut No. 3). At St. Zenone in Verona, the patron saint is thus represented, and this subject, with those of Abraham's sacrifice, Noah's ark, and others, on the bronze doors and marble front of that most important church, are specially valuable as connecting the earlier Lombard carvings with the most ancient and scriptural subjects of primitive church-work. This symbol, like the Vine, is adopted from Pagan decoration, which of course proves its antiquity. [R. St. J. T.]

No. 2.

FISHERMAN'S RING. [RING.]

FISTULA (called also calamus, canna, cannuia, siphon, arundo, pipa, pugillaris). A tube, usually of gold or silver, by suction through which it was formerly customary to receive the wine in communicating. The ancient Ordo Romanus thus explains its use: "Diaconus tenens calicem et fistulam stet ante episcopum, usque dum ex sanguine Christi quantum voluerit sumat; et sic calicem et fistulam subdiacono commendet." Among other instances, five silver-gilt fistulae ad communicandum are enumerated among the sacramental vessels of the church of Mayence; and at a later date, pope Victor III. left to the monastery of Monte Casino, "fistulam auream cum angulo, et fistulas argenteas duas." Pope Adrian I. is said by Anastasius to have offered "calicem majorem fundatum cum siphone pensantem libras xxx."; and the ancient Carthusian statutes recite that the Order has no ornaments of gold or silver in its churches, "praeter calicem, et calamum, quo Sanguis Domini sumitur."

The adoption of the fistula doubtless arose from caution, lest any drop from the chalice should be spilt, or any other irreverence occur in communicating. This seems intimated by the rule of the Cistercian Order (Lib. Us. Ord. Cist. cap. 53), which says that the fistula is not necessary in Missa solennis, when the ministers alone communicate; but that when more communicate it should be used. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iii. 31) states that it was the custom of the Arians to communicate by drinking from the chalice, as if the use of the fistula was for that reason preferred by the orthodox.

The fistula has fallen into disuse since the practice of communicating in one kind has prevailed. It is, however, still retained in solemn papal celebrations for the communion of the pope. The senior cardinal bishop purifies the tube (calamum aureum Papae) with wine, and, after kissing it, places it in the chalice, which he delivers into the right hand of the pope, who communicates by suction. Cardinal Bona states that the fistula was used in his time in the Benedictine monastery of the congregation of St. Maur, in France, where also the assistants communicated in both kinds.

The fistula does not appear to have been adopted in the Eastern church, which made use of a spoon for communicating. [See Voigt, Historia fistulae Eucharisticae; Krazer, Lit. pp. 204-5; Bona, Rer. Lit.; Martene, De ant. rit. Lib. iv.; Catalani, Caerem. &c.] [H. J. II.]

No. 3.

FLABELLUM (ῥιπίδιον, ῥίπης). Among the evidences of the Eastern origin of the Christian religion is the use of fans, flabella, during the celebration of the Eucharist. Having its birthplace and earliest home in a climate teeming with insect life, where food exposed uncovered is instantly blackened and polluted by swarms of flies, it was natural that the bread and wine of its sacramental feast should be guarded from defilement by the customary precautions. The flabellum, or muscarium, having been once introduced among the furniture of the altar for necessary uses, in process of time became one of its regular ornaments, and was thus transferred to the more temperate climates of the West, where its original purpose was almost forgotten.

The earliest notice of the flabellum as a liturgical ornament is in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 12), which direct that after the oblation, before and during the prayer of consecration, two deacons are to stand, one on either side of the altar, holding a fan made of thin membrane (parchment), or of peacock feathers, or of fine linen, and quietly drive away the flies and toher small insects, that they may not strike against the vessels. In the liturgies also of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, the deacons are directed to fan the holy oblations during the prayer of consecration. This fanning, according to Germanus (Contemp. rer. Eccl. p. 157), who, though a late authority (A.D. 1222), may be taken as an evidence of earlier usage, ceased with the Lord's Prayer, and was not resumed. Early writers furnish many notices of the use of the flabellum as an essential part of the liturgical ceremonial. Cyril of Scythopolis, in his Life of St. Euthymius, § 78 (c. A.D. 550), describes Domitian standing at the right side of the holy table, while St. Euthymius was celebrating, with the mystical fan (μετὰ τῆς μυστικῆς ῥιπίδος) just before the Trisagion. Moschus also (Prat. Spirit. § 196) when narrating how some shepherd boys near Apamea were imitating the celebration of the Eucharist in childish sport,^a is careful to mention that two of the children stood on either side of the celebrant, vibrating their handkerchiefs like fans (τοῖς φακιολίοις [fascioliis] ἐρπίπτον). The life of Nicetas (ap. Surium, April 3) describes St. Athanasius assisting at the divine mysteries, "ministerii flabellum tenens erat enim diaconus." Among the ornaments of the church of Alexandria specified in the inventory given, Chronie. Alexand. A.D. 624 (ap. Menard. ad Sac. Gregor. p. 319) are ῥιπία ῥιπίδια.

As the deacons were the officers appointed to wave the fan over the sacred oblations, the delivery of the flabellum, or ῥιπίδιον, constitutes a part of many of the Oriental forms for the ordination to the diaconate. Thus Eucholog. p. 253, after the ὁράριον or stole has been given and placed on the left shoulder, the holy fan (ἅγιον ῥιπίδιον), is put into the deacon's hands, and he is placed "at the side of the holy table to fan;" and again, p. 251, the deacon is directed to take the ῥιπίδιον, and stand at the right side of the table, and wave it over the holy things (ῥιπίσει ii. 545), chorepiscopi ("diaconi tenentes flabella," ib. p. 554), and patriarchs (ib. 559); as well as of the Jacobite deacons (ib. 579, 580). Renaudot (ii. 80) asserts that though mentioned in the ordination services, the βιπίδιον does not appear in the Syrian liturgies. A flabellum, formed of a silver disk, was used in the Armenian church, as it still is. Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396) remarks that the use of the flabellum was much more frequent among the Armenians than in the Greek church.

The flabellum in ordinary use in the Greek church represented a cherub or seraph, with six wings, in allusion to Is. vi. 2. These wings were by preference made of peacocks' feathers, originally on account of their beauty, subsequently with

Although there is no mention of the flabellum in the Ordo Romanus, or Latin ritual books, there is no doubt that it was used by the Western church at an early time. This is evidenced by a story given by Moschus (Prat. Spiritual. § 150) of a deacon who had falsely accused his bishop, being removed from the altar when he was holding the fan in the presence of pope Agapetus, A.D. 535, because he hindered the descent of the Holy Spirit on the gifts. An earlier example is furnished by a gilded glass found in the catacombs, representing a deacon fanning the infant Saviour, seated on the knees of His Virgin Mother (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 202), ment attached to a handle. Bona, u. s., cites also the ancient Cluniac Consuetudinal, and that of St. Benignus of Dijon, together with a Pontifical Ceremonial of the time of Nicholas V. c. 1447. The flabellum often appears in inventories of church furniture. In that taken at St. Riquier, near Abbeville, in 831, mention is made of a "flabellum argenteum ad muscas a sacrificiis abigendas." Other later examples, including some from our own country, will be found in Mr. Albert Way's paper on the Flabellum (Archaeol. Journ. v. 203), sufficiently establishing its use in the churches of the West, where it could be scarcely regarded as requisite as regarded its original intention. We may cite also a letter of St. Hildebert of Tours, c. 1098 (Ep. 2, 71), accompanying the present of a flabellum made to a friend, in which the writer expounds its mystical signification; the flies representing the temptations of the devil to be driven away by the Catholic faith.

The flabellum appears to have gradually fallen into disuse in the Western church, and to have almost entirely ceased by the 14th century. At the present day, the only relic of the usage is in the magnificent fans of peacocks' feathers, carried by the attendants of the pope in solemn processions on certain great festivals.

Though the original intention of the flabellum was one of simple utility, various mystical meanings collected round it. Reference has been already made to the idea that these feather fans typified the cherubim and seraphim surrounding the heavenly throne, αἱ ῥιπίδες εἰς τύπον εἰσὶ τῶν Χερουβίμ (German. u. s. p. 163). τὰ ῥιπίδια καὶ οἱ διάκονοι ἐμφαίνουσι τὰ ἐξαπτέρυγα Σεραφίμ καὶ τὴν τῶν πολυνομάτων Χερουβίμ ἐμφέρειαν (Ib. p. 169). Germanus also holds, according to Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396), that the vibration of which we give a woodcut (No. 5). The annexed engraving (No. 6), showing a deacon vibrating his fan during the celebration of the eucharist, is from a miniature in the Barberini Library (Martigny, de l'usage du flabellum). In the next illustration (No. 7) from an illumination in a MS. in the Public Library at Rouen, a bishop is seen bowing his head in the act of elevating the wafer, over which the attendant deacon waves a flabellum, apparently made of parchment of the flabella typifies the tremor and astonishment of the angels at our Lord's Passion. We find the same idea in a passage from the monk Job, given by Photius (cod. cexxii. lib. v. c. 25), who also states that another purpose of the vibration of the flabella was the raising of the mind from the material elements of the eucharist, and fixing them on the spiritual realities.

Two flabella are still preserved, that of Theodelinda of the latter part of the fifth century, in the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza, and that of the Abbey of Tournus, now in the Museum of the Hôtel de Cluny, assigned by Du Sommerard to the ninth. The former (No. 8) is constructed like a modern lady's fan, only circular, formed of purple vellum, illuminated with gold and silver, with an inscription round the upper edge on either side, describing its purpose, which was evidently domestic and not liturgical. The fan is contained in a wooden case, with silver ornaments, probably a reconstruction on the original plan (W. Burges, Archæol. Journ. xiv. pp. 17-19). The Tournus fan was liturgical (No. 9).

No. 9. Flabellum of the Abbey of Tournus. From Du Sommerard, Les Arts du Moyen Âge.

It is described by Du Sommerard, Arts du Moyen Âge (ii. 195, iii. 251, v. 231), and figured in his Atlas (ch. xiv. pl. 4), and Album (ix. série, p. 17). It is circular when fully expanded, and is ornamented with the figures of fourteen saints, in two concentric zones on either side. On one side are represented four female saints, the Blessed Virgin with Our Lord in her arms, St. Lucy, St. Agnes, and St. Cecilia, in one zone, and St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew, in the second; on the other side, the two zones contain male figures alone, St. Maurice, St. Denys, St. Philibert, St. Hilary, and St. Martin, with a "Judex," and a "Levita." Latin hexameters and pentaeters are inscribed on three concentric bands on the fan, describing its use and its oblation in honour of God and St. Philibert. The relics of this saint, who died in 684, were translated to the Abbey of Tournus, where he was held in especial honour. The verses are very curious. We give one of the three series. It will be observed that some words have been misplaced by the painter to the confusion of the metre:—

"Sunt duo quae modicum confert estate flabellum
Infestas abigit muscas et mitigat estum,
Et sine dat tedio gustare manus ciborum. (sic)
Propterea calidum qui vult transire per annum,
Et tutus cupit ab atris existere muscis (sic)
Omni se studeat estate muniri flabello (sic)
Hoc quoque flabellum tranquillas excitat auras
Estus cum faret (fervet?) ventum facit atque serenum
Fugat et obscenas importunasque volucres."

The handle is of ivory, measuring about 2 feet in length; round the pommel is inscribed the maker's name, "+ Johel me scae fecit in honore Mariae." When shut up it goes into a case ornamented with ivory, representing subjects from Virgil's Eclogues.

The making of fans of palm leaves, both for ecclesiastical and domestic purposes, employed the leisure of the Syrian solitaries. St. Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspium, while still an anchorite, is recorded to have made fans for the use of the altar (ap. Surium, ad Jan. 1). The fans sent by Marcella to the Roman ladies, for which she is thanked by St. Jerome (lib. i. Epist. 41), were for ordinary not religious use.

(Martigny, de l'usage du flabellum; Bingham, viii. 6, § 21, xv. 3, § 6; Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 25, § 6; Martene, ll. co.; Augusti, Christl. Archæol. iii. 536 sq.; Archæol. Journ. v. 200, xiv. 17.) [E. V.]

FLAGELLATION (Flagellatio). Flogging was a punishment inflicted on certain orders of the clergy, on monks, nuns, serfs, and slaves; but all orders of the clergy were forbidden (Apost. Can. 28) themselves to strike an offender either for correction or in self-defence. Augustine is a witness (Ep. 159 ad Marcell.) that this mode of discipline was employed not only by schoolmasters and parents, but by bishops in their courts. In the church of Mount Nitria (Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca. c. 6, quoted by Bingham) three whips were kept hanging up; one for chastising offending monks, another for robbers, and the third for strangers who misconducted themselves. The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 38), orders monks who will not listen to admonition to be corrected with stripes, and (c. 41) the secular clergy who are guilty of drunkenness to be flogged. The 1st council of Mâcon (c. 8) sentences any of the junior clergy who summon an ecclesiastic before a lay tribunal to receive "forty stripes, save one" (Conc. Venet. c. 6; Conc. Epaonens. c. 15). The rule of Isidore of Seville (c. 17) directs that minors shall not be excommunicated but be beaten. The higher orders of the clergy are exempted from the degradation of personal chastisement by the 4th council of Braga, A.D. 675 (c. 6). The laws of Ine king of Wessex, A. D. 690 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 214) grant a pardon from his scourging to any one who takes refuge in a church. [G. M.]

FLAMEN. Bishops are supposed by Ducange (s. v.) to be called by the old ethnic title of flamen in the second, third, and fourth canons of the council of Elvira. But the "flamines" there mentioned are almost certainly priests of heathen deities, who are warned against relapsing into their former practices after conversion (Bingham, Antiq. xvi. iv. 8). [C.]

FLAMINA. A name occasionally used for the banners borne in a procession. Thus Wolfhard, in the life of St. Walpurgis (iii. 11, in Acta SS. Feb. 25) speaks of crosses and "signifera flamina," being borne in a procession (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

FLOWERS. 1. Use of natural flowers.—The early Christians rejected the ancient heathen custom of strewing the graves of the dead with flowers and wreaths. This is clear from the testimony of Minucius Felix, who (Octav. 12, § 6; cf. 38, § 3), makes the heathen Caecilius reproach the Christians with refusing wreaths even to sepulchres. But they had adopted the practice in the 4th century; thus St. Ambrose (De obitu Valentini, c. 56) says, as of a lawful custom, "I will not sprinkle his tomb with flowers, but with the sweet scent of Christ's Spirit; let others sprinkle basketfuls of lilies; our lily is Christ;" and Jerome (Epist. 20, ad Pammachium) says, "other husbands strew over the tombs of their wives violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers, and soothe their grief of heart by these kind offices." So also Prudentius has an allusion to it (Cathe-merin. hymn x., circa exequias Defunctorum, 177-8).

"Nos tecta fovebimus ossa Violis et fronde frequenti."

And the same writer again (Peristeph. ix. 201, ff.) exhorts the votaries of St. Eulalia on her festival (Dec. 10), to pluck such flowers as the genial winter yielded—the violet and the crocus—to heap their baskets, while he (the poet) would bring his garlands of verse, woven in dactylic strain; "thus should we venerate the relics, and the altar set above the relics."

In course of time the churches, many of which in their origin were but memorials or vast sepulchres of martyrs, came to be adorned with garlands of leaves and flowers. The basilica of Paulinus at Nola, for instance, appears to have been ornamented in this manner. Jerome (Epist. ad Heliodorum) notes it as especially praiseworthy in Nepotianus, that he had decorated both basilicas and memorial churches of martyrs (basilicas ecclesiae et martyrum conciliabula), with various flowers and foliage and vine-leaves, mentioning distinctly the two classes of churches, those which were built over the remains of martyrs, and those which were not. St. Augustine mentions (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8) a blind woman bringing flowers to the tomb of St. Stephen, when the relics were translated. Venantius Fortunatus, in a poem addressed to St. Rhadegund (Carmina, viii. 9), gives a somewhat more detailed description of the floral decoration of a church for Easter. In spring-time (he says) when the Lord overcame hell, vegetation springs more freshly. Then do men decorate the door-posts and desks with flowers; women fill their laps with roses, these too for the temples. The altars are covered with wreaths; the gold of the crocus is blended with the purple of the violet; white is relieved with scarlet. So rich are the flowers that they surpass gems in colour, frankincense in odour. Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Mart. c. 50) tells us that the basilica of Severinus was decorated with lilies; and further (u. s. c. 91), that at Menda, in Spain, three trees were planted before the altar of St. Eulalia, the flowers of which, being carried to the sick, had often wrought miracles. He also informs us (De Gloria Confess. 31) that St. Severus used to gather lilies and other flowers to decorate the walls of his church.

At Whitsuntide a profusion of flowers was (in some places) showered down from some elevated spot to the floor of the church, to symbolize the outpouring of the gifts of the Spirit (Martene, De Rit. Ant. IV. xxviii. 17).

2. Sculptured or painted flowers.—The word "paradise" (meaning garden) having been used in the church from an early period to designate the future abode of the blessed, the custom would easily and naturally arise of ornamenting with flowers, the cemeteries and crypts containing the venerated remains of martyrs, and even the humble graves of the faithful. Here accordingly we find flowers lavished in every direction, and in every device, in wreaths, in bunches, in crowns, in vases, in baskets. In the cemetery of St. Agnes we trace a beautiful idea from the antique in the decoration of the entrance to the first chamber—little winged genii carrying on their shoulders small baskets filled with flowers, to be strewed on the graves of the saints who repose within (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. cxxxix.). In the churches of Rome and Ravenna the mosaics of the apse usually represent the delights of paradise; there we find figures of our Lord with the Virgin and other saints upon a groundwork of grass and flowers (Ciampini, Vet. monim. I. tab. xlvii. et passim). The bottoms of ancient glass cups have been found embellished with the same subjects treated in the same manner [GLASS, CHRISTIAN].

A flower rising out of a crown placed between St. Peter and St. Paul in the place where the monogram generally appears has been thought to be a symbol of the Lord. An example may be seen on a gilt vase (Buonarroti, Frammenti di Vetro, xvi. 1).

(Martene, De Rit. Ant. lib. iii. c. 10, § 13; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. 1, 130; Martigny, Dictionnaire, s. v. Flours). [C.]

FOLIATI. [SHOE.]

FONT, BAPTISMAL. In the article BAPTISTERY, full particulars have been given of the building or chamber set apart for the administration of the sacrament of baptism. It remains now to speak of the cistern or vessel for containing the water. This was known under different names; the general Greek appellation being κολυμβήθρα, the Latin, piscina. Other names were κόγχη, υπόνομος, lavacrum, nativarium (Ducange, Constantinopol. Christ. lib. iii. c. 81, p. 73).

The material in the Western church was, as a rule, stone; frequently porphyry, or other rich marbles. It was permitted by the council of Lerida, A.D. 524, that if the presbyter could not procure a stone font, he might provide himself with a "vas conveniens ad baptizandi officium" of any material (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1615), which was to be reserved for that sacrament alone (Leo. IV. de Cura Pastoral.; Labbe, Concil. viii. 37). In the Eastern church the font was usually of metal or wood, and seldom or never possessed any beauty. (Neale, Eastern Church, i. 214.)

The usual form of the font was octagonal, with a mystical reference to the eighth day, as the day of our Lord's resurrection, and of regeneration by the Spirit (cf. Ambros. Epist. 20, 44). This explanation of the octagonal form is given in the following lines attributed to St. Ambrose, first published by Gruter, Thes. Inscr. p. 1166, descriptive of the baptistery of the church of St. Thecla, in which Alypius and his companions were baptized by him, Easter, A.D. 387.

"Octachorum sanctos templum consurgit in usus, Octagonus Fons est munere dignus eo.
Hoc numero decuit sacri Baptismatis aulam Surgere qua populis vera salus rediit.
Luce resurgentis Christi qui claustra resolvit Mortis et a tumultu suscipit exanimas,
Confessosque reos maculoso crimine solvens
Fontis puriflui diluit irrigue."

The piscina is sometimes found of a circular form, and is occasionally, though very rarely (as at Aquileia) hexagonal (cf. BAPTISTERY, woodcut, p. 175). Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Martyr. lib. i. c. 23), speaks of a font in the shape of a cross in Spain. The form of a sepulchre is stated to have been sometimes adopted, in allusion to the Christian's burial with Christ in baptism (Rom. iv. 4).

The piscina usually formed a basin in the centre of the baptistery, rather beneath the level of the pavement, surrounded with a low wall. It was entered by an ascent and descent of steps. According to Isidore Hispal. (Orig. xv. 4; de Div. Off. ii. 24) the normal number was seven; three in descent to symbolize the triple renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil; three in ascent to symbolize the confession of the Trinity, and a seventh, "septimus . . . qui et quartus" at the summit of the enclosing wall, for the officiating minister to stand on. But the rule concerning the number was not invariable. At Nocera, the number of steps is five, two in ascent, and three in descent. The descent into the piscina of St. John Lateran is by four steps. We find frequent references in the fathers to the catechumens going down into the font for immersion, e.g. Cyril, Myst. ii. § 4; "ye were led to the pool of Divine baptism . . . and descended three times into the water, and ascended again;" Id. Myst. iii. § 1. "After you had come up from the pool of the sacred streams"; Ambrose, de Sacr. lib. i. c. 2. "Venisti ad fontem, ingressus es." The most detailed description of a baptismal font, is that given in the life of St. Sylvester, in the Bibl. Pap. of the so-called Anastasius (§ 37). This font is said to have been presented by Constantine the Great to the church of the Lateran, in which he is falsely recorded to have been baptized himself. The description is at any rate of value as indicating the decoration and arrangements of an early font. The cistern is stated to have been of porphyry, overlaid within and without with silver. In the middle of the font were two pillars of porphyry, carrying a golden dish, in which the Paschal lamp burnt, fed with balsam, and with an asbestos wick. A lamb of pure gold on the brim of the basin, and seven silver stags, in allusion to Ps. xlii. 1, poured out water; on either side of the lamb were silver statues of Christ, and the Baptist. The font erected by St. Innocent at the church of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, c. 410, was also ornamented with a silver stag, pouring out water (Anastas. § 57). Over the fonts, doves of silver or gold were sometimes suspended, in allusion to the circumstances of Christ's baptism. [E. V.]

FONT, BENEDICTION OF. In the 4th century, the ceremony of blessing the water to be used in baptism was already regarded as of high antiquity. Basil the Great, says expressly (De Spiritu S. c. 27), that the benediction of the baptismal water was one of the rites which the church had received from ecclesiastical tradition, not directly from Scripture; i.e. it was then of immemorial usage. The principal traces of it in the remains of early literature are the following.

The passage sometimes cited from the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 18), that Christ was baptized to purify the water, is very far from proving that any special benediction of the water took place at the time of baptism. Nor is it by any means certain that the heretics mentioned by Irenaeus (Haeres. i. 21, § 4), who poured oil and water over the head of those whom they baptized, did so as imitating the consecration of the water by pouring in chrism, as practised by the orthodox. But when Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 4), after speaking of the aboriginal consecration of the element of water at creation by the Spirit of GOD, goes on to say, "Therefore all waters acquire the blessing of consecration (sacramentum sanctificationis) from their primaeval prerogative, God being invoked (invocato Deo)," he probably alludes to a special invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the water which took place before baptism. Some years later, Cyprian (Epist. 70, c. 1) says that the water for baptism should first be cleansed and sanctified by the priest. So bishop Sedatus of Thuburbum (Sententiae Episc. n. 18, in Cyprian's Works), speaks of baptismal water consecrated by the prayer of the priest (aqua sacerdotis prece in ecclesia consecrata). The Arabic canons of Hippolytus (can. 19, p. 75, quoted by Probst, p. 77), direct the candidates for baptism to stand by the font of pure water made ready by benediction. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iii. 3) says that simple water, having uttered over it the invocation of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, acquires a power of holiness (ἀγιότητος). Ambrose (De iis qui initiuntur, c. 5) mentions exorcism, benediction, invocation of the Holy Trinity, and prayers. We have here, perhaps, the earliest distinct mention of the exorcism of the baptismal water. An example of the form of exorcism may be seen in BAPTISM, § 30, p. 158.

With regard to the form of benediction, we have already seen that Tertullian speaks of an invocation over the water. Probably the earliest form extant, which cannot be assumed with certainty to be older than the beginning of the 4th century, is that of the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 43), in which the priest, after a recitation of the mercies of God analogous to the PREFACE of the eucharistic office, proceeds, "Look down from heaven, and sanctify this water, and grant grace and power that he who is baptized according to the command of Thy Christ, may with Him be crucified and die and be buried and rise again to the adoption which is in Him, by dying unto sin, but living unto righteousness." Compare Dionysius Areop. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 2.

Another ceremony, the pouring in of chrism, generally so as to form a cross on the surface of the water, was probably of later introduction, though it is found at least as early as the 6th century [BAPTISM, p. 159]. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Mart. i. 23) after a curious description of the miraculous filling of certain fonts in Spain, proceeds to say that the water was sanctified by exorcism and sprinkled over with chrism; a passage which proves that in the time of Gregory (†594), the pouring in of chrism was regarded as a matter of course. And it may be mentioned in illustration, that according to Flo-doard's description of the baptism of Clovis (Hist. Remens. Eccl. i. 13), it was after the benediction of the font that chrism was found wanting, and supplied by the advent of the miraculous AMPULLA; on receiving which, St. Remi sprinkled the font with chrism (chrismate fontem conspersit).

In Mabillon's Vetus Missale Gallicanum (c. 25, p. 362), we find exhortation, prayer, exorcism of the water, preface, benediction of the font, another preface (called Conestatio Fontis) then the rubric, "Postea facis tres cruces de chrismo." In the Gallican Sacramentary printed by Martene (l. i. 18, ordo 3) from a MS. at Bobbio, a somewhat more explicit description is given of the making of the cross on the water with chrism, "Deinde in fonte chrismā decurrente signum † facis." And again (Martene, u. s. ordo 10), the priest "accipiens vas aureum cum chrismate fundit chrisma in fonte in modum crucis, et expandit aquae cum manu sua." It may be observed that in the Missale Aethiopicum quoted by Binterim (l. i. 86), where the threefold infusion of oil in the form of a cross is described, it is expressly stated to be unconsecrated oil (oleum non benedictum).

The description in Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 25) corresponds generally with that of these sacramentaries. Amalarius expressly mentions insufflation as one of the rites in EXORCISM [see that word]. After the expulsion of the evil spirit by exorcism, he simply says, "munitur aqua crucis signaculo," not distinctly mentioning the pouring in of chrism in the form of a cross.

In the Gregorian Sacramentary (pp. 71-73) is mentioned another rite, that of plunging tapers into the water to be consecrated. Two lighted tapers are carried before the bishop to the font; after the benediction, the aforesaid two tapers are plunged into the font, and the bishop "insufflates" on the water three times. After this the chrism is poured into the font, and the children are baptized. This dipping of the taper into the font is represented in the accompanying woodcut, from a Pontifical of the 9th century [compare the cut on p. 159], where however only one taper is given. The ceremony mentioned by Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 25) of plunging the tapers of the neophytes [BAPTISM, p. 162, § 59] into the font, seems to be distinct from this.

FOOTPRINTS ON SEPULCHRAL SLABS, AND SEAL RINGS. Sepulchral slabs have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, incised with footprints.^a The two feet as a rule point the same way, though sometimes, but rarely, they are turned in opposite directions (Fabretti, Inscript. Antiq. p. 472). A slab in the Kircherian Museum, given by Lupi (Epitaph. Sever. Martyr. p. 68), bears two pairs of footprints pointed contrary ways, as of a person going and returning (fig. 1). Some of these slabs are certainly Christian, though the fact in other cases is uncertain. A slab given by Boldetti (c. vii. p. 419), inscribed with ΙΑΝΟΥΡΙΑ ΕΝ Θ (Januaria in Deo) at one end, bears the sole of a foot, with IN DEO incised upon it, at the other. Perret gives a slab erected by a Christian husband to his wife, with a pair of footprints incised on it, not bare, as is customary, but shod in shoes or sandals (Catacombes, vol. v. pl. 26, No. 53). Sometimes but more rarely we find a single foot seen in profile (Ib. pl. 52, No. 37).

^a The white marble slab preserved in the church of St. Sebastian outside Rome, said to have been brought from the chapel of "Domine quo vadis," bearing the prints of two feet, piously believed to be those of our Blessed Lord, when met by St. Peter coming to be crucified a second time, in the city from which his apostle was fleeing, is probably nothing more than a sepulchral stone of the kind described above, round which the exquisitely beautiful legend, found first in Ambrose, has crystallized. It

The signification of this mark is much controverted. Boldetti (p. 507) and others regard the footprint as the symbol of possession, denoting that the burial-place had been purchased by the individual as his own. This view is based on the false etymology of "possessio," quasi "pedis positio," given by Paulus (Dig. 41, tit. 2, § 1), and probably needs no refutation.

The idea of Pelliccia (de Christ. Eccl. Polit. iii. 225) and Cavedoni (Ragguagli di mirum, dell' Art. Crist. p. 40) that a sense of their loss and a deep regret and affection for the departed was thus indicated, is a mere romantic fancy. More may be said for Lupi's view (u. s. p. 69), that as such emblems were sometimes dedicated as votive offerings by travellers on their return from a journey, they were intended on a Christian slab to indicate a holy thankfulness for the safe completion of the earthly pilgrimage of the departed. Another more prosaic, but by no means improbable, interpretation, especially of a single foot, is that found in Thomassinus (de Donariis, c. 7) and Fabretti (Inscript. c. vi. p. 467), quoted by Lupi (u. s.), that it was a thank-offering for recovery from gout or other disease affecting the foot.

should be remarked that the basilica of St. Sebastian was erected over one of the chief Christian cemeteries, that from which the name catacomb has been transferred to the rest, so that the presence of such a memorial slab is easily accounted for. In the church of St. Radekund at Poitiers a well defined footprint in the stone supposed to indicate the spot where our Saviour appeared to that saint, probably has a similar origin. The Roman remains at Poitiers are numerous. The footprints shown as our Lord's in the church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives mentioned by Augustine (in Joann. Hom. xlvii. 4; Jerome de locis Hebraic.; Beda de nom. loc. in Act. Apost.) are stated by Stanley (S. & P. p. 452) to be "nothing but a simple cavity in the rock with no more resemblance to a human foot than to anything else."

The same emblem is frequently found on seal rings. The sole of the foot bears sometimes the name of the owner, e.g., FORTVNIVS (Boldetti, p. 506; Perret, vol. iv. pl. xi. No. 4); IUSTVS (Airinghi, ii. 698; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii. No. 23), from the catacomb of St. Agnes; sometimes a Christian motto or device, e.g., SPES IN DEO (fig. 2) (Perret, u. s., No. 5), and the monogram of Christ (Ib. No. 6). In an example given by Perret (vol. iv. p. xxiii. No. 21), we see the stamp of such a seal bearing the sole of a foot, with PAVLI incised on it, five times repeated on the mortar in which a gilt glass had been embedded, in the catacomb of St. Sixtus. [E. V.]

FORGERY is a particular case of the offence called Falsum.

Falsum is any perversion or corruption of truth done with malice (dolo malo) to the prejudice of another. It may be committed either by word, as in the case of perjury; by act, as in the case of coining base money; or by writing, as in the case of forgery. In the case of the latter, the crime of falsum is equally committed whether a man has written a document which is not what it professes to be, or forged a seal or a signature, or erased or destroyed the whole or a portion of a document maliciously to the prejudice of another. Falsum was punished under the empire by deportation, or even (in extreme cases) by death (Codex Theod. lib. ix. tit. 19, ll. 1 et 2). The special precautions taken by the authorities of the church against the forgery of ecclesiastical documents seem to belong to a later period than that with which we are concerned; but no doubt the falsarius, like other offenders against the laws of truth and justice, incurred ecclesiastical censures. (Ferraris, Bibliotheca Prompta, s. v. Falsum; Bingham's Antiq. xvi. xii. 14.) [C.]

FORMA. An impression or representation, as (for instance) the stamp on coins, whether effigy or mark.

(1.) It is used for the impression of a seal; and it seems highly probable that literae formatae [COMMENDATORY LETTERS, DIMISSORY LETTERS], derived their name from the fact that seals were appended to them. Sirmond quotes a Vatican gloss which interprets the term "formatæ epistola" by "sigillata," and the Greek interpreter of the 23rd canon of the Codex Eccl. Afric. [3 Carth. c. 28], renders "formatam" by τετυγµένην, clearly in the sense of "sealed." The second council of Châlons (c. 41), testifies to the fact that seals were appended to such documents.

And not only is the word formata used absolutely for a sealed official document, but forma came to be used in the same sense. Thus Capitolinus describes Antoninus as consulting his friends before he drew up authoritative documents (formas); and the word is similarly used by Christian writers (Ducange, s. vv. Forma, Formatae).

(2.) From the same use of the word Forma for an effigy or stamp, it arises that the word Formata designates the formed or stamped bread used in the Holy Eucharist. The Ordo Romanus in the rite for the consecration of a bishop has the following; "cum autem venerit ad communicandum Dominus Pontifex porrigit ei formatam atque sacratam oblationem integram." Ménard takes this to mean an "epistola formata;" but it seems in the highest degree improbable that the consecrator would present an official document to the newly-ordained bishop at the moment of communicating, and Ducange (s. v. Formata) has shown that the word is elsewhere used to designate the eucharistic bread.

(3.) The word Forma is also used to designate the seats or stalls used by clerks or monks when saying their offices in choir. The gloss on the rule of St. Benedict (De Suppellect.) explains Forma as "sella arcuata, θρόνος." The desk in front of such a stall, on which its occupant might lean, seems to be sometimes called formula (Supplec. Lib. Monach. Fuld. Car. Magno, c. 5, in Migne's Patrol. cv. p. 419; compare Gregory of Tours, De Glor. Confess. c. 92; Hist. Franc. viii. 31). [C.]

FORMARIUS, the person in a monastery who was especially appointed to promote the spiritual welfare of the brethren, and to be a model of life to them, "qui in bonis sit forma" (Regula S. Ferreoli, c. 17); an elder brother fitted to benefit the souls of the monks, who should studiously devote himself to watching over them (Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 58). The corresponding person in a monastery of women was called Formaria (Reg. S. Caesarii ad Virginis, c. 37; Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

FORMATA. [FORMA.]

FORNICATION (Fornicatio, πορνεία) is defined to be "copula carnalis soluti cum soluta"; a sin committed by two persons, male and female, who are not connected by blood within the prohibited degrees of kindred, and are neither married nor contracted. This is in substance, Augustine's definition (Quaest. in Deuteron. n. 37). The older definitions of fornication seem to refer almost entirely to the freedom of the woman from the marriage bond, without regard to the condition of the man [ADULTERY]. Thus Basil (ad Amphibloch. c. 21) regards the sin of a married man with an unmarried woman as simple πορνεία, not μοιχεία; and Gregory of Nyssa (Epist. Canonica) defines fornication to be a gratification of lust which takes place without wronging another; which words Balsamon (in loco) explains to mean, intercourse with a woman who is not married (Πορνεία λέγεται ἡ χωρὶς ἀδικίας ἑτέρου μζεις, ἡγγουν ἡ πρὸς ἐλευθέραν ἀνδρὸς γυναῖκα). To the same effect Theophylact (on St. Matt. v. 32) says that fornication is committed with a woman not under marriage bond (εἰς ἀπολευμήν). Ambrose, however, lays down the wider and truer principle, "nec viro licet quod mulieri non licet; eadem a viro quae ab uxore debetur castimonia" (De Patriarch. i. 4). Concubinage, the continued cohabitation of an unmarried man with an unmarried woman, is a special case of fornication.

The word fornicatio is also used to designate all kinds of sexual sin and unnatural crime; see, for instance, Theodore's Penitential, I. ii. Fornication in this wider sense is commonly called luxury by later canonists.

It was one of the first cares of the apostolic church to repress this evil held so venial among the Gentiles (Acts xv. 20; 1 Cor. vi. 18; Eph. v. 3, 5); nor were the rulers of the church in later times less anxious to put down all forms of uncleanness. Basil (ad Amphil. c. 22) lays down the rule, that men practising concubinage after seduction should be excluded from communion for four years, in the first of which they are to be excluded from the prayers, and weep at the door of the church; in the second to be received as hearers; in the third to penitence (εἰς μετάνοιαν); in the fourth to attend divine service with the congregation, abstaining from the offering; and then to be admitted to communion of the good (κοινωνίαν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ). In the case of concubinage, the great bishop evidently feels that the times will not bear due severity. He holds (ad Amph. c. 26) that it is best that persons living together in fornication should be separated; but if they persist in living together, "let them be warned of the penalty of fornication; but let them not be meddled with (ἀφίσθωσαν), lest a worse thing come upon them." So previously (c. 21) he acknowledges the difficulty of treating certain cases, and confesses that custom is too strong to be contended against. For fornicators in general he enjoins (Ib. c. 59) seven years' exclusion from the sacraments; two among the Plentes, two among the Aulientes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes [PENITENCE].

The treatment of sins of uncleanness occupies a large, perhaps an undue space in later Penitentials; as (e.g.) in those of Theodore (I. ii.), Bede, (c. 3), Egbert (cc. 2 and 4), Halitgar (i. 16, 17), and others.

Periods of penance are prescribed, varying according to the condition of the offender, and the nature of the offence. The offence of a cleric was naturally more heinous than that of a simple lay person, and might be punished by degradation, as well as by the same kind of penalties as those inflicted on the laity. And it is evident from the repeated denunciations of such sins by bishops and councils, and the elaborate provision made to separate the clergy and the monks from the society of women, that the celibate clergy were only too liable to fall into the sin of incontinence (Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Discip. I. ii. 61, §§ 8-12). [C.]

FORUM. [JURISDICTION.]

FOSSARII or FOSSORES. The grave-diggers or sextons of early Christian antiquity were known by these designations. [COPIATAE; DECANUS.]

Padre Marchi has drawn a very definite picture of guilds of fossores, organized under special regulations, attached to each of the tituli of Rome, and acting under the directions of the bishops and presbyters. (Monum. Primit. pp. 87-91.) But the evidence he adduces is of the slightest texture; and the good father probably did not intend his description to be regarded as more than a pleasing hypothesis.

The term fossor is of frequent occurrence in the inscriptions of the catacombs. Marchi, p. 91, gives several epitaphs of fossores. Boldetti, i. 15, gives the following from St. Callistus: "Sergius et Junius Fossores || B. N. M. in pace bisom." But the most common appearance of the term is in the later epitaphs, which testify to the purchase of graves from individuals of this class. The burial of the departed was probably at first a work of Christian charity, performed without fee or reward by their surviving brethren. Afterwards, when the church had become more numerous, it was carried out at the public expense under the special care of the presbyters of the tituli of Rome. When Christianity became the established religion, the fossores evidently established a kind of property in the catacombs, which authorized them to sell graves either to living persons for their own burial, or to the friends of the deceased. This state of things seems to have had a wide-spread but transient existence. The examples are almost innumerable in which the purchase of graves of the fossores is plainly stated in the epitaph. No trace of such bargains appears before the latter years of the 4th century, nor later than the first quarter of the 5th century. According to De Rossi (R. S. i. p. 216), the last known mention of fossores is A.D. 426. As examples of these bargains, belonging to the time when interment had become the private enterprise of the fossores, and Christian burial had been degraded into a trade, we may refer to the instances already given under CATACOMBS. The eager craving after sepulture in the proximity of the holy dead, to which some of these epitaphs bear witness, has been the cause of the destruction of many paintings of high interest. The fossores could not afford to have a taste either archaeological or artistic, and pierced the painted walls to make new highly-priced loculi, as recklessly as the exquisite carved work of so many of our cathedrals has been cut away for the erection of tasteless monuments.

the frescoes of the catacombs. (Bosio, pp. 305, 335, 339, 373; Aringhi, ii. pp. 23, 63, 67, 161.)

Bottari, tom. ii. tav. 118, gives two pictures from the catacomb of Marcellinus and Peter. One represents a young man, his beard closely shaven, in a short tunic, girt round his waist, his legs and feet bare, excavating the rock with his pick, a lamp hanging by his side. The other depicts an older man in a long tunic, not at work, holding a lamp affixed to a long handle ending in a sharp point, and a little below on the shaft a hook for suspension.

The most curious and interesting of these representations is that of a fossor named Diogenes, from the cemetery of Callistus (see woodcut).

He wears a tunic marked with gammadia on its hem, carries a pick over his right shoulder, and a lamp in his left hand, and is surrounded by a heap of levers, picks, and other tools employed in his work. Above is the inscription: "Diogenes Fossor in pace depositus Octabu Kalendaris Octobris." (Boldetti, lib. i. cap. 15; Bottari, tom. ii. p. 126, tav. 99.) A fossor's pick has been discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of Callistus, much oxidised, but still recognizable. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 281.) [E. V.]

FOUNDATION. [ENDOWMENT; PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.]

FOUNDER. [PATRON.]

FOUNDLINGS (Alumni). Compare EXPOSING OF INFANTS.

From an early period the church provided ORPHANAGES [see the word] for the reception of children left destitute by the death or desertion of their parents. But, independently of such institutions, it also maintained a large number by appeals to individual charity, and exhorted the faithful to feed and shelter the innocent creatures in their own houses. The number of these alumni, "nurslings," was large; the rescue of a deserted infant being considered as an act specially inspired by Christian charity. The word alumnus consequently occurs much oftener in Christian than in pagan inscriptions. Sometimes we find the adopting parents raising a tomb to their alumnus (Perret, Catacombs, v. xlv. 13). In the cemetery of Pontianus the name of a young person departed is inscribed upon a circular ivory tablet thus: EMERINVS || VICTORINAE || ALVMINAE SVAE (Fabretti, In- script. Antiq. iii. 331). In other instances the titulus is a token of the child's gratitude to his benefactors, whom he calls father and mother (Perret, xlii. 4). FELICISSIMVS ALVMNVS in the following inscription expresses the happiness of the adopted son under the care of his tutelary parents.

ANTONIVS DISCOLIVS FILIVS ET BIBIVS
FELICISSIMVS ALVMNVS VALERIE CRESTENTI
MATRI BIDVE ANNORVM XIII. INTERIANTOS.

De Rossi (Inscript. Christ. i. 46) gives the epitaph of an alumnus of the date A.D. 340. Le Blant (Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule), mentions an inscription at Trèves to the memory of an alumna who survived only one month and a few days. Infants were generally exposed at the doors of churches (Conc. Arles II. can. 51, A.D. 451).

A person wishing to adopt an exposed child was required to place in the hands of the minister of the church near which it was found a written statement giving the sex of the child with the time and place of its discovery, in order that it might be restored to its parents if they wished to reclaim it. If no such claim were put forward within ten days after its exposure, the child belonged by right to those who had given it shelter (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., s. v. Enfants Trouvés). FOUNTAIN OR WELL. [See ROCK, and EVANGELISTS, REPRESENTATIONS OF.] Our Lord is represented (in Bottari, tav. xvi.; Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. vi. et passim) as the Source of the Gospel and Fons Pietatis, from under whose feet flow the four Rivers of Paradise. [See FOUR RIVERS.] In the Lateran [CROSS, p. 496] and other baptismal crosses the Holy Dove is the fount or source from which the sacred rivers flow. The well springing in the wilderness is rather a Hebrew, Arab, or universally Eastern image, than a specially Christian one. In some early baptisms of our Lord, as that in the ancient baptistery of Ravenna, the river-god or presiding deity of the source of Jordan is introduced. FOUNTAINS AT THE ENTRANCE OF CHURCHES. The natural symbolism which required external purity in the worshippers, as an index of the cleanness of heart necessary for approaching God with acceptance, dictated the erection of fountains or cisterns of water in the atria, or forecourts of the primitive churches, for the people to wash their hands, feet, and faces, before they entered the sacred building. Such a fountain was known by different designations, κρήνη (Euseb. H.E. x. 4; Chrys. Hom. 57, Ed. Savil.), φρέαρ (Socr. H.E. ii. 38), πίδαλη (Paul. Silentiari. ii. vers. 177), ἐμβάτης (Theophanes), κοιταβείον (Eucholog.), Cantharus (Paul. Nolan. Ep. xlii. xxxii.), Nymphaeum (Anastas. § 69). The earliest notice we have of this arrangement is in Eusebius' description of the church erected by Paulinus at Tyre (Euseb. H.E. x. 4). He speaks of "fountains" being placed as "symbols of purification" in the centre of the cloistered atrium, affording means of cleansing to those who were going into the church. A similar basin was erected by Paulinus of Nola, in the atrium of the basilica of St. Felix, its purpose being expressed by the following verses over one of the arches of the opposite cloister—

"Sancta nitens famulis interluit atria lymphis Cantharus, intrantumque manus lavat amne ministro."
Paul. Nolan. Ep. 32 ad Sever.

This "cantharus" was protected by a brazen canopy, or turret of lattice work—

"Quem cancellato tegit aerea culmine turris."
Paulin. Poem. 28 (Nat. x.)

Other brazen basins supplied from the same source stood in different parts of the forecourt, as well as a row of marble basins, conchae, at the entrance of the church (ib.).

Paulinus also describes a "cantharus" in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome (Ep. 13, p. 73), "ministra manibus et oris nostris fluentia ructantem." This was covered by a dome or tholus, of brass, supported on four columns, typifying the fountain of living water flowing from the four gospels, the foundation of the evangelical faith. This cantharus and its quadriporticus were adorned with marbles and mosaic by Symmachus, c. 500, who also erected another external fountain below the steps of the atrium for the convenience of the people thronging thither "ad usum necessitatis humanae" (Anastas. de Vit. Pont. § 79). Another was placed by Leo III. c. 800, outside the silver gates of the same basilica (ib. § 360). The popes vied with one another in the magnificence of these fountains. Leo the Great, c. 450, placed a very remarkable one in the atrium of the basilica of St. Paul, on the Ostian way, for the supply of which he recovered a long-lost spring, as recorded in the verses of Ennodius.

"Perdiderat laticum longaeva incuria cursus
Quos tibi nunc pleno cantharus ore vomit.
Provida pastoris per totum cura Leonis
Ennod. Carm. 149, ed. Simmond.

Anastasius also describes a "nymphaeum" erected by Hilarus, c. 465, in the triporticus of the oratory of St. Cross, adorned with columns of vast size, and pillars of porphyry from apertures in which the water flowed into a porphyry basin (Anastas. u. s. § 69). Ennodius also (u. s.) speaks of the water of the baptistery of St. Stephen coming through the columns, "per columnas." In other cases the water issued from a statue in the centre, sometimes of grotesque form, or from lions' mouths, from which arrangement the basin erected by Justinian in front of St. Sophia at Constantinople was called λεοντόριον (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. c. 22). This fountain was made of jasper, with incised crosses. There were other smaller basins in the cloisters for the lustrations of the people (Ducange, u. s.). A cantharus discovered at Constantinople bore the palindrome given by Gruter (Inscript. p. 1046).

ΝΙΨΩΝ ΑΝΟΜΗΜΑ ΜΗ ΜΟΝΑΝ ΟΨΙΝ.

These fountains were usually supplied with water from running springs, as that at St. Paul's already mentioned. Where springs were absent, the supply came from rain water tanks, as at the basilica of St. Felix at Nola (Paul. Nolan. Poem. 27 (Nat. ix.) v. 463, sq.).

Such fountains were solemnly consecrated and blessed on the annual recurrence of the vigil of the Epiphany (identified in primitive times with the day of our Lord's baptism, when the element of water was hallowed, Chrys. Homil. in Bapt. Christ. vol. ii. p. 369, Montf.), or of the festival itself (Ducange, u. s.). The office is given in the Euchologion.

We find frequent reference in the early fathers to this custom of washing the hands and face before entering the church, e.g. Tertull. de Orat. c. 11; Chrysost. Homil. 51, in Matt.; in Joann. 72; Homil. 3, in Ephes.; in Psalms. 140, ad Pop. Ant. 36, &c. Cf. also Baronius, ad ann. 57, No. 106-110. [HOLY WATER.]

FOUR RIVERS, THE. In ancient art our Lord is frequently represented, either in person or under the figure of a lamb, standing upon a hillock from whence issue four streams of water. (See woodcut.) These are supposed by many to signify the four rivers of Eden, which went forth to water the earth (Gen. ii. 10); others (Cyprian, Ep. 73, § 10, ad Jubaen.; Bede, Expos. in Gen. II.; Theodoret, In Psalm. XLV.; Ambrose, De Paradiso, c. 3) discern in them the four gospels, flowing from the source of eternal life to spread throughout the world the riches and the life-giving powers of the doctrine of Christ. St. Ambrose again (u. s.) is of opinion that the four rivers are emblems of the four cardinal virtues. The four first oecumenical councils, so often by early writers placed on a par with the gospels themselves, are sometimes compared to the four rivers of Paradise. Jesse, bishop of Amiens in the eighth century, in writing to his clergy, thus illustrates the veneration due to these ancient assemblies (Longueval, Hist. de l'Egl. Gallicane, tom. v. p. 144).

In several sarcophagi of ancient Gaul, we find two stags quenching their thirst at these streams; these are supposed to represent Christians partaking in the gospels and the eucharist of the "well of water springing up into everlasting life." [CROSS, p. 496.] The two stags are occasionally found in mosaics, in that of the ancient Vatican for example (Ciampini, De Sacr. Aedif. tab. xlii.).

However we explain it, this subject was extremely popular in the primitive church; we find it repeated over and over again in the catacombs, either in frescoes or in the sculptured ornaments of sarcophagi, and sometimes on the bottoms of glass cups, which have been discovered therein. It appears also in the mosaics of some basilicas, for instance, in that which is described by Paulinus (Epist. 32, ad Sever.), and in that mentioned by Florus, deacon of Lyons (Mabillon, Analecta, p. 416, ed. Peiron. See also Ciampini, Vel. Mon. ii. tab. xxxvii. xli. xlix. lii., &c.). To illustrate this passage of Paulinus,

"Petram superstat ipse Petra Ecclesiae De qua sonori quatuor fontes meant,"

Rosweid refers to the mosaic of St. John Lateran, and the sarcophagus of Probus and Proba, as represented by Bosio. We are informed by Spon (Recherches curieuses, p. 34) that the four rivers of Paradise in human form, with their names beneath, are represented in mosaic on the pavement of Rheims Cathedral (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret.). [C.]

FRACTION. The rite of breaking the bread in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist is technically so called. There are three kinds of fractions, which are in use at the present time; though but one of them is essential to the sacrament, and can be traced with certainty to the infancy of the church. The three are, (1) a fraction illustrative of the words of institution, and therefore a direct imitation of our Lord's action, (2) purely symbolical fractions after the consecration has been completed, (3) the necessary fraction for the distribution of the bread among the communicants.

(1) The first of these has a place in the English office, the celebrant being ordered to "break the bread" while he utters the words, "He brake it." Nothing could be more natural than that in reciting the words of institution, the priest should "suit the action to the word," and break the bread as "He brake it." It is very probable, therefore, that this was a common, if not the universal, practice, in what we may call the first ritual period. Traces of it are found both in the East and West. In the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil, the celebrant is ordered at those words to "break the oblation into three parts;" but he is at once to reunite them, "so that they be in a manner as not divided." (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. p. 15.) They are put together again with a view to a later and purely symbolical fraction. There is but one extant Latin missal, which is reported to contain an order for the actual fraction at this time, viz., that of Rheims, of the middle of the 16th century, in which the following rubric occurs, "Dicens fregit frangit modicum." (De Vert, Explication des Cérémonies de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 262.) In our own country the missals of

* This figure is also given at p. 406.

Sarum and York to the last ordered the celebrant to "touch the host," while a manuscript Manual in the possession of the Rev. W. J. Blew goes further, and prescribes "the sign of a fraction." The frequency of the latter custom in England may be likewise inferred from its condemnation by John de Burgo, A.D. 1385 (Pupilla Oculi, pars iv. cap. x.), and its prohibition in the Manual authorised by Cardinal Pole in the reign of Mary. The foregoing facts are mentioned because they appear to support the antecedent probability that the fraction, which is now peculiar to the English and Coptic liturgies, was once general. The reason for giving it up need not be sought for. When the bread was once broken, it would not be possible for the priest to perform the subsequent symbolical fraction, introduced at a later period, with the same convenience and effect.

(2) From an early period we find other ceremonial fractions, more or less elaborate, employed, the evident intention of which was to develop and enforce the devotional allusion to our Lord's sufferings on the cross. No fraction of any kind is mentioned in St. Cyril's account of the liturgy of Jerusalem (Catechesis Mystag. v. cc. 17, 18), nor in the Clementine liturgy, which exhibits the ritual and worship of the 3rd or 4th century. [APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.] In that of St. Mark, which from its long disuse has undergone less change than any other which was ever in actual use, the fraction for distribution is alone mentioned (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 162). In St. James, which is still used at stated times, and has been much altered in the course of ages, the celebrant "breaks the bread, and holds half in his right hand, half in his left, and dips that in the right in the cup, saying, 'the union of the all-holy body and the precious blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ.'" (Assemani, tom. v. p. 54.) In the Office of Prothesis in the common Greek liturgy, there is a preparation of the bread by the aid of a knife (ἀόγχη), accompanied by symbolical allusions. [PROTHESIS.] After the Sanctus Sanctis, which follows close upon the consecration, "The priest dividing it ('the holy loaf') into four parts with care and reverence says 'The Lamb of God, the Son of the Father, is dismembered and divided, &c.' Then he takes the uppermost part of the holy loaf (which is stamped with the letters ΙϞ, for 'Ἰησοῦς'), and holds it in his hand, and the deacon pointing with his oration to the holy cup, says, 'Fill, Master, the holy cup.' And the priest says, 'The fulness of faith of the Holy Ghost.' And he makes the sign of the cross and casts it into the holy cup" (Euchologium, Goar, pp. 60, 81, 175). These rites, though not perhaps in their present form precisely, must have been in use before the separation of the Nestorians and Eutychians from the church; but whether they were known to St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, the alleged remodellers of the Greek liturgy, it is impossible to say. On the first part of the foregoing ceremony, Symeon of Thessalonica, the mystical expositor of that rite, observes, "He divides the bread into four parts, and these he arranges in the form of a cross, and in this he beholds Jesus crucified." De Templo &c. printed in Goar, p. 228. In the Coptic liturgies the rite is still more elaborate. There is first a special prayer, Prooemium ante fractionem, preceding it; which is in fact an act of thanksgiving, and is called a Benediction in the office itself. After crossing both the bread and the cup with a finger dipped in the latter, he says a "Prayer of Fraction." Later on, in preparation for the communion, "he divides the body into three parts, as he had done before at the words He brake it;" but this time transversely to the former fractures. The piece from the middle of the Corban is the largest, and from this he takes a small piece (Ischodicon, or in the Greek Alexandrian liturgies Σπουδικόν, corruptions of Δεσποτικόν, the Lord's body), which he sets aside. The larger piece from which it is taken is put in the middle of the paten, and the other eight are placed about it so as to form a cross. The allusion to the Passion is thus expressed by an act rather than by words. The priest next breaks up, in prescribed order, all but the large piece in the middle, and "collects about that the holy body which he has broken." The Ischodicon is put into the cup; a rite corresponding to the Commixtio of the West. The fraction now described, into which a devout priest could evidently infuse great solemnity is common to the three Coptic liturgies; which fact implies that the former fraction at the words He brake it is so also; although it is only prescribed in that of St. Basil. (See Renaudot, tom. i. pp. 19-23; and Gabriel's Ritualis, ibid. p. 258.) Whether the same ceremonies were observed in the Greek liturgies of Egypt cannot be decided, owing to the brevity of the rubrics and the absence of commentaries; but the Coptic of St. Basil carries us up to a period earlier than the conquest of Amrou in the 7th century. The rubrics of the Ethiopic liturgy do not prescribe any fraction, but as it was derived from the Coptic, and retains the Coptic Oratio Fractionis, we may infer that it had a solemn fraction similar to that which we have described.

In the Syrian rite the priest (in a short office of Prothesis) "divides the bread into as many pieces as may be necessary, censes them, and sets them on the altar, saying, 'He was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep, &c.'" (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 3.) After the consecration he breaks a small piece off with the words, "Thou art Christ our God, who on the top of Golgotha in Jerusalem wast pierced in Thy side for us, &c.," or something conveying the same allusion. (Ibid. pp. 22, 40, &c.) Before the communion he dips this particle (pearl) "into the chalice and signs the rest with it crosswise, saying, 'The Blood of the Lord is sprinkled on His Body, in the Name of the Father,'" etc. The pearl thus used is then put into the chalice with a prayer alluding to the union of the Godhead and Manhood in Christ (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 3, 41). Another symbolical action, viz. that of touching the body in the paten with the moistened pearl, is not marked in the rubrics. It is done in allusion to the piercing of our Lord's side with a spear (Barsalibi, ibid. p. 111). Among the Nestorians the consecrated oblate is broken into two parts. One of these is laid on the paten, and with the other the priest crosses the cup. He then dips the latter to the middle in the cup, and "signs with it the body which is in the paten." Both signs are made with appropriate words. He then unites the two pieces of the oblate; and it is here that we find the passion symbolized, the wounded and bleeding body of our blessed Lord being evidently represented by the broken and wine-stained bread. He further with his right thumb crosses the oblate "so as to make a slight crack in it, where it has been dipped in the blood, and puts a part of it into the chalice in the form of a cross." (Renaud. tom. ii. p. 594.) The Armenian celebrant breaks the oblate into two parts over the chalice, saying, "The fulness of the Holy Ghost. Then dividing one part into three he casts them into the chalice of the blood in the form of a cross" (Le Brun, Explication de la Messe, Diss. x. Art. xx.).

There are no directions for any fraction in the early Roman sacramentaries, nor for the commixture which now follows the symbolical fraction; but in the first Ordo Romanus, a directory of worship of the 8th century, if not earlier, we find the following method prescribed. The bishop (for a pontifical celebration is described) "breaks an oblate on the right side, and leaves on the altar the piece (particulam) which he breaks off." It is explained that this is done "in order that the altar be not without sacrifice," while the mass is performed, a piece (fermentum) reserved from a former celebration, and placed on the altar before the service began, having just before been put into the chalice. This is the only fraction before that for distribution, and there is nothing to give it a symbolical character (Ordo Rom. i. § 19, p. 13). There appears to have been no symbolical or merely ritual fraction in the primitive liturgy of Milan, although for "many ages" an oblate has been broken before the Lord's Prayer, with the words, "Thy Body is broken, O Christ," etc. (Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vet. Diss. c. x. tom. i. col. 134). An anthem, called Confractorium, is sung during this fraction, but with no special reference to the Passion (Pamelii Liturgicon, tom. i. p. 304). There is some evidence of a symbolical fraction in the Gallican church before its liturgy was tyrannically suppressed by Adrian I. and Charlemagne. In an exposition of the old Gallican liturgy written by Germanus bishop of Paris, A.D. 555, or one of his disciples, we read, "The confraction and commixture of the body of the Lord was set forth of old by the holy fathers" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. c. iv.; Art. xii. Ord. i.). The sacramentaries are without rubrics; but several of the prayers, post secreta, which were said immediately after the fraction, refer expressly to the sufferings of the cross. Thus, for example, in the Missale Gothicum in the Post Secreta for Christmas: "We believe, O Lord, Thy Advent; we commemorate Thy Passion. For Thy Body was broken (confractum) in the remission of our sins; Thy holy Blood was shed for the price of our redemption" (Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, p. 192). In the semi-Oriental ritual of Gothic Spain and Gallia Narbonensis, the priest broke the oblate in halves and divided one-half into five parts, the other into four. He then formed a cross with seven of them, putting five in a line to make the stem, and one on each side of the second from the top to make the arms. Each piece had a name given it. The uppermost in the stem was called Corporatio (i.e. Incarnation). Then followed in order Nativitas, Circumcisio, Apparitio (Epiphany), Passio. The piece which formed the left arm of the cross (taken from the spectator) was called Mors; that on the right Resurrectio. The two remaining pieces Gloria and Regnum were placed in the paten below Resurrectio in a line with it. See the illustration below. Thus the whole course of our Lord's being, acting, and suffering in the flesh, with the fruits of it, was in a manner represented (Missale Mixtum dictum Mozarabes, ed. Leslie, pp. 5, 6, 230-1).

	Corporatio
Mors	Nativitas	Resurrectio
	Circumcisio	Gloria
	Apparitio	Regnum
	Passio

In some of the ancient liturgies the fraction now described took place before, and in some, after the Lord's Prayer which followed, or more properly closed, the prayer of consecration. In the Greek, Roman, and Egyptian St. Mark it comes after. In the Gallican (Liturg. Gall. p. 192), the Milanese, Mozarabic, Coptic, and apparently in all the Syrian liturgies (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 22, 38, 131, 138, etc.) it comes before. To these we may add the Ethiopic, but, in that liturgy, as in our own, the Lord's Prayer is said after the communion (Renaud. tom. i. p. 518).

(3) The earliest notices of, or allusions to, a fraction refer only to the necessary division of the bread for distribution among the communicants. St. Augustine: "That which is on the Lord's Table . . . is blessed and hallowed, and broken small (comminuitur) for distribution" (Epist. cxlix. ad Paulin. § 16). Clement of Alexandria: "Some having divided the eucharist according to custom, permit every one of the people to take his own share" (Stromata, L. i. c. i. § 5). Pseudo-Dionysius: "Having exposed to view the bread that was covered and undivided, and divided it into many parts, and having divided the oneness of the cup unto all, he symbolically multiplies and distributes unity." Again: "Bringing into sight the covered gifts, and dividing their oneness into many parts . . . he makes those who partake to have communion (with each other) in them" (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. iii. § iii. nn. 12, 13). In the liturgy of St. Mark, in immediate preparation for the communion, "the priest breaks the bread, and says, Praise ye God in [i.e. Psalm cl. as in the Septuagint]. The priest divides the bread, saying to those present [i.e. to the deacons, &c. who assist], The Lord shall bless and minister with you," &c. Then, after a few versicles entirely free from any mystical allusion, he communicates. In St. James the later Greek rite of putting the bread into the chalice has been adopted. "When he distributes a single portion into each chalice, he says, A holy portion of Christ, full of grace and truth, of the Father and the Holy Ghost, to whom be glory, &c. Then he begins to divide [i.e. the bread in the chalices with a spoon], and to say, The Lord is my Shepherd," &c. (Ps. xxiii.). In the common Greek rite, a second part of the prepared loaf which is stamped XC (for Χριστός) is divided for the communion of the priest and his assistants, who receive the elements separately. The other two (marked NI and KA; see ELEMENTS, p. 603) are also divided according to the number of the other communicants, and put into the chalice. As intinction began to appear in Spain in the 7th century (see Can. ii. Conc. Braccar. Labb. tom. vi. col. 563), the method of fraction now described as attendant on it was probably in use among the Greeks so early as the 6th. In the 4th and 5th we find Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria, still recognizing the practice of receiving in the hand (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 632, and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 416), which is incompatible with intinction. We have already described the last fraction in the Coptic liturgy. The rubrics do not specify any further preparation for the communion. Nor are those of the Ethiopic, Armenian, or Syriac more explicit. The last named liturgy, however, may receive illustration from the Nestorian, in which "another fraction of the same Host into lesser particles for the distribution of the communion" is expressly ordered, though no method is prescribed (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 595, 611).

In the West the Mozarabic priest preparing for the communion put "particle" called Regnum into the chalice, received himself that called Gloria, and if any others received must, it is presumed, have used the remainder for their communion, breaking them up as the number of communicants might require. We say presumed, for the present rubrics, which recognize but one Host, divided as before described, direct him afterwards to consume all the particles in order. The tract of Eldefonsus, printed by Mabillon in an appendix to his dissertation De Pene Eucharistico (Analecta Vetera, p. 549), prescribes the use of several Hosts, the number varying with the festival or season. We have no information respecting the early practice of the Gallican and Italian churches. In an Ordo Romanus which probably carries us up to the 7th century, and certainly to the 8th, the last fraction is thus described. The bishop of Rome, it should be said, is the chief officiant. "Then the acolytes go behind the bishops about the altar; the rest go down to the presbyters; that they may break the Hosts [which were then small loaves]. A paten goes before near the throne, two regionary subdeacons carrying it to the deacons, that they may break. But they look on the face of the pontiff that he may give the signal to break.

And when he has given it by a motion of the head, having again saluted the pontiff, they break them" (Ordd. Rom. i. ii. iii. pp. 14, 49, 59). [W. E. S.]

FRANKFORT, COUNCIL OF (Francofordiense concilium), held at Frankfort, A.D. 794, "by favour of God, authority of the pope, and command of Charlemagne, who was present and attended by all the bishops of the kingdom of France and Italy, with the province of Aquitaine" (300 in number, according to later writers), as we read in the first of the fifty-six canons ascribed to it. From the same canon we learn that the first thing discussed in it was the heresy of the Spanish prelates Felix and Elipand, since called Adoptionism, which was condemned; and from the second canon that a decree of a recent synod of the Greeks, visiting all with anathema who would not worship and serve the images of the saints as they would the Trinity, was repudiated as well as condemned. This is about all we know of what passed at Frankfort; at any rate we have no direct authentic record extant of its proceedings beyond its canons. And of these the second has been made a subject of hot controversy both in ancient and modern times. Contemporaries aver that bishops Theophylact and Stephen (without naming their sees) represented pope Adrian at Frankfort, and that the council repudiated there was that "falsely called the 7th." In the modern heading to this council, on the other hand, it is asserted that "the acts of the 2nd Nicene council respecting images were confirmed there." There are four dogmatic epistles printed in the collections of councils as having emanated from Frankfort. (1) A letter from pope Adrian to the bishops of Spain. (2) Another from the bishops of Italy against Elipand. This is better known as "the sacrosyllabus" of Paulinus of Aquileia, but it is said to have been published at Frankfort, and sent by order of the council into Spain. (3) A third is from the bishops of France and Germany to the bishops of Spain. (4) A fourth from Charlemagne to Elipand and the rest of the Spanish bishops. In this the three preceding are stated to have been sent by him after holding a council, and conferring with the pope on the subject of which they treat, without however naming Frankfort. Still, after reading the 1st canon of Frankfort, we may not doubt their having been brought out there. As little can we doubt another work having been brought out there also, for the light it throws upon canon 2. The title given originally to this work was "the capitulary respecting images;" but it is in four books, now known as the "Caroline." It has been ascribed to Alcuin, Angilbert, and Angilram in turn; it is ascribed to Alcuin still (Bibl. Eccl. Germ. tom. vi. 220). What it says of itself (Pref.) is, that it was jointly composed by Charlemagne and his prelates in refutation of two councils "held in the parts of Bithynia" (both calling themselves the seventh); one iconoclastic (that of Constantinople, A.D. 754), the other in favour of images (the 2nd Nicene, A.D. 787), and within three years of this last (or four years before it was brought out). But, in reality, there was no need of refuting the first of them, as this had been already done by the last (Art. Conc. Nic. ii.). The last alone;

therefore, now stood for refutation. "De cuius destructione," says Hincmar (in causâ Hinc. l. c. 20), "non modicum volumen, quod in palatio adolescentulus legi, ab eodem imperatore Romanus est per quendam episcopum missum"—and then follows a reference to c. 28 of the fourth book, which identifies it at once. Further, not only was it sent to Rome, but it elicited a formal reply from the pope, as pope, vindicating in detail the teaching of the 2nd Nicene council which he had confirmed himself (Mansi xiii. 759 and seq.). In this work it is the 2nd Nicene council accordingly which is attacked all through: the creed of Pelagius the heretic (St. Aug. Op. x. App. pt. ii. Ed. Ben.) is paraded in the opening c. of the 3rd book as St. Jerome's, and called "the tradition of the Catholic faith in its integrity," in opposition to that of the 2nd Nicene council, which is attacked further on for wanting the "Filioque" clause (c. 8): while c. 17 of the same book unravels the statement of canon 2 of this council, by shewing that what is condemned there as having been decreed by the 2nd Nicene council under anathema, was no more than the informal utterance of one of the bishops who spoke there, named Constantinus. If the pope then was really represented at Frankfort by his legates, they must have left after the condemnation of Adoptionism, or, at all events, before this canon was framed. Most of the other canons, indeed, are couched in a style of their own, "Statutum," or "definitum est a Domino Rege, et a sanctâ synodo." The 33rd canon runs thus: "Ut Catholica fides sanctae Trinitatis, et oratio Dominica, et symbolum fidei omnibus praedicetur et tradatur." It has been assumed that what was meant here by "Catholica fides" is the Athanasian Creed. But it would seem, rather, from the two verbs which follow, that as by the Lord's Prayer and Creed are meant what had to be "delivered," so by the "Catholic faith" is meant merely what had to be "preached." Besides, this phrase was applied to so many things then (Ffoulkes' Ath. C. Append. p. 32 and seq.), that its actual meaning cannot be assumed where the context is not explicit. The 55th is remarkable as shewing how Angilramn had been employed. "Dixit Dominus rex . . . se a sede apostolicâ . . . licentiam habuisse, ut Angilramnum archiepiscopum in suo palatio assidue haberet, propter utilitates ecclesiasticas." Now the only work extant with which his name is associated, is a collection of canons said to have been given by him to the pope, or received from the pope when he was at Rome, containing indisputable germs of the false Decretals. In the next canon Alcuin is commended to the fellowship and prayers of the council. There is a strong family likeness, in conclusion, between this council and that of Paris, A.D. 825, which should not be overlooked by anybody wishing to form a just notion of either (Mansi xiii. 859 and 863 and seq.). [E. S. Ff.]

FRATER, FRATERNITAS. 1. The name Frater was applied among themselves to all Christians [FAITHFUL]. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39) says that those who recognise one God as their father, and have drunk of one Spirit, are called brethren. Jerome (De Perpet. Virg. c. 15) says that all Christians are called brothers. The Pseudo Clemens (Epist. ad Jacob. Proem.) speaks of the priests and deacons, and all the other brethren. Hence the title Fraternitas was commonly applied to all the members of the church, or of a particular church, regarded collectively; as by Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39: and perhaps De Virg. Vel. c. 14), and Cyprian (Epist. 51, c. 1) where "fraternitas" is equivalent to "clerus et plebs."

Frater and Fraternitas, in this sense, are frequently found in inscriptions. Thus, in an Algerian inscription (Reinier, Ins. de l'Algérie, No. 4025), a church is designated ECCLESIA FRATRVM. In a Greek epitaph copied by Marini (Arval. Prefaz. p. xx.), from the Olivieri collection at Pesaro, the body of the faithful is addressed with the salutation, "peace to the brethren," ΕΙΠΗΝΗΝ ΕΧΕΤΕ ΑΔΕΛΦΟΙ. Another (Muratori, Thesaur. t. iv. p. MDCCCXXIV. 9) is dedicated by "the brethren" (fratres reddiderunt) to Alexander, their brother. Another (Brunati. p. 108) appeals to the "good brothers" (fratres boni). In another, from the cemetery of Priscilla, "the brethren" bid farewell to Leontius.

Some proper names appear to have arisen from this idea of brotherhood. As that of Adelphius, which is found on a marble in the museum of Lyons (Boissieu, p. 597, lxi.). Martigny, Dictionnaire des Antiq. (Chrét. ; Art. Fraternité).

2. Persons of the same official body styled each other Fratres; thus, not only does Cyprian speak of fellow-bishops as Fratres, but he addresses presbyters and deacons by the same title (e.g. Epist. 16). When in the same epistle (c. 2), he says, that "fraternitas nostra" has been deceived by certain persons, it seems doubtful whether he means the body of bishops, or the members of the church in general. Hosius (Conc. Sardic. c. 8) speaks of a fellow-bishop as "frater et coepiscopus." From this official use of the word "Frater," it arose that the members of a council speak of themselves as "concilium fraternitatis" (I. Conc. Lugd. c. 6), i.e. of the episcopal brotherhood. So I. Syn. Rom. c. 2; IV. [III.] Syn. Rom. c. 1.

3. A monastic order is emphatically a brotherhood (fraternitas), and its members Fratres, or Fratres Spirituales (Fructuosi Regula, cc. 4 and 8). See BROTHERHOOD, MONASTERY. [P. O.]

FRESCO. The object of this article is to furnish a brief historical sketch of the rise and progress of pictorial decoration in the religious buildings of the early Christians. Embellishments in mosaic will be treated of in a separate article, but all other wall decorations will be included, not those only strictly comprehended under the title fresco,^a i.e. when the colours are mixed with water simply, and applied to fresh plaster while wet. This was the ordinary mode of colouring walls among the wealthier Romans; but the care and skill it required, and the tedious processes necessary for preparing the walls for the colours, forbade its use where economy was an object. In the better-class houses at Pompeii, Rome, and elsewhere, the wall-decorations are executed in fresco; but the greater part of the paintings in ordinary dwellings are in distemper of various degrees of excellence. We are at present deficient in accurate information as to the exact process employed in the paintings of the catacombs; but considering the general absence of wealth among the primitive Christians, it is probable that the less expensive method would be adopted. Whenever paintings were repainted or touched up, the plaster being dry, the distemper process must have been necessarily employed. That encaustic painting in wax was also employed in early religious pictures is certain from the references in the fathers to that process. Chrysostom and Basil (Contra Sabellian. p. 805) in the East, and Paulinus in the West, may be cited. The latter speaks of "imagines ceris liquentibus pictas" (Ep. xxx. § 6), while Chrysostom more than once refers to κρόχυντος γραφή. Hermogenes, the African painter, is reproached by the vehement Tertullian as being "his falsarius, et cauterio et stilo" (Adv. Hermog. c. 1). The fact is that Christian art followed the technical rules of the period, and adopted whatever processes were in use among the artists of the day, and were most suited to the particular work in hand, whether fresco, tempera, or encaustic.

Nor was it only in the processes adopted but also in the character of the pictorial decorations themselves that the early Christians conformed to the practice of the age in which they lived. Indeed, it could not be otherwise. As has been remarked with perfect truth by Raoul Rochette, "un art ne s'improvise pas." A school of painting is the result of a long previous train of education, and cannot spring into existence in a moment "fully formed, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter" (Northcote, Rom. Sott. p. 198). There was nothing exceptional about Christian art. It was no more than the continuation of the art Christianity found already existing as the exponent of the ideas of the age, with such modifications as its purer faith and higher morality rendered necessary. The artists employed were not necessarily Christian; indeed, in most cases, especially in the earliest times, they would probably be pagans, working in the style and depicting the subjects to which they were accustomed, only restricted by the watchful care of their employers that no devices were introduced which could offend the moral tone of Christians. In the earliest examples there is absolutely nothing distinctive of the religion professed. "At first," writes Mr. Burgon (Letters from Rome, p. 250), "they even used many of the same devices for mural decoration as the pagans had used, always excepting anything that was immoral or idolatrous; introducing, however, every here and there, as the ideas occurred to them, something more significant of their own creed, until by-and-by the whole was exclusively Christian." The deep-rooted aversion of the early Christians to all sculptured or pictorial representations, natural in a community that had sprung from the bosom of the Jewish church, for a considerable period forbade all attempts to depict the person of the Saviour or the events of either Testament, and limited the efforts of Christian art to the simple naturalism of the decorations already common, or the arabesques in which the fancy of the artists loved to indulge. The earliest Christian frescoes with which we are acquainted present the same subjects from pastoral life and the vintage, the trellised vines and bunches of grapes, the bright-plumaged birds and painted butterflies, the winged genii and gracefully draped female figures, with which we are familiar in the wall-decorations of the Roman baths and the houses of Pompeii. By degrees the natural instinct for the beautiful asserted itself, and the desire to make the eye a channel for the reception of the truths of revelation led to the introduction of symbolic representations, which, without attempting directly to depict sacred things, conveyed to the initiated the expression of the truths believed by them. The actual change in the character of the subjects represented was at first inconsiderable. The vine laden with clusters became a recognised symbol of Christ "the True Vine" and the "much-fruit," by which Christians, as "branches," were called to glorify the Father. The pastoral subjects, especially those in which the Shepherd was the principal figure, at once led the mind of the worshipper to the contemplation of Christ the "Good Shepherd." To the devout imagination a Fish represented at once the Saviour Himself, the anagrammatic ΙΧΘΥΣ, and the human object of His salvation, the Christian deriving his life from the waters of baptism (cf. Tertull. de Baptism. c. i.), while the Fisherman spoke of Him who by the Gospel-hook takes men for life, not for death.^b [FISH; FISHERMAN.] Not only were these natural emblems made to breathe a Christian spirit by the infusion of a new element of life, but even directly mythological personages were pressed into the service of the church. Orpheus captivating the wild beasts by the sound of his lyre was adopted as a symbol of Christ subduing the savage passions of men by the melody of the gospel, and Ulysses deaf to the alluring voices of the sirens represented the believer triumphing over the seductions of worldly and sensual pleasure (Martigny, Dict. des Ant. Chrét. pp. 447, 643; De' Rossi, Bullettino, 1863, p. 35). The hold which the old forms still maintained long after the ideas of which they were the exponents had passed away, is seen in the combination with Scriptural scenes of those personifications of Nature under the human form so frequent in pagan times, which lasted even down to a late date. In the delineation of the ascension of Elijah, one of the most frequently repeated subjects of early Christian art, the Jordan is represented as a river god, with his urn.

"Fisher of men whom Thou to life dost bring;
From evil sea of sin,
And from the billowy strife, Gathering pure fishes in Caught with sweet bait of life."

Thus also "a mountain is occasionally represented by a mountain god, a city by a goddess with a mural crown, night by a female figure with a torch and star-bespangled robe, &c." (Kugler, Handbook of Painting, part i. p. 9).

So slow and timid was the commencement of Christian art. The profane abuse of sculpture and painting which had associated these forms of art with idolatry and licentiousness formed an almost insuperable barrier to its recognition as the handmaid of religion. The earlier fathers viewed all sculptural or pictorial representations with suspicion if not decided disapprobation. The stern Tertullian, transferring the prohibitions of the Old Testament to the New, absolutely condemned all representations of religious objects, and reproached Hermogenes as vehemently for painting as for his defence of second marriages: "pingit illicite, nubit assidue, legem Dei in libidinem defendit, in artem contemnit" (Tertull. adv. Hermogen. c. i.; De Idololatr. c. 5; cf. Neander, Antiquosticus, Bohn's tr. pp. 225, 451). We find similar but milder condemnations of the pictorial art in Clement Alex. (Protrept. c. 4) and Origen (cont. Cels. lib. iv. c. 31). Sacred art being thus frowned on it was only by gradual and cautious steps that symbolism gave way to direct historical representation, the events selected to be depicted being, at first, themselves symbolical of those great gospel facts which a deep-seated reverence as yet forbade them to portray. The persons and incidents of the Old Testament included within the limited cycle in which Christian art originally moved had all a typical or allegorical reference to the leading doctrines of Christianity, and reminded the devout worshipper of the Sacrifice, Resurrection, and Redemption of Christ. This will be apparent from the cycles of O. T. subjects given in the latter part of this article.

It was something that in spite of the profane and licentious associations of pictorial art, and the aversion of some of its most influential teachers, painting should have secured admission thus far into the service of Christianity. But it was still halting at the threshold, and timidly shrinking from the province of its greatest triumphs, so long as it was restricted to allegory. It could only accomplish its object in elevating the mind, and connecting beautiful and ennobling ideas with the external facts on which the faith is founded, when it adequately depicted the Person of the Saviour and chief events of His saving life. Referring to the article JESUS CHRIST for fuller details of the pictorial history of the Redeemer, and of the slow degrees with which the pious horror of any direct delineation of His outward form was broken down (of the persistence of which feeling the notorious decree of the council of Elvira,^c A.D. 305, forbidding the depicting of the objects of worship and adoration on the walls of churches is a remarkable evidence), it will be enough here to say that portrait-like representations of our Blessed Lord are found among the early wall-paintings in the Roman catacombs, and that a limited number of events from His life on earth, belonging to a strictly-defined cycle, are of constant occurrence in the same localities. It deserves notice that this cycle does not include any representations of the history of the Passion or Crucifixion. A feeling of awful reverence forbade any attempt to portray the atoning death of Christ in any but a symbolical or allegorical form. "The catacombs of Rome . . . offer no instance of a crucifixion, nor does any allusion to such a subject of art occur in any early writer" (Milman, u. s. p. 398). The most ancient instance known does not date earlier than the 8th century (Munter, Simbiliter, p. 77). Beyond the domain of sacred allegory and Scriptural painting, Christian art busied itself in the representation of saintly personages and of the martyrdoms, the memory of which was still so vivid in the church. It is difficult to point to indubitably early examples of the first class, and all traces of the latter class have perished. That representations of holy persons were not unfrequent in the time of St. Augustine is certain from his reference to wall-paintings of St. Peter and St. Paul as commonly existing, "pluribus locis . . . pictos" (de Consens. Evang. i. 10). But the paintings of St. Cornelius and St. Cyprian, in the crypt of Cornelius, in the Callistine catacomb, are in the style of the 8th century, while the Orante called St. Cecilia by De' Rossi, in the crypt bearing her name, is of the 9th; and the figure of St. Urban, in the same crypt, "can hardly have been executed before the 10th or 11th" (Northcote, u. s. p. 159). The paintings of saints in the catacombs of Naples may be assigned to an earlier period: some belonging to the 5th, others to the 8th century. Although all representations of martyrdoms have perished, there is no doubt that such existed. Prudentius (c. 405) speaks of a picture of the martyrdom of St. Casianus, of which he says expressly, "Historiam pictura refert" (Peristeph. Hymn. ix. v. 5), and he elaborately describes the paintings of the martyrdom of St. Hippolytus, which embellished the walls of the chapel in which the body of the saint had been deposited (Peristeph. Hymn. xi. v. 141 sq.). Paulinus of Nola also at the commencement of the 5th century, decorated a chapel erected by him with martyrs (Poem. xxviii. v. 20, 21). At a still earlier period we have the testimony of St. Gregory Nyssen as to the prevalence of this practice in the Eastern church. He describes the martyrdom of St. Theodore as painted on the walls of a church dedicated to that saint, "The fiery furnace, the death of the athlete of Christ . . . the painter had expressed by colours as in a book . . . The dumb walls speak and edify" (orat. in Theod. tom. iii. p. 579).^d

Early Christian paintings may be conveniently treated of under three divisions, Roman, Byzantine, and Lombardic.

I. Roman.—All the earlier Christian buildings above ground having yielded to time and human violence, the catacombs are the only source of examples of primitive Christian art. In them, as has been already remarked, the earliest examples offer nothing exclusively Christian, and differ hardly at all from the contemporaneous pagan decorations. Agincourt long since called attention to this fact in his great work (L'Histoire de l'Art par les Monumens), proving by comparative representations in successive plates (Peinture,

^c "Placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur" (Conc. III. can. 36; Labbe, Concil. vol. i. p. 974).

pl. v. vi.), that the first Christian sepulchral chambers were arranged and decorated after heathen models. The artists probably adhered to the old faith; and even if this were not so, they were only accustomed to work in one style, and could not extemporize a new one. In some of the most ancient chapels of the catacombs it has been truly said that "you are not certain whether you are looking on a pagan or a Christian work. There is the same geometrical division of the roof, the same general arrangement of the subjects, the same fabulous animals, the same graceful curves, the same foliage, fruit, flowers, and birds in both" (Burgon, Letters from Rome, p. 250; Northcote, u. s. p. 190). Agincourt could discover no difference in style, except, perhaps, what was not unnatural, greater signs of hurry, and coarser execution. It is only the occurrence of the figure of the Good Shepherd, which usually occupies the central position, or some Scriptural subject, such as Jonah or Daniel, or some Christian symbol, that clears up the doubt as to the religion of the art we are studying. The entire absence of all gloomy associations in connection with death deserves remark. The cheerful symbolical decorations which adorn the sepulchral chambers—the graceful vine, the clustering grapes, the birds and bright landscapes—bespeak a faith which nerved its possessors to meet the most terrible sufferings with calmness and even with delight, as the path to never-ending joys, and to view death as the door to eternal life, the true birthday of the soul. Every thing that meets the eye excites pleasurable emotions, and indicates a heart full of peace and happiness.

As an example of Christian mural decorations of the very earliest period we may instance the Catacomb of Domitilla on the Appian way (see p. 314). This catacomb is attributed to Flavia Domitilla, a near relative of the emperor Domitian—perhaps his niece, the daughter of his sister who bore the same name. She was the wife of Flavius Clemens, the cousin of Domitian, and his colleague in the consulship A.D. 95, who was accused of "atheism," by which we are almost certainly to understand Christianity, and put to death by the emperor. Domitilla was banished on the same charge to the island of Pontia (Dictionary of Christian Biography, DOMITILLA). In this burial-place, therefore, we have work of the end of the 1st or the beginning of the 2nd century. The frescoes which ornament the walls and ceilings of the sepulchral chambers and their recesses or cubicula, are clearly contemporaneous with the original building, and are, especially in the subordinate embellishments, of rare beauty. There is a vaulted roof, over which a vine trails with all the freedom of nature, laden with clusters, at which birds are pecking, while winged boys are gathering or pressing out the grapes, of which no decorative artist of the Augustan age need be ashamed (Mommson, Contemp. Rev. May 1871, p. 170). The annexed woodcut (No. 1) gives a faint idea of its exquisite grace and beauty. Traces of landscapes also still exist here, which are of rare occurrence in later Christian burial vaults. In the portion of this catacomb known by the names of St. Domitilla's chamberlains, St. Nereus and St. Achilleus, a painted cubiculum exhibits representations of the four seasons, which are very curious. They are represented as female figures, with small butterfly wings attached to their shoulders. We give woodcuts of Spring and Autumn (Nos. 2, 3).

The latter has an attendant genius emptying out a cornucopia of fruit. There is an entire absence of anything distinctively Christian in these decorations, which reproduce the wall-paintings of the best period of Greco-Roman art. On the walls, however, we find the usual allegorical and Scriptural subjects—the Good Shepherd, the

Another equally beautiful specimen of the vine ornamentation is exhibited on the vault of a square chamber of the cemetery of Praetextatus, otherwise known as that of St. Urban, beneath the church of the same name, lying to the east of the Via Appia, near the circus of Maxentius. This burial-place belongs to the earliest period, and the character of the decorations corresponds with heathen art of the 2nd century, and is not at all inferior to the best works of the age. The accompanying woodcut (No. 4) gives an imperfect notion of the elaborate beauty of the design. The vault of the chamber is divided into four bands, each containing a continuous wreath of foliage and flowers, among which are nests, and the birds visiting their young. The highest wreath is of laurel or bay, a symbol of victory, indicative of the Christian triumph. Immediately round the arch of the arcosolium is a band of reapers cutting down corn and binding up the sheaves. The plafond of the recess originally bore the Good Shepherd with a sheep upon his shoulders; but the design has been almost destroyed by the excavation of later loculi. The paintings are small and exquisitely beautiful, even in their present state of decay. The family to whom this burial-place belonged was evidently one of considerable wealth and dignity. But the specimens already adduced seem to have been surpassed by the great vine of the Callistine catacomb (Bottari, vol. ii. tav. 15), the "antique style of beauty" of which is noticed by Kugler. A stem of a vine encircles each side of the arch of an arcosolium with its graceful spirals, lovely little naked boys standing on its branches and plucking the clusters. The soffit of the arch is similarly decorated with vintage scenes. The wall of the recess presents what is commonly, but erroneously, designated the Dispute with the Doctors. Christ, represented as a beardless young man seated on a curule chair, holds a scroll in his left hand and turns towards a number of hearers, probably intended for his

The general arrangement of the mural decorations of the sepulchral chambers or cubicula of the Roman catacombs is remarkably uniform. The arch-headed tomb recesses or arcosolia, which occupy three sides of the square chambers, have the back wall, the soffits of the arches, and the wall above them painted, in the earlier examples with mere ornamental arabesques, in the later with subjects drawn from the narrow Scriptural or symbolical cycle to which reference has already been made. The ceilings are even more richly decorated, the subjects being usually depicted in panels distributed round a central picture, which most commonly exhibits a representation of the Saviour under a typical form. The general appearance of these cubicula, and the distribution of the paintings, is shown in the accompanying illustration from the cubiculum of the Ocean in the catacomb of St. Callistus (No. 6). The paintings are early—probably of the 3rd century—representing trellis work overgrown with flowers, peacocks and other birds, and winged genii. In the centre of the vault is the head of Ocean, giving its name to the chamber. The ornamentation of an early ceiling is exhibited in woodcut No. 7, representing the roof of the chapel of St. Callistus. The central panel contains Christ under the typical form of Orpheus. Four of the eight circumscribing panels contain Biblical subjects—(1) Moses smiting the Rock; (2) Daniel in the Lions' Den; (3) The Raising of Lazarus; (4) David armed with his Sling. The intermediate panels represent pastoral subjects—two of sheep, two of cattle. Another chamber, depicted by De' Rossi (vol. i. pl. 10), called that of Orpheus, is quite Pompeian in character. The ceiling is a beautiful work of art. Orpheus is seen in the centre, surrounded by heads of genii with dishevelled and flowing hair, and supported by eight oblong panels, two containing the Good Shepherd, two female orantes, and the remaining four winged genii bearing crooks, floating lightly in the air. The panelled walls are embellished with a rich profusion of arabesques, combining doves, peacocks, and other birds, dolphins, and sea monsters, the only unmistakably Christian emblem being the lamb bearing the eucharistic bread.

The style of these earliest efforts of Christian art has been unduly depreciated. They are characterized by Lord Lindsay (Hist. of Christ. Art., vol. i. p. 39) as "poor productions," where "the meagreness of invention is only equalled by the feebleness of execution," "inferior, generally speaking, to the worst specimens of contemporary heathen art." Such a verdict evidences but slender acquaintance with the paintings which are the subjects of his criticism. The earlier Christian frescoes, as we have seen, are quite on a level with the best specimens of pagan art of the time, and the rapid decadence manifested in the later examples belongs not to Christian art alone but to art in general. The judgment of Kugler is far more favourable. He speaks of the "grandeur of arrangement" exhibited by the earliest paintings, and admires the "peculiar solemnity and dignity of style" which characterize them, though he acknowledges that these excellencies are "accompanied by certain technical deficiencies," chiefly such as naturally arose from slight hasty execution (Kugler, u. s. p. 14). The mode of execution, according to Crowe and Cavalcaselle was as follows (Hist. of outlines of their figures with strong dark lines. The eyes, nose, and mouth were similarly defined with black lines. A dash of warm yellow-red Painting, vol. i. p. 3, note). The artists boldly stained the rough-coated walls with light water-colours of a lively tint, and rapidly defined the tone was thrown over the flesh portions of the figure, the shadows being worked in in broad masses with a deeper tint of the same warm hue.

The details were almost entirely left to the imagination of the beholder. The draperies were coloured in the primary keys, indicating a tolerable acquaintance with the laws of harmony. The general effect of these simple processes is pronounced by the same critics to be good. The "attitudes are not without grandeur, nor the masses of light and shade without breadth, nor the drapery without simplicity." The artists were evidently capable of much better things.

With the lapse of time and the general decay of artistic power in Rome, corresponding to the universal deterioration of taste and genius which characterized the later days of the empire, we notice a very sensible decline in the decorations of the catacombs. The design becomes increasanother and always unlike nature" (Northcote, u. s. p. 197). In fact, as Dean Milman has truly remarked (Lat. Christ. vi. 605), the characteristic of Christian painting was not art but worship, and its highest aim was to awaken religious emotion and suggest religious thought. Thus imitation took the place of invention, and imagination was crushed by precedent. The gradual decadence of the art may be clearly traced in the chronological series given in Agincourt's plates (Peinture, pl. v.-xii.). The excellence of design, freedom of drawing, and harmony of colouring which mark the earlier frescoes gradually disappear as we advance. We find proofs of declension at the end of the 3rd century (Pl. viii.). The drawing is not bad, but ingly rude and clumsy, and the execution shows greater carelessness and neglect of detail. The figures are ill-proportioned—sometimes square and short, at others inordinately elongated. The free play of the earlier designs is succeeded by a lifeless rigidity. This mechanical stiffness was fostered by the narrowness of the cycle of Scriptural subjects represented, and the unimaginative sameness of the mode of representation. Each subject had received a well-defined traditional type, consecrated by repetition, from which it was deemed irreverence to deviate. Thus Christian art became "almost hieratic in its character, as in ancient Egypt or modern Greece, so fixed and immovable were its types; always like one there is no movement and little expression, and the treatment is monotonous. In the two succeeding centuries the deterioration proceeds, though the decline is not so rapid as might have been anticipated. Classic forms continued till the end of the 5th and first half of the 6th centuries. Cavalcaselle instances as an example of the art of this period a chapel in the catacomb of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus (otherwise called St. Helena). The vault is decorated with a large figure of Christ seated in a curule chair, in the act of benediction. The head is very fine and pure. Below, above the tomb, are figures of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus and two others ranged on either side of the Holy Lamb standing on a rock, whence issue the four rivers of Paradise. The frames are long and attenuated, the heads small, the hands and feet defective in drawing. Another typical example is the colossal head of Christ in the act of benediction, from the cemetery of St. Pontianus. For the first time the jewelled nimbus bears the Greek cross. The Saviour is of imposing aspect, but conventional. The execution is hasty, and the decline marked. It probably belongs to the 7th century, but is assigned by Martigny to Hadrian I. 772-775. The celebrated paintings which decorate the well or baptistry, the jewelled cross, and the Baptism of Christ are described in the articles BAPTISTRY, p. 174; and CATACOMBS, p. 313. These pictures, in their present state, are probably restorations of the originals, coarsely painted over an older underlying picture at the time of the repair of the catacomb by Hadrian I. (cf. Tyrwhitt, Art Teaching of Primitive Church, p. 173). These duces the original painting, and that any arguments founded upon such uncertain data must be precarious. The words of Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt, with regard to a particular instance, may be applied to a large number of these frescoes, "the workmanship is so grossly rude and careless, that one is led to suspect that ancient retouchings have taken place at some time in the bathos of art; and the addition of the coarsest outlines, both on the lighted and shaded side of the objects, seems to show that the original painting had nearly vanished from the wall when some well-meaning and totally-ignorant restorer made an attempt at securing its meaning" (Art Teaching, &c., p. 130). The fact of these restorations has been lately made patent to those who have no opportunity of examining the originals by the invaluable series of photographs taken in the catacombs by the magnesium light, which we owe to the unwearied zeal and munificent liberestorations may be taken as examples of the retouchings and repaintings of earlier originals which prevailed so extensively when the catacombs became the objects of religious visits, and which render it so difficult accurately to determine the date of any particular picture. In the catacombs at Naples which have not been so much cared for, and are less tampered with by modern restorers, the wall-pictures may be seen in several instances peeling off, disclosing successive strata one behind another. There is no reason to question the good faith of the original restorers, who probably followed the outlines of the decaying subjects as far as they could make them out, and only supplied forms and details when the original had quite disappeared. But it must always be borne in mind, in examining the frescoes of the catacombs, that we are in all probability looking at a work of the 8th or even a later century, which only partially reproduces the original painting. The rude later touches and hard outlines are in many instances clearly to be traced over the original painting. It is needless to pursue the melancholy history of the decline of religious art any further. The power of drawing grew feebler and feebler, all sense of beauty of form perished, proportion was disregarded, the colouring became crude and inharmonious, until, with the close of the 8th century, a period of darkness set in, when Christian art was lost in the Western world, and only dragged on an unnatural and mechanical existence in the traditional Byzantine art of the East.

The remarkable series of frescoes which embellish the catacombs of Naples must not be passed over. They have, however, been so fully described in a previous article (CATACOMBS, p. 316), that it is needless to enlarge upon them here. The chief authorities for these paintings are the plates of Bellermann's work (Hamburg, 1839). The greater part there given are no longer visible. The vault of the vestibule is painted in the Pompeian style, and probably by pagan artists, some of the subjects being distinctly heathen. It belongs to the first half-century of the Christian era (No. 8). The vault has been subsequently plastered over, and a second set of subjects of the 8th century painted over it. But the new coat did not adhere well, and has fallen off to a large extent, exhibiting the first painting below it. There is also a good painting of a peacock, with vases and flowers, belonging to the first period. Among the paintings that decorate the chapels we may call attention to one presenting full-length figures of St. Paul with a scroll, and St. Laurence with his crown of martyrdom in his hand. They are not nimbed, and are assigned by Mr. J. H. Parker to the 5th century (No. 9). Half-lengths of St. Desiderius and St. Agutius, in another recess, deserve notice as exemplifying the bad drawing of the 8th century. The faces are elongated, the sockets of the eyes exaggerated in size, the hands enormous and clumsy, and the whole displays a barbaric ignorance of form and blindness to beauty.

II. Byzantine.—Up to the commencement of the 7th century there was no decided difference between Eastern and Western art. Wherever Roman civilization extended Christian art was essentially the same. It was not till the middle of the 7th century that the distinction between Roman and Byzantine art began to arise. That was the epoch of the greatest decadence of art in the West, crushed by the Lombard invasion, while in the East, under the emperor Justinian, a new and vigorous intellectual life was rapidly developing itself and manifesting its energy, as elsewhere, in the domain of art. This new influence rapidly made itself felt through the civilized world. The style of art universally prevailing in the latter part of the 7th and the 8th centuries and onward was that which, as distinguished from the Roman school, is known by the title of Byzantine (Kugler, Handbook of Painting, i. p. 47). The characteristic mental differences of the West and the East were reflected in their artistic works. The contemplative prevailed in the productions of the Byzantine art schools, as the practical did in those of Rome. The idea of dramatic historical painting was alien to the Byzantine genius. Even the movements of life were distasteful. Calm, motionless figures offered themselves to the devotion of the worshippers in dignified repose. Ease stiffened into rigidity, tradition usurped the place of invention, the study of nature was laid aside, and the artist followed a strictly prescribed type which allowed no scope for the play of the imagination, and ended in a system of mere mechanical copying, where, in Kugler's words (u. s. p. 56), "the capacity of the artist was only regulated by the number and quality of the tracings which he had been able to procure from the works of his predecessors." A fuller discussion of Byzantine art and the chief examples remaining, must be reserved for the article treating on mosaic decorations (MOSAICS). Byzantine frescoes of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, it is believed do not exist; though, from the permanence of the traditional type, and the strict adherence to artistic rules, there is no doubt that later compositions enable us to realise their character with great accuracy. We have no account of catacomb paintings in the East, though it is possible that such are only awaiting more thorough research. One such was not long since discovered at Alexandria, and is described by De' Rossi (Bulletino, Novemb. 1864; Agost. 1865), and Northeote (Rom. Sott. p. 221). It contains a liturgical painting, apparently representing the participation in the eucharist, together with the miracle at Cana and the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, with Greek inscriptions over. But it belongs to a period anterior to the development of Byzantine art, and differs little, if at all, from the paintings of the Roman catacombs.

III. Lombardic.—The relics of the new style of art consequent on the Lombard invasion in the 6th and 7th centuries are very scanty, and quite insufficient to furnish data for determining its character with any minuteness. It is probable, however, that the "naturalism and insistence on fact, the vigorous imagination of truth and wild play of fancy in fiction, the delight in action, motion, and contest, the taste for hunting and battle, the irresistible or unresisted taste for the humorous grotesque," described so vividly by Mr. Ruskin (Stones of Venice, vol. i. append. 8), as characterizing their more lasting works in architecture and sculpture, were exhibited in their pictorial efforts, in which, with all their rudeness and total license of style, there lay, as Kugler remarks (p. 45), "a germ of freedom from which, later, a new school of development was to spring." The historical subjects which Queen Theodelinda caused to be painted on the walls of her palace at Monza, at the beginning of the 7th century, have unhappily perished, if, indeed, they were frescoes and not mosaics.

Some account is given by Von Rumohr (Ital. Forsch., vol. i. p. 193, Berl. 1827) of the examples of the Lombardic style still existing in the remains of the frescoes in the tribune of the subterranean church at Assisi, and in the crypt of SS. Nazaro e Celso at Verona. The former are placed by him in the 8th century. The lights are laid on in impasto, an art subsequently lost. The frescoes at Verona are very similar in design and execution. Several Biblical scenes are there rudely painted on a coarse white ground.

IV. Cycles of Scriptural Subjects.—Attention has been already drawn to the remarkable fact that out of the almost infinite wealth of historical subjects in the Old and New Testaments suitable for pictorial representation, by which important doctrines are set forth or holy lessons imparted, a comparatively small number were selected, and that the limits thus laid down were scarcely ever transgressed by the artists. Nor were these, generally speaking, precisely the subjects that we should have a priori expected to have been the object of exclusive preference. Many of the most striking incidents of the life of Christ are entirely passed over, while some which appear to us subordinate are repeated times without number. The explanation of this procedure is to be sought in the principle of typical parallelism which guided the church from the first in her choice of subjects or delineation. Her leading idea was to veil the great facts of Redemption "under the parallel and typical events of the patriarchal and Jewish dispensation—admitting no direct representations from gospel history but such as illustrated the singly office of the Saviour and the miracles by which He prefigured the illumination of the spirit and the resurrection of the body" (Lord Lindsay, Christian Art, vol. i. p. 48). It followed therefore that even these events were not treated so much as facts of history, to be portrayed with any idea of reproducing the incident as it may be conceived to have occurred, but as types in which the spiritual meaning was predominant. Consequently, not the choice of the subject alone but the mode of treating it was matter to be regulated by authority. Nothing beyond the minor details and the mode of execution was left to the artist. The church dictated what should be painted and how. "The symbolical system of this hieratic cycle," says De Rossi, "is established beyond all dispute, not only by the choice and arrangement of subjects, but also by the mode of representing them." "Christ's resurrection, with that of the church in His Person, is the theme on which in their peculiar language the artists of the catacombs seem never weary of expatiating" (Lord Lindsay, u. s. p. 51), and representing to the eyes and hearts of the beholders under every varied form of symbol, type, and allegory. The earliest allusion every sarcophagus of the early Christian church. The same events, with the others belonging to this cycle, are continually referred to in the writings of the early fathers, who thus evidenced the hold they had taken of the popular mind, as familiar illustrations of the truths of revelation.

We may select one or two of the subjects of most frequent recurrence in early Christian art to illustrate what has been said as to the adherence to a traditional type, even when quite at variance with all historical probability. No subject meets us more constantly than Noah in the ark receiving the dove with the olive-branch, in evident allusion to the sacrament of baptism and salvation in the church (1 Pet. iii. 31). But with slight modifications of detail the type never varies. As in the illustration given above (No. 10), the ark is always a small square box with an open lid, out of which a man many sizes too large for his receptacle appears, and welcomes back the dove. Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac is of perpetual recurrence.¹ Both are usually clad in tunics. In an example from the cemetery of Priscilla, Abraham wears highpriestly robes.

to a cycle of this kind, not, it is true, containing any reference to pictorial representation, occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. v. c. 7). Some of the Scriptural events there spoken of as types or pledges of the resurrection of man, viz. the deliverance of Jonah from the whale's belly, the preservation of the three children in the fiery furnace, and of Daniel in the lions' den, from the O. T., and the cure of the man sick of the palsy, and of the blind man on whose eyes Christ laid clay, the feeding of the five thousand, the miracle of Cana, and the raising of Lazarus, are those which meet us perpetually painted in almost every cubiculum, and carved on almost

The ram is a frequent accessory. The history of Jonah, the type of His work, death, and resurrection, chosen by Christ himself, in its three scenes, when once seen will be universally recognised, from the sameness of the form of the sea-monster and the details of the picture. In our illustration (No. 11) all these typical events are combined into one picture. Daniel in the lions' den, infinitely repeated, adheres on the whole to the same form and arrangement. One given by Perret represents him as wearing the Phrygian cap, which also usually distinguishes his companions the three children in the furnace, another of the most commonly occurring types of deliverance (No. 12). The permanence of one type sanctioned by ecclesiastical tradition exhibited in these and almost every other Scriptural representation in these early paintings, anticipates the authoritative statement of the church made some centuries later in the iconoclastic controversy, "Non est imaginum structura picturarum inventio, sed ecclesiae catholicae probata legislatio et traditio" (Conc. Nic. ii. art. vi., Labbe Concil. vol. vii. p. 831).

The same restriction to one cycle and adherence to one authorised pictorial form are seen in the frescoes from the N. T. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

The following may be accepted as a tolerably complete account of the cycle of the O. T. subjects found in the catacombs. We have only included those which had received a fixed traditional form, and were constantly repeated, excluding those only occurring once or twice :—

I. (1) The Fall, with Adam, Eve, the tree, and the serpent. (2) The Offering of Cain and Abel. (3) Noah receiving the Dove. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) Moses removing his Shoes. (6) Moses striking the Rock. (7) David with his Sling. (8) Elijah's Translation. (9) The Three Children in the Fiery Furnace. (10) Daniel in the Lions' Den. (11) Jonah (a) Swallowed by the Whale; (b) Disgorged; (c) Reposing under his Booth. (12) Job on the Dunghill; to which may be added, though of much rarer occurrence, (13) Tobias with the Fish, and (14) Susanna and the Elders.

II. (1) The Adoration of the Magi. (2) The Miracle at Cana. (3) Christ and the Woman of Samaria. (4) The Healing of the Paralytic, the man carrying his bed. (5) The Healing of the Blind Man. (6) The Cure of the Woman with the Issue of Blood. (7) The Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes. (8) The Raising of Lazarus. (9) Zacchaeus. (10) The Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem. (11) Christ before Pilate, the latter washing his hands. (12) Christ and the Apostles on the Shore of the Sea of Galilee, after the Resurrection, with bread and fish. To these may be added, though not strictly belonging to the cycle, (13) the Annunciation (Bottari, tav. 176), (14) Our Lord's Baptism, in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, and (15) the Five Wise Virgins, from St. Agnes (Perret, ii. 42).

We must not omit to mention the frescoes representing the Agape which so frequently meet us. In many of these there is nothing distinctively Christian, and Mr. Tyrwhitt remarks on the close resemblance between the Agape of the catacombs of St. Domitilla, and St. Callistus, and the confessedly heathen banquet of the seven priests in the Gnostic catacomb. That of which we give a woodcut (No. 13), from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter, already described (p. 312), presents nothing by which we can determine whether the feast depicted had a religious character or not. In others, however, the decussated loaves, the bread and fish in seven baskets, and the seven persons, in evident allusion to the interview between Christ and seven of his disciples at the sea of Galilee, evidence the Christian origin and purpose of the painting.

We have already lamented the entire absence of all examples of religious paintings derived from churches or basilicas, owing to the destruction of the buildings themselves, or of the decay or removal of the pictures. This want however is in some degree compensated for by contemporaneous lists of the subjects represented, and to some extent of the manner in which they were depicted, for which we are indebted to St. Ambrose and St. Paulinus of Nola.

In the latter half of the 4th century the Ambrosian basilica at Milan was decorated with a cycle of 21 Scriptural paintings, all but four of which represented O. T. subjects. They are described in the "Disticha ad picturas sacras in Basilica Ambrosiana," given in the "Inni Sinceri di Sant' Ambrogio," published by Biraghi (Milano, 1862). The subjects are (1) Noah and the Dove. (2) Abraham beholding the Stars. (3) Abraham entertaining the Angels. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) The Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca. (6) Jacob craftily obtaining the Birthright. (7) Jacob and the Speckled and Ring-straked Flocks. (8) Joseph's Coat shown to Jacob by his Sons.

(9) Joseph sold by his Brethren. (10) Joseph and Potiphar's Wife. (11) Joseph's Dreams. (12) Absalom caught by his Hair. (13) Jonah swallowed by the Great Fish. (14) The Wolf lying down with the Kid. (15) Jeremiah's Prophetic Commission. (16) The Ascension of Elijah. (17) Daniel in the Lions' Den. (18) The Annunciation. (19) Zacchaeus in the Sycamore Tree. (20) The Transfiguration. (21) St. John reclining on Christ's Breast. This cycle is remarkable as including several subjects seldom or never occurring in existing remains. Subjects (1), (4), (13), (16), and (17) are among the most frequent, but all the rest are found most rarely, while of the majority it would be difficult to name an example.

The most detailed accounts of the decoration of a church with Scriptural paintings are those given by Paulinus of Nola in the early years of the 5th century, when describing the basilica erected by him in honour of St. Felix (Poem. xxvii.). We here find the first direct enunciation of the principle set forth by Joannes Damascenus (Orat. I. de Imagin. vol. i. p. 314), and constantly repeated since, that "pictures are the books of the unlearned." The festival of St. Felix, which occurred in the winter, gathered together an immense concourse of country folk, who thought to do honour to the tomb of the saint by passing the night in feasting, too usually resulting in a gross debauch:

Perfusis balante mero gaudere sepulchris."
(Ib. v. 565.)

In the hope of beguiling the gross minds of these illiterate peasants from the sensual delights which were their chief attractions, and awakening purer thoughts and holier aspirations by the examples of the holy personages there depicted, and at the same time with the view of imparting to them some knowledge of the chief facts of sacred history, and at any rate of leaving them less leisure for their coarser pleasures, Paulinus adopted the somewhat unusual expedient (rare more) of embellishing the portico of the new basilica with a series of Scriptural paintings. They occupied either the ceiling or the upper portion of the wall, only to be seen with up-turned face and head thrown back (ib. vv. 511-513). The series embraced subjects from the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Ruth. Those particularised by Paulinus (ib. vv. 515-535, 607-635) are the Creation of Man, Abraham's Departure from Ur, the Angels received by Lot, Lot's Wife, the Sacrifice of Isaac, Isaac opening the Wells, Jacob's Dream, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, the Crossing of Jordan, Naomi and her Daughters-in-law, and the Passage of the Red Sea. The titles of the various pictures were written over them:

quod manus explicuit."—(Ib. 584.)

The description of the last two subjects indicates, as Dean Milman remarks (Hist. of Christianity, vol. iii. p. 399 note), if it was drawn from the picture itself, considerable talent on the painter's part for composition and landscape as well as for the drawing of figures. Not content with these pictorial embellishments of his new basilica, Paulinus decorated the old basilica of St. Felix in a similar manner, selecting subjects from the

New Testament, that thus "that which was new might be an ornament to the old, and the old to the new." These occupied a lower position, and could be viewed "lumine recto" (Poem. xxviii. vv. 167-179). Three narrow chapels (cellae) opening out of the atrium, exhibited examples of male and female virtue. One was painted with the history of Job and Tobit; another with those of Esther and Judith. That in the centre commemorated martyrs of both sexes (ib. vv. 15-27). The paintings in the apse of the basilica at Fondi are also described by Paulinus in a letter to his friend Severus (Ep. xxxii. 17). The subjects were of the same nature as many still extant in the apses of basilicas; a crowned cross standing in the flowery meads of Paradise, and the Holy Lamb anointed by the Dove and crowned by the Father, with the sheep and goats on either hand. These may have been worked in mosaic.

There is abundant evidence that the walls of civil and domestic buildings were also decorated with paintings, sometimes secular, sometimes religious. Those of the palace of Queen Theodelinda at Monza have been already referred to. Sidonius Apollinaris describes the villa of his friend Pontius Leontius at Bourg; at the confluence of the Dordogne and Garonne, as profusely ornamented with wall-paintings, one series representing the Mithridatic campaign of Lucullus, another the early history of the Jewish nation, "reuniturum primordia Judaeorum." Sidonius expresses his astonishment at the lustre and durability of the colours (Sid. Apoll. Carm. xxii.). We learn from Ernanus Nigellus (lib. iv.) that the whole Scripture history was painted on the walls of Charlemagne's palace at Ingelheim. It is needless to say all these have perished.

FRIDAY, GOOD. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

FRIULI, COUNCIL OF (Forojulianense concilium), held at Friuli, A.D. 796, not 791, as Pagi shews (Mansi xiii. 854) under Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, whose letter to Charlemagne, formerly misconceived with the synod of Altilio, A.D. 802 (ibid. p. 827), assigns three causes for its meeting: (1) the orthodox faith; (2) ecclesiastical discipline, and (3) recent outrages, probably by the Huns. The first of these is explained in his speech, which is an elaborate apology for the reception into the Western creed of the "Filioque," which Charlemagne had attacked, and the pope vindicated, the 2nd Nicene council two years before for not having in theirs: Paulinus himself endeavouring to prove both right. The resemblance between parts of this speech and the Athanasian creed has been remarked and is very close. Besides which it is observable that all priests are required to commit to memory the entire exposition of "the Catholic faith," with which he concludes: while, for everybody else, the learning by heart of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer is prescribed. Of the canons, the 1st threatens simony; the 2nd drunkenness; the 4th and 5th deprecate secular employments and amusements for the clergy. By the 10th divorced couples are forbidden to remarry till one of the two dies; and by the 13th all are inhibited from working on Sundays and holidays (Mansi xiii. 830 and seq.).

[E. S. Fr.]

FRUITS, OFFERING AND BENEDICTION OF. I. The Eastern Rite.—In the so-called Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 29) the duty is inculcated of giving to the priests the first-fruits of the press and of the floor, of honey, grapes, shell-fruits, &c., and the firstlings of the flock and herd, that the stores of the giver and the produce of his land may be blessed (εὐλο- γηθῶσιν). As this precept or exhortation comes in the midst of others relating to the Holy Communion, we might, perhaps, infer from it alone that in the East those things were offered and blessed during the celebration of that sacrament. They were at least brought to the altar, and at that time; for the third (or, as in some editions, the second) apostolical canon forbids anything but ears of new corn and grapes in their seasons, oil for the lamps, and frankincense, to be "brought to the altar at the time of the holy sacrifice." At a later period they certainly were blessed during the liturgy; for the council in Trullo (A.D. 691) found that in some churches the grapes brought to the altar were "joined to the unbloody sacrifice of the oblation, and both distributed together to the people;" whereupon it decreed that "the priests should bless the grape separately" (Can. xxviii.). In book viii. c. xl. of the Constitutions is a thanksgiving for first-fruits offered. In the book it follows the "morning laying on of hands;" but as it comes after the dismissal, it is clearly independent of that. It might, for aught that appears, be used, when occasion required, at the celebration or any other service. It begins thus, "We give Thee thanks, O Lord Almighty, Creator and Provider of all things, through Thine only begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord, not as we ought, but as we can, for the first-fruits offered unto Thee." The whole form, which is rather long, is a thanksgiving in this strain. Later forms, though apparently of very great antiquity, are conceived in a different spirit, and appropriately entitled, "Prayers on behalf of those who offer first-fruits" (Euchologion, pp. 655, 656, ed. Goar). They are, with one exception, rather petitions for a benefit, than ascriptions of praise. They are used at the benediction of "grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, apples, peaches, plums." Grapes, if ripe, were blessed in the Greek church on the 6th of August (Euchologion, p. 695).

II. The Western Rite.—One proof of the great antiquity of the benediction of grapes is that it took place in the West (as a rule) on the 6th of August, as well as among the Greeks (Sacram. Gregor. in Lit. Rom. Vet.; Muratori, tom. ii. col. 109). The earliest extant forms are in the Gelasian sacramentary, the substance of which is at least as old as the fifth century. There, among the Orationes et Preces for Ascensio Day, we find this rubric and prayer: "Then a little before the end of the canon thou shalt bless the new fruits (fruges novas). The Benediction follows: Bless, O Lord, these new fruits of the bean, which Thou, O Lord, hast vouchsafed to ripen, &c., in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom Thou, O Lord, dost always create all these good things, &c. Finis the Can n" (Muratori, tom. i. col. 588). Elsewhere, in the same sacramentary, the prayer occurs again slightly altered, and with the alternatives, "grape or bean" (Ibid. col. 746). It is here followed by another benediction of first-fruits of any kind (primitias creaturæ Tuæ), and by a "Benediction of Apples." From some MSS. of the later Gregorian sacramentary, we learn that apples were blessed on the viii. Kal. Aug., i.e., on St. James' Day (Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. L. iv. c. xxxiii. § xi.). The prayer from which we have quoted above is preserved in the last-named sacramentary as a Benedictio Unæ (Muratori, tom. ii. col. 109). The oldest MS. of the Gelasian does not reach beyond the eighth century, nor that of the Gregorian beyond the ninth; but we have proof that the custom was known in the West before the eighth century, and therefore that the recognition of it in the Roman sacramentaries was not an interpolation of that period. The prayer above cited from the Gelasian occurs with the title, Benedictio omni (sic) creaturæ (sic) Pomorum, in the manuscript Gallican sacramentary, written in the seventh century, if not earlier, found by Mabillon in the monastery at Bobio, in Italy, and probably carried thither from Luxeuil by its founder, St. Columbanus, A.D. 613, or by one of his followers (see the Musacum Italicum, tom. i. p. 390; or Muratori, u. s. tom. ii. col. 959). In the Lecctionary of Luxeuil, another happy discovery of Mabillon, we find the Eucharistic lessons Ad Missam de novis Fructus (sic). The prophecy is taken from Joel ii. 21-27; the epistle from 1 Cor. ix. 7-15; and the gospel from St. John, vi. 49-52 (De Liturgiâ Gallicanâ, p. 161). From this coming after the Legenda of the Passion of St. John the Baptist, Sept. 24 (Liturg. Gall. p. 458), and from the internal evidence of the lessons, we infer that it is the benediction of the new corn for which provision is here made. The rite was probably carried by our countryman Boniface (Winfred), A.D. 723, with the common Roman offices, to his converts in Germany; for we find the Gelasian benedictions of fruit, &c., with certain others, among the Monumenta Veteris Liturgiæ Alemannicæ, published by Gerbert (Part I. p. 307). A very brief example peculiar to this collection may be given:—"Bless, O Lord, this fruit of new trees, that they who use thereof may be sanctified; through, &c." It is interesting to add that similar benedictions were practised in our own country. In the pontifical of Egbert, who became archbishop of York in 732, are the six following formularies:—(i.) Benedictio ad omnia quæ colueris; (ii.) Benedictio ad Fruges novas; (iii.) Benedictio Pomorum; (iv.) Alia; (v.) Benedictio Patis novi; (vi.) Alia. There is, of course, no mention of grapes, nor is the Gelasian prayer that we have cited given with any other application. Of the above, ii. and v. are not in the Roman sacramentaries. The last runs thus: "Bless, O Lord, this creature of bread, as Thou didst bless the five loaves in the wilderness, that all who taste thereof may receive health both of body and of soul; through, &c." (Pontificale Ecgerhti, p. 115; ed. Surtees Society, 1854).

It will be perceived that in the West, as well as East, the offering of first-fruits as a token of gratitude to the Giver of All soon degenerated into a mode of asking for a blessing on the consumption of His gifts. It should be understood, also, that both in the East and West the first-fruits brought to be blessed were left for the use of the priests. "It is becoming and expedient," says Origen, A.D. 230, "that the first-fruits be offered also to the priests of the Gospel." "For if one believed that the fruits of the earth were given to him by God, he would surely know how to honour God from His gifts and benefits by giving thereof to the priests" (Hom. xi. in Num. § 2. tom. x. pp. 105, 106; ed. Lommatzsch). Similarly St. Jerome, commenting on Ezekiel xlv. 30: "The first-fruits of our foods are offered to the priests; that we may taste nothing of the new fruits, before the priest has tasted them. For we do this, that the priest may lay up a blessing and our offering in his house; or that the Lord may bless our houses at his prayer."

We have already quoted a rubric from the Gelasian sacramentary, which orders that the benediction of fruits shall take place "a little before the end of the canon." The prayer was inserted immediately after the words, "not weighing our merits, but pardoning our offences" (now in our first Post-Communion Collect), and immediately before the concluding clause, "through Jesus Christ our Lord." This clause (altered in this manner, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ") was thus made to close the benediction. After it the priest added, "Per quem haec omnia, Domine, semper bona creas, sanctificas, vivificas, benedixisti et praestas nobis, Per ipsum," &c. These words are now a permanent part of the canon; but they do not seem to belong to it. The words, "haec omnia" cannot with any propriety be applied to the eucharistic elements alone. Hence some ritualists, as e. g. Grancolas (Antiphona Liturgica, p. 657), and De Vert (Explication des Cérémonies, tom. iv. Remarque xxx.), &c., suppose that this doxology was at first only used when other things were offered to be blessed, and formed no part of the service of the mass. Le Brun (Explication, p. iv. art. xvi.), Bona (Rer. Lit. l. 2, c. xiv. § v.), D'Achery (Spicil. tom. iv. Praef.), and others, maintain that it was a constant part of the liturgy, but that when there was a benediction of fruits, it applied to them as well as to the elements. [W. E. S.]

FRONTAL (Frontalis or Frontale) is defined by Lindwood to be "apparatus pendens in fronte altaris, qui alias dicitur Palla," [ALTAR-CLOTHS; ANTEPENDIUM.] The word is not uncommon in ancient documents. Thus, for instance, a charter of Chindasuintha, king of the Goths, of the year 645 A.D. (quoted by Ducange, s. v.) runs: "offerimus . . . vestimenta altaris omnia ad plenum, sive frontalia, sive principalia . . ." A later charter, quoted by the same authority, speaks of "quatuor frontales de serico." [C.]

FUGITIVES (from a monastery). Monastic codes shew that their framers had to guard on the one hand against a leniency which might encourage desertion on the part of monks tired of their seclusion and eager for the world, and on the other against a severity which might close the door too fast against deserters wishing to be readmitted. The rule of Benedict, as always, is very lenient on this point. A monk who escapes from a monastery, like one who is expelled, is to be received again if he vows amendment, even after three desertions (Reg. Ben. c. 29, cf. Reg. Cuj. ad Virg. c. 21), but only into the lowest grade (Reg. Ben. ib. cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 79, Reg. Fruct. c. 20, Reg. Cuj. ib.). Some commentators, indeed, take this rule as implying, that the abbat may readmit even after a fourth desertion, though the culprit has no right to require it (Martene, Reg. Comment. in loc.). But later commentators (e. g. Menard, Haeften) interpret it more strictly (Martene, Reg. Comm. ib.). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, censures abbats lenient to fugitive monks, or who receive monks from other monasteries (Conc. Aurel. i. c. 19). The second council of Tours, A.D. 567, allows fugitives to be re-admitted on doing penance.

In the same spirit of wise tolerance Benedict is silent as to the steps to be taken to bring back the fugitive, apparently judging it best to leave him alone, if without any desire to return (Mart. Reg. Comm. ib.). But Ferreolus prescribes that the fugitive is to be recalled (Reg. Ferr. c. 20), and Fructuosus forbids him to be admitted into another monastery; and orders him to be brought back, by force if necessary, as a criminal, with hands tied behind his back (Reg. Fruct. c. 20). It was enacted by Justinian that a monk returning to the secular life should be degraded by the bishop and governor of the province from his civil position, and be sent back with his worldly goods to his monastery; if he deserted again, he was to be drafted into the army (Novell. 123). A similar decree was passed by the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (Conc. Tolet. c. 5). The second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, sentenced an abbat who should be remiss in seeking to bring back the stray sheep into the monastic fold to deprivation.

Later enactments are very severe against fugitives. The Cistercian rule forbids the reception even into the lowest rank of a monk who has deserted twice, or has stayed away more than eleven days. The renegade is in any case to wear a distinctive dress, as badge of his disgrace, and to be excluded from the choir; the abbat who fails to enforce this rule is to do penance. The original statutes of the Carthusians unfrock the renegade; the modern compel him to resume the dress of his order. The Augustinian rule tempers severity with mercy. The renegade is to live outside the monastery itself, but under the care of the bishop, and the abbat is to shew kindness to him, if penitent (Mart. Reg. Comm. in loc. cit.). [I. G. S.]

FUNERAL. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; OBSEQUES.]

FUNERAL-FEAST. [CATACOMBS, p. 312; CELLA MEMORIAE.]

FUNERAL-SERMONS (Epitaphia, λόγοι ἐπιτάφιοι). Christians followed the old custom of many of the heathen nations, of holding an oration over the remains of famous men departed [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, p. 253]. To say nothing of the discourses—triumphal rather than sorrowing—delivered over the remains of martyrs, Gregory of Nyssa held funeral orations on the death of the empresses Pulcheria and Placilla, and of bishop Meletius. On the death of Constantine the Great, several bishops celebrated his praises, conspicuous among whom was Eusebius of Caesarea. Gregory of Nazianzus exercised his pathetic eloquence over the bier of his brother Caesarius, of his father and his sister, and over that of Basil the Great; Ambrose preached on the death of his brother Satyrus, of Valentinian, and of Theodosius.^a The tone of these orations is, for the most, eulogistic of the "famous men" through whom "the Lord hath wrought great glory" (Ecclus. xlv. 1, 2).

Jerome (Epist. ad Heliod. c. 1) says that the old custom was for sons to speak the funeral orations over parents. He alludes here probably to a pagan custom, of which there are many examples (Kirchmann, De Fun. Rom. lib. ii. c. 18); but Christianity also (as we have seen) furnishes examples of a similar practice. Nor were the clergy the only orators in such cases; Constantine himself did not disdain to pronounce a funeral oration on one of his court, in which, says Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 55) he spoke of the immortality of the soul, of the blessings of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked.

Funeral sermons were not always delivered at the time of the burial, though some—as several of Gregory Nazianzen's—contain indications that they were so delivered. Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 71) gives us to understand that the funeral orations over Constantine were delivered while the remains of the departed lay in state on a lofty bier [FERETRUM]. Ambrose evidently delivered his sermon over Satyrus (see § 78) while the body was yet waiting to be carried to the grave. His oration on Valentinian, on the contrary, was delivered two months (see Opera, ii. 1170, ed. Bened.), that on Theodosius forty days, after the death of the person commemorated. The death of bishop Meletius was the occasion of sermons everywhere (Theodoret, H.E. v. 8); that of Gregory of Nyssa was probably delivered on the day when the remains of Meletius, brought from Constantinople, were received at Antioch. That of Chrysostom on the same bishop, was delivered on the fifth anniversary of his death. The oration of Gregory Nazianzen on Basil was delivered over his tomb on the first anniversary of his death, in the presence (it is said) of 150 bishops.

When the sermon took place at the time of a commemorative service for the dead, it probably took place at the point in the liturgy where the sermon was ordinarily introduced. The Pseudo-Dionysius (Hierarch. Eccl. c. 7) speaks of the funeral-sermon being delivered after the catechumens had departed, but while the penitents remained. The eulogy of Hilary of Arles on Honoratus (quoted by Binterim, v. ii. 442), which proves incidentally that the corpse was carried uncovered, and that the people pressed round to kiss the face, or the coffin of the illustrious dead—was probably delivered at the end of some office. The orations over the remains of Constantine were clearly delivered after the funeral service (Euseb. u.s. iv. 71; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. iii. 435, ff.). [G.]

FURNACE. In Bottari (clxxxvi. 6) the three Hebrew brethren are represented standing in something like a kiln or smelting furnace (see woodcut); also cxcv. and perhaps cxliii. lxi.; also in Parker's photographs from the catacomb of St. Marcellinus. The furnace is literally insisted on, in a way which, as it appears to the author, may possibly have been adopted from one of the ustrina (or ae) used for cremation in Rome. One of these, or its remains or traces, the author believes he saw in Pompeii, Christmas 1859. See Murray's Handbook for South Italy, p. 327.

GABALUM, COUNCIL OF (Gabulitanum concilium), at which the wife of the count of Auvergne was condemned for adultery, says Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. p. 222), A.D. 590. Gabalum, where it was held, was not far from Mende, on the river Lot (Gall. Christ. i. 83). [E. S. Ff.]

GABATHA or GABATA. A name of pen-sile lamps suspended in churches. The word is of uncertain orthography and etymology. We find the forms Grabata, Gavata, and Cavata, which last points to the derivation given by Isidore Hispalensis (Etymol. lib. xx. c. 4) from cavus "hollow." The original meaning of the word is "a dish" or "bowl;" in which sense it is used by Martial (Epigr. vii. 47; xi. 32), and of which the Glossary of Ducange furnishes abundant examples. From its shape it came to be employed for a lamp, which is its most usual ecclesiastical signification. The annexed woodcut from Maeri shows one of two bowl-shaped gabathae preserved in the pontifical chapel of the Lateran, in which in his time a wax light was always burning before the sacrament. Gabithae frequently occur in the catalogues of papal gifts to the churches of Rome contained in Anastasius. Thus Leo III. (A.D. 795–816) gave to the basilica of St. Peter's 15 gabathae of purest gold set with gems, to hang on the screen (pergula) before the altar (§ 382), and 6 of silver with an appended cross to hang before the Arch of Triumph, 3 on each side (§ 389). These gabathae were of different metals, gold, silver, brass, and electrum. They were frequently embossed (maglypha § 392, &c.), or decorated in bas-relief (interrasilis), and ornamented with lilies (lilutae) heads of gryphons (§ 366) or lions (as in the woodcut), or even fashioned in the form of that animal "in modum leonis." Like the coronae used for lighting, they very often had crosses attached to them (signocristae, § 418, &c.). The epithet filopares is frequently applied to gabathae in Anastasius, and would seem, from a comparison with the expression pari filo (Lucr. ii. 341), to signify of equal size or thickness. The epithet saxicae or suziscae is interpreted by Ducange to mean of Saxon workmanship; but this interpretation is precarious. [E. V.]

GALILAEI. [FAITHFUL.]

GALILEE. [NARTHEX.]

GALNABIS (also Galnape, Galnapes [Isid. Hispal. Etym. xix. 25], Gauonpe). This is a kind of rough blanket or rug, forming part of the furniture of a monk's couch, which according to the Rule of St. Isidore is to include "storea et stragulum, pellesque lanatae duae, galnabis quoque et facistergium, geminusque ad caput pulvillus" (Regula S. Isidori, c. 14; in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 127, ed. Paris, 1663). Similarly the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Braacara in Spain, speaks of "calnabes yillatus" (c. 4; op. cit. part 2, p. 139). The galnabis was apparently used sometimes as an article of personal dress, for in the testament of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, we read "simul cum casula villosa et tunica vel galnape, quod melius dimisero" (Patrol. lxvii. 1140).

The etymology of the word is doubtful: we may perhaps connect it with the word γαλναιον, used by Varro, and possibly also with the Greek γαυνάκης, καυνάκης, which is defined by Hesychius (under the latter spelling) στρώματα, ἢ ἐπιβόλαια ἑτερομαλλή. Another derivation has been suggested, connecting the word with galbanum, and making it descriptive of the colour, but this is very improbable. For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium s. v. [R. S.]

GALLERIES. The only galleries known in early ecclesiastical architecture were constructional integral parts of the building, not additions to it. In this they corresponded to the triforia of mediaeval churches, which in their original idea were galleries for the reception of worshippers or auditors, for which purpose they are still used in Germany, and where they exist in Italy (e.g. St. Ambrogio at Milan), and to some extent in England. The first Christian churches in the West were either basilicas, or buildings erected on the basilican plan, and they naturally retained the upper gallery, running entirely round the building above the principal colonnade, for the accommodation of spectators, men on one side and women on the other, which we know to have formed an essential portion of the basilican arrangement (Vitruv. v. 1). Like them the church galleries were reached by an outside staircase, and were protected towards the nave by a low wall or balustrade (pluteus). The only Roman basilican churches that exhibit this arrangement are those of St. Agnes (fig. 1),

No. 2. Section of St. Michele, Pavia.

St. Laurence, in its more ancient portion, and the church of the Quattro Santi Coronati, on the Coelian. A similar upper gallery occurs also in the Lateran baptistery of Constantine. The passion for mosaic pictures of sacred subjects led to the abolition of this gallery in the basilican churches, the space it should have occupied being devoted to pictorial representations, as at St. Maria Maggiore, St. Paul's, and the old St. Peter's, at Rome (see illustrations on pages 370, 371), and S. Apollinare in Classe, and St. Apollinare Nuovo, at Ravenna. But it reappeared in the early Lombard churches, as at S. Ambrogio at Milan, and S. Michele at Pavia (fig. 2), where there are well developed triflorial galleries. But the arrangement never took root in Italy, and was soon lost.

In the East, when the "dromic" or basilican form was adopted, it carried with it the upper gallery above the side aisles. Of this we have an example in the church of St. John at Constantinople (A.D. 463), illustrated in Salzenburg's work. The domical church of the lesser Santa Sophia, (or SS. Sergius and Basilius,) erected by Justinian (fig. 3), also exhibits a gallery or upper story running all round it. In the churches, in what is commonly known as the Byzantine style, of which St. Sophia is the most magnificent example, the side gallery played a very important part. There is a good example in the church of St. Vitale, at Ravenna (see woodcut, p. 376).

Its usual designation was gymnaeonitis, from being the place where the women were accommodated. It was also called the catechumenium, because the women assembled there to listen to instruction (Leo. Novell. 73, apud Ducange Constantinopol. Christ.), or simply "the upper chambers," ὑπερῶα (Paul. Silent. i. 256). These galleries ran along the side of the trapeza or nave, sometimes quite up to the sanctuary or bema. The Pseudo-Amphilochius records that St. Basil, having detected a woman making signs to the deacon attending upon him at the altar, gave orders that curtains should be hung over the gallery to prevent such indecorum.

The women's galleries at St. Sophia are of vast size (fig. 4), ranged to the north and south of the central area, occupying the upper story of the transeptal space. Each gallery is supported by four monolithic columns of Egyptian granite, and is itself faced by an arcade of six smaller pillars. The galleries are vaulted and paved with marble, and protected towards the church by a low marble wall, four feet high, shaped like a desk, on which, according to Paul the Silentiary, the women reposed their arms.

of the cupola. On the same level as the women's galleries, further east, were two large vaulted apartments to the right and left of the bema, in one of which the empress had her position with GALLICAN COUNCILS; councils known to have been celebrated in France, but at some place unknown.

1. A.D. 355. At Poitiers or Toulouse possibly: where St. Hilary, writing to the Easterns A.D. 360, says he five years before then with the bishops of France withdrew from the communion of the Arian bishops Ursacius and Valens, and of Saturninus of Arles, who had espoused their cause. The opening chapters of his work addressed to Constantius are thought, in short, to have emanated from this council (Mansi, iii. 251).

2. A.D. 376. At least there seems a reference to one such in a law of that year, dated Treves, in B. xvi. tit. ii. § 23, of the Theodosian code; but it is not known where or for what object (Mansi, iii. 499).

3. A.D. 444, in which Hilary of Arles presided, and Chelidonius of Besançon, where this council may have met therefore, was accused of being husband of a widow and deposed. On appealing however to St. Leo he was restored; as having been condemned on a false charge. Both their letter to him and his answer are preserved among his epistles (Ep. xcix. and cii.; comp. Mansi, vii. 873).

4. A.D. 678, at some place unknown: when St. Leodegar or Leger bishop of Autun was degraded as having been accessory to the death of king Childeric II. five years before (Sirmond, Conc. Gall. i. 510; comp. Mansi, xi. 173 and 1095).

5. A.D. 678 or 679, against the Monothelites: as appears from the reference made to it by the Gallican bishops subscribing to the Roman synod under pope Agatho, preserved in the 4th act of the 6th council (Mansi, xi. 175 and 306), but they do not say where.

6. A.D. 796, at Tours possibly, where Joseph, bishop of Mans and a suffragan of Tours, was deposed for cruelty (Mansi, xiii. 991).

7. Three more councils may be grouped under this head, usually called councils of Auvergne, but this name is misleading, as it means the town formerly so called, not the province. When, however, the town changed its name to Clermont, councils held there subsequently were styled by its new name, while the earlier retained its old. We may save confusion, therefore, by classing them under Gallican. Of these the first met 8th November, A.D. 535, in the second year of king Theodebert, and passed sixteen canons, to which fifteen bishops, headed by Honoratus, metropolitan of Bourges, subscribed: his suffragan of Auvergne subscribing second. Their canons deprecate lay influences in the appointment of bishops, and lay interference between bishops and clergy. No furniture belonging to the church may be used for private funerals or marriages. The appointment of Jews as judges, and marriages between Jews and Christians are denounced. Presbyters and deacons marrying are to be deposed. In a collective note to king Theodebert, the bishops entreat that neither the clergy, nor others, living in his dominions may be robbed of their rightful possessions, and in their fifth canon they declare all spoiliations of church property null and void, and the spoilers excommunicate, wherever it occurs. Several other canons are given to this council by Burchard (Mansi, viii. 859-67).

The second, A.D. 549, was attended by ten bishops, but only to receive the canons passed at the 5th council of Orleans (Mansi, ix. 141-4).

GALLICANUS, martyr at Alexandria under Julian; commemorated June 25 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GALLICIA COUNCIL OF, held A.D. 447 or 448, in the province of that name in Spain on the north-west against the Priscillianists: in consequence perhaps of the letter of St. Leo to Turribius, bishop of Asturia, who had appealed to him for advice (Ep. xv.; comp. Mansi, vi. 491); but is that letter genuine? [E. S. Ff.]

GAMALIEL, invention of his relics at Jerusalem, Aug. 3 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GAMING. [DICE.]

GAMING-TABLE (Tabula lusoria, παιδιον). Besides the natural feeling which led the survivors to place in the tombs articles dear to the deceased in his lifetime, the comparison of the life of man to a game of chance was a familiar thought to the ancients. We may trace it through all their literature, whether Greek or Roman (see Raoul-Rochette, Mém. de l'Académie des inscript. tom. xiii. p. 634). Hence astragali and dice occur more frequently in the Greek and Roman tombs of the Campagna than playthings of any other description, though the amusements of every age and condition are there represented. The dice (tali, tesserae), are usually made of ivory, occasionally of bone; the dice-box (fritillus, tricula) is generally of ivory, and the gaming-table marble.

Five of these gaming-tables have come down to our times with inscriptions which leave no doubt of their use. It is a curious circumstance that in several Christian cemeteries in Rome sepulchral niches have been found closed with these marble gaming-tables, as occasionally with other incised marbles. One of the tables taken from the cemetery of Basilla may be seen in the Kircher museum, and was first described by Lupi (Dissert. in nuper invent. Severæ epitaph. p. 57, tab. ix. n. 6). An engraving of it is given above.

The inscription, which was turned inside the tomb, is easily read: VICTVS LEBATE || LVDERE NESCIIS || DA LVSORI LOCV ||.

Boldetti (Osservazioni, p. 449) gives a second from the cemetery of St. Agnes bearing the following inscription: DOMINE FRATER || ILARIS SEMPER || LVDERE TABVLA ||—; also a dice-box found elsewhere, used for the same game. The interior of the box is here shewn, divided into three sections as a security against fraud in throwing; two dice are lying at the bottom.

A third table of the same kind from the Capponi museum is reproduced in Muratori's collection (I. DCLXI. 3), and bears an inscription almost identical with the foregoing: SEMPER IN HANC || TABVLA HILARE || LVDAMVS AMICI ||. The fourth table, from the cemetery of Calixtus, is given by Marangoni (Acta S. Victorini in append. p. 140). The words of the inscription, though evidently relating to play, are difficult of interpretation. Of the remaining table the place of discovery is uncertain. Cardinal Passionei (Inscr. Ant. appendix, p. 176) transcribes a gaming-table inscription which Raoul-Rochette quotes as an additional example, but it appears more likely to be that of the Kircher museum incorrectly copied.

These having all been discovered in Christian sepulchres, it seems natural to suppose that they were in use amongst Christians. Nothing in the gaming-tables themselves, nor in their inscriptions militates against such a supposition; and in fact it is well known that the business of making dice, and articles of a similar nature, was one followed by Christians. Boldetti, for instance, gives (p. 416) a Christian sepulchral inscription over an ARTIFEX ARTIS TESSALARIÆ, who is generally considered to have been a maker of dice. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., s. v. "Jeu, Tables de.") See DICE. [C.]

GAMMADIA (γαμμάδια, or γαμμάτια). A cruciform ornament, embroidered on the borders or woven into the texture of ecclesiastical vestments, both in the West and East. It takes its name from being composed of four capital gammæ (Γ) placed back to back, thus forming a voided

Greek cross. The gammæ were also sometimes placed face to face, so as to constitute a hollow square, in the centre of which a cross was inscribed. Vestments so decorated were known by the name of poly-stauria (πολυσταύρια). St. Nicholas and St. Basil are depicted in robes (thus semée of crosses) in the illustrations to Ducange (Gloss. Græc. fig. vii.). Balsamon assigns, among other marks of the patriarchal dignity, the "robe distinguished by gammæ," δια γαμμάτων στιχάριον (de Patriarch. p. 446). These crosses were peculiar to the white eucharistic vestments, those of a purple colour being destitute of them (Ducange, s. v. πολυσταύριον). In the Western church the word gammadii is of frequent occurrence in the later papal biographies in Anastasius, in the lists of offerings made to the basilicas and churches, e.g., Leo III. among gifts to the church of St. Susanna, gave a purple vestment, "habentem in medio crucem de chrysoclaro . . . atque gammadiis in ipsa veste chrysoclaris quatuor" (§ 366), and Leo IV. to the church of St. Mary at Anagni, "vestem . . . cum gammadiis auro textis" (§ 536). These gammadia were of gold, others were of silver (§ 397), or of Tyrian velvet (§ 462), (cf. Goar, Eucholog. p. 315, col. 2). Not gammæ alone but other letters also are frequently seen embroidered on the borders of the robes of the sacred personages represented in early Christian mosaics and frescoes, especially H. I. T. X. The precise meaning of these marks has not been satisfactorily determined (cf. Bosio, Rom. Sott. c. xxxviii. p. 638). [LETTERS ON VESTMENTS.] [E. V.]

GANGRA (COUNCIL OF), for which widely different dates have been assigned; some placing it before that of Nicaea, some not long after; others indefinitely, between it and that of Antioch, A.D. 341 (see the notes of Valesius and Reading on Soc. ii. 43, and Mansi, ii. 1095): all which discrepancies may be traced to the fact that one of the Latin versions of the synodical letter addressed by the assembled bishops to their colleagues in Armenia contains the name of Hosius of Corduba amongst the former. But the episcopate of Hosius, as Cave shews (Hist. Lit. i. v.), extends over a period of seventy years, ending with A.D. 361: accordingly Pagi finds it possible to place this council as late as A.D. 358 and admit Hosius to have been there, on his way back to Spain. And this was unquestionably the year of the council, as we shall see from other considerations, so that the absence of his name in the Greek heading of the letter need not be pressed. His presence was always coveted by the Easterns; but as his name occurs among the last on the list, we may assume that he attended in no other capacity than that of a simple bishop. The object of holding the council is stated in its synodical epistle to have been to condemn the errors of Eustathius—otherwise written Eustasius or Eustachius—and his followers; and him Socrates and Sozomen are doubtless correct in making identical with Eustathius bishop of Sebaste in Armenia Minor—else why should the bishops of either Armenia have been addressed on the subject? The father of bishop Eustathius was Eulalius bishop of Caesarea, or rather Neo-Caesarea, in Pontus, and it was at a council held there under his own father this same year, according to Pagi, that he was first deposed. Sozomen indeed seems to say that he had been already condemned as a presbyter by his father; if so, this would account for the severity of the new sentence passed upon him, particularly had he been propagating his errors as bishop in his father's see. Then, on his resisting this sentence, as there seems fair reason for supposing he would, his father would naturally have recourse to the provincial synod, which we may assume to have met on this occasion at Gangra, as the first bishop on the list is Eusebius, clearly the metropolitan of Caesarea in Cappadocia, whom St. Basil succeeded, and in whose jurisdiction Gangra lay, while the name of Eulalius occurs further on. Dius (probably Dianius, the predecessor of Eusebius, is intended) whom the Latinus synod-

icus asserts to have presided, is not found in either version. Gangra therefore was held to confirm what had passed at Neo-Caesarea respecting Eustathius. The similarity of names seems to have led Sozomen to assert that he was first deposed by Eusebius of Constantinople, who died as far back as A.D. 342: and Socrates, who says in one place (ii. 43) that the synod of Gangra was subsequent to the Constantinopolitan synod of A.D. 360, contradicts himself in the very next chapter by telling us that Meletius succeeded Eustathius at Sebaste, and then either as bishop of Sebaste or Beroea—it does not much matter which—attended the council of Seleucia, which we know met A.D. 359, and in so doing fixes the true date of the synod of Gangra, namely, midway between it and that of Neo-Caesarea the year before. These places were not remote from each other; and it would appear that there had been synods held at Antioch, that, for instance, of A.D. 358 under Eudoxius, and at Melitine in Armenia, unfavourable to Eustathius, whose judgments he had set at nought equally with that of Neo-Caesarea. Hence the greater solemnity with which that of Gangra was convened, far enhanced however by the weight which has attached to it ever since; Pope Symmachus in a Roman synod A.D. 504 going so far as to say that its canons had been framed by apostolic authority, meaning that of his see—in other words, that his predecessors had received and approved them (Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 319, n. v.). Of these there are twenty in number, and almost all in condemnation of the errors ascribed to Eustathius and his followers in the synodical letter before mentioned, “forbidding to marry, commanding to abstain from meats,” and so forth. Their reception by Rome lends additional interest to canon 4, which says: “Should any separate himself from a presbyter that has married—as though it were not right to partake of the oblation when he is celebrant—let him be anathema.” And the epilogue, reckoned in some collections as a 21st canon, is worth transcribing, not only for “the admirable temper and good sense” which distinguishes it, as Mr. Johnson remarks (Vade Mecum, ii. 86), but because it may well be thought to account for their having been incorporated into the code of the universal church. The rulings of fifteen, or, if Hosius was there, sixteen bishops only, must have owed their place there to some great intrinsic excellence. “We commit these canons to writing,” so they terminate, “not as if we would cut off those who exercise themselves in works of severity and mortification in the church of God according to the Scriptures: but those, who under pretence of such exercise, do insult those who live in a more plain and simple manner, and would bring in innovations contrary to the Scriptures and the canons of the church. We therefore admire virginity, if attended with humility and a regard for continence, if accompanied with true piety and gravity, and a retreat from worldly business, with a modest humble temper. But at the same time we honour honest marriage, nor do we despise riches when employed in good works and in doing justice. We commend a plain and coarse habit, without art or gaudiness, and have an aversion to all luxurious ostentation of apparel. We honour the houses of God, and affectionately embrace the assemblies made therein as holy and beneficial; not as if we confined religion within those houses, but as having a respect to every place that is built to the name of the Lord, and approve of the church assemblies as being for the public good; and pronounce a beatitude upon signal acts of charity done to our brethren, as being done to the poor of the church according to tradition; and to say all in a word, we cannot but wish that all things may be done in the church according to the traditions of Holy Scripture and the apostles.” [E. S. Ff.]

GARDEN OF EDEN. Represented by trees in various bas-reliefs of the Fall of Man, as on the tomb of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv. &c. &c.). A most ancient MS. picture of the Garden of Eden occurs in the Vienna MS. of the Book of Genesis which is given by D'Agincourt. Professor Westwood has shown the present writer an extraordinary representation of the Fall of Man, from a Greek MS. of the Old Testament now in the Vatican of the 7th or 8th century, where the garden is much dwelt on. There is a quadruped serpent or dragon looking up at the tree of knowledge. These pictures were brought to this country in facsimile by bishop Forbes. [R. St. J. T.]

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. During the first four centuries and a half at least the subject of our Lord's passion seems to have been approached, but not entered upon—as by representations of the betrayal, the scene before Pilate, &c. In No. 90 of Professor Westwood's ivory carvings, he is brought before Pilate and Herod together, or perhaps Annas and Caiaphas. This is a part of the great casket of the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia, and is referred to the 5th or 6th century, to the period immediately preceding that of the Rabula MS. when the crucifixion began to be represented (see CRUCIFIX). The Garden of Gethsemane is one of the earliest of these approaches to actual delineation of our Lord's sufferings. The MS. Gospel of St. Augustine, very possibly made use of by the bishop himself, contains a most interesting picture of the betrayal in the garden, which is represented not only by trees, but by a curious serpentine representation of the brook Kedron, bursting out of a rock like the Barada at Ain Fifi, or the Jordan at Tell-el-Khady. This subject is carved on the casket of the Brescian library (Westwood, ivory casts, No. 90), dating from the 5th or 6th century.

Indications of a garden occur in various Greek representations of the crucifixion combined with the resurrection. See crucifixion in the Rabula MS. in Assemani, Bibli. Laurent. Catalogus, where olive-trees are certainly intended.

In later MSS. it occurs in the Bible of Alcuin, and in a MS. given by count Bastard, which belonged to Drogon, grandson of Charlemagne.

GATES OF CHURCHES. Our Lord's designation of Himself as “the Door” of His church (John x. 7, 9) impressed a deep religious signification in the minds of the early Christians on the entrances to their sacred buildings, which they evidenced by the care displayed in their construction and the richness of their ornamentation. As a rule the actual gates (valvae) of churches were of wood of the most excellent and durable kind. The doors of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were, until its destruction by fire in 1823, of wood, roughly chiselled, and were reported to have been brought from Constantinople. The doors of the church of St. Sabina on the Aventine are of cypress wood, carved in relief with subjects from the Old and New Testaments. They are of great antiquity, though Mamachi, the annalist of the Dominican order, gives them too early a date in placing them before the 7th century. The church of the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai retains the ancient richly-carved doors of cypress wood erected by the emperor Justinian, stated by Mr. Curzon to be as perfect as when first set up (Neale, Hist. of East. Ch. Introd. p. 258). Doors of wood were very commonly overlaid with plates of the precious metals and inlaid with ivory (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetr. viii.), for the purpose of decoration. These plates were frequently richly sculptured with scriptural subjects in relief. Thus Paulinus of Nola speaks of "aurea limina" (Poem. xiv. 98), and commends the piety of those who covered the doors of the church of St. Felix with metal plates—

(Poem. xviii. 34).

The papal memoirs of Anastasius supply repeated references to this mode of ornamentation. [DOORS, § 3, p. 574.] The "portae argenteae" of St. Peter's are often mentioned. These were overlaid by pope Hadrian (A.D. 772-795) with silver-gilt plates embossed with the effigy of our Lord and others (Anastas. § 332). Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-467) erected silver gates at the Confessio of the basilica of Holy Cross, and gates of bronze inlaid with silver at the oratory of St. John Lateran (Ib. § 69). This last is an early example of those doors of bronze of which we have in later times so many magnificent examples, bearing representations of Biblical events in high relief, which reached their artistic climax in the western doors of the cathedral of Pisa and those of the baptistery, "le porte del Paradiso" at Florence. We have another early example in the gates of the "eso-narthex" of St. Sophia. These are of bronze exquisitely embossed with floriated crosses set in doorcases of marble. The great central doorway has above it an image of Christ in the act of giving benediction to a kneeling emperor with the virgin and St. John the Baptist on either hand. The chief entrance of the cathedral of Novgorod has bronze doors of very early date. They are described by Adelung (die Kirsinschen Thüren zu Novgorod) as 11 feet high by 3 feet broad, divided into 24 compartments containing scriptural reliefs.

Church doors were often furnished with inscriptions either upon or above them. These included texts of Scripture, doxologies, prayers, pious aphorisms, &c. Paulinus of Nola (Ep. xxxii. § 12) gives the following inscription placed by him over the principal entrance of the basilica of St. Felix:—

Stare crucem duro spendentem celsa labori
Praemia. Tolle crucem qui vis auferre coronam."

The door of the outer basilica, which was entered through a garden or orchard, he also tells us, has these inscriptions on the outer face:—

"Coelestes intrate vias per amoena vireta
Christicolae: ei laetis decet huc ingressus ab hortis Unde sacrum meritis datur exitus in paradisum."

And this on the inner:—

"Quisquis ab aede Dei perfectis ordine votis Egrederis, remea corpore, corde mane."

Church doors were also often inscribed with the names of the builders and the date of the building. [E. V.]

GAZA in PALESTINE (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 541, to which Pelagius the first pope of that name, then a deacon and envoy from Rome, came by order of the Emperor Justinian, with letters ordering the deposition of Paul bishop of Alexandria, which was accordingly carried out (Mansi, ix. 706). [E. S. Ff.]

GAZOPHYLACIUM. The treasury or storehouse attached to a church, for the reception of the offerings of the faithful, made either in bread and wine, or in money, for the service of the altar, the sustentation of the ministers, or distribution among the poor (Possid. Vit. S. Augustin. c. 24). These oblations were deposited in the gazophylacium either after having been offered on the altar, or until enquiry had been made by the deacons whether the offerers were orthodox and persons of good life, that the table of the Lord might not be profaned by the gifts of the unholy (Binus in Can. iv. Apost. Labbe i. 53). By the 93rd canon of the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 399, the reception before enquiry even into "the gazophylacium or sacrarium" (the modern sacristy) was forbidden. Chrysostom (Homil. 22 de Eleemos.) speaks of treasuries in the churches, τὰ γαζοφυλάκια τὰ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις; Augustine appears to recognize their existence "quid est gazophylacium? Arca Dei ubi colligebantur ea quae ad indigentiam servorum Dei mittebantur" (Homil. in Ps. 63); and Possidius in his life of that father (u. s.) records his having warned his hearers, as Ambrose had also done, of the neglect of the "gazophylacium and secretarium, from which the necessities for the altar are brought into the church." Cyprian refers to the place of offering as corbana (de Op. et Eleemos. c. 5), and Paulinus of Nola, as mensa, which he complains stood too often for sight rather than use, "visui tantum non usui" (Serm. de Gazophyl. Ep. 34). [E. V.]

GEMELLIONES. Among the vessels to be borne before the pope in the great Easter procession are mentioned (Ordo Rom. I. c. 3) "gemelliones argentei." The purpose of these is uncertain, but it seems probable that (like the "urceola argentea" mentioned elsewhere) they were water-vessels (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. i. 184). [C.]

[W. F. G.]

GEMS were employed in very early times for a great variety of ecclesiastical purposes, some articles being made wholly of stones more or less precious, and others being decorated therewith. Thus CHALICES and other sacred vessels were occasionally made of precious stones, but more frequently ornamented with them; and little crystal FISH, probably used as hospitable emblems, have been found in the catacombs of Rome. The walls, the ALTARS, the ALTAR-CLOTHS, the service-books [LITURGICAL BOOKS], and other furniture of churches were from the fourth century onward often ornamented with gold, silver, and precious stones, as were also CROSSES and the CROWNS and diadems of Christian sovereigns. In the following article, however, account will be taken of such gems only as are engraved, and these were mostly used as ornamental or signet rings, more rarely for other purposes.

The following passage of Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. iii. 11, p. 246b) is the locus classicus relating to Christian signet gems:—"A man should not wear the ring on the finger joint, for this is effeminate, but upon the little finger, as low down as possible; for the hand will thus be most free for action, and the seal least likely to slip off, as being guarded by the larger joint. But let our signet devices be a dove or a fish, or a ship coursing against the sky, or a musical lyre, which Polycrates employed, or a ship's anchor, which was the seal of Seleucus, or if it be a fisherman, it will remind us of an apostle and of boys saved from water." Subjects derived from heathen mythology or representations of weapons and drinking vessels he condemns as unfit for Christians. A little before he allows Christians only one ring as a signet, saying that all other rings should be eschewed: a wife also may have a gold signet ring for the safe keeping of her husband's goods.

The number of engraved stones which can be securely referred to the early Christian centuries is not very considerable, but their rarity has perhaps been somewhat exaggerated.*

* "Intagli representing purely Christian subjects are of the rarest possible occurrence, that is in works of indubitable antiquity" (King, Antique Gems, p. 352, London, 1860). Some that have been published are now known to be false (Martigny, Dict. p. 39). The Christian gems bearing Greek inscriptions have been published by Kirchhoff in Böckh's Corp. Inscr. Græc. n. 9077-9109.

The principal subjects of extant works of this kind, including all those mentioned by Clement, are as follows; various specimens of each type are described at length, others more briefly.

(i.) Christ as the Good Shepherd.—This type, though not mentioned by Clement, deserves to hold the first place, being so often found in very early Christian works of art of different kinds. Mr. Fortnum, who observes that forgeries of this subject are frequent, describes and figures a red jasper in his own possession (purchased at Rome) in its original octagonal bronze setting: the shepherd is standing on his left leg, the right leg being bent; he supports himself by a staff in his hand, and holds out a branch (perhaps of olive, as a symbol of peace) to two sheep at his feet. Behind him is an olive(?) tree. Christian work of the third or fourth century (Archæological Journal, xxvi. 141 [1869]; xxviii. 275 [1871]). The British Museum has seven intagli in which the Good Shepherd bears a lamb on his shoulders. In one of them (a tiny onyx) he stands between two fish, or rather perhaps between a fish and a palm-branch; in two others (red and brown jaspers) he holds a staff, having a dog at his feet, which looks up at him, a tree being behind; in a fourth (cornelian) are two dogs at his feet, looking up, and an obscure and barbarous legend, which has been read ESIVKEV (Hertz, Cat. n. 2344; King, Ancient Gems, p. 353), "in which the name of Jesus appears to be intended, together with some other appellation or title," perhaps Lord (Κύριε) Jesus (King, Gnostics, p. 142), or Jesus, Son of God (ΙΕΣΣΥ ΒΕ ΤΕΥ, Greek in Latin letters and barbarised); another of the same type (neccolo) has no legend: the sixth has only the shepherd bearing the lamb, but is inscribed IH. XP. (plasma); in the seventh (red jasper) he is accompanied by sheep and a dove on a tree. One in the Bibliothèque Impériale, in neccolo, set in a silver

Among them are several which may be referred with little or no doubt to a period later than that with which we are concerned; and as nothing is said about the probable antiquity of almost all of them, it has been necessary to employ the work with some caution. Possibly the books referred to under the particular gems may give some information upon this point. In the British Museum are contained upwards of twenty early Christian gems seen by the writer, and there may probably at this time (1874) be more. In various private collections in this country (as of Messrs. Fortnum, King, and Lewis) are contained a fair number of others. The Bibliothèque Impériale at Paris contained, in 1858, only eight purely Christian engraved stones, excluding Byzantine camei (Chabouillet, Catal. pp. 191, 282, who says that Christian intagli are "d'une grande rareté"). About fifty casts of Christian gems have been received from Signor Saulini, Via Babuino, Rome, some of which are in the Vatican, others in the Museo Vettori, now acquired for the Vatican; but the general absence of indication either of the collection or the kind of stone employed greatly detracts from their value: fourteen of them give the Good Shepherd, eight have an anchor (with or without accompaniments), three have a boat or ship, five bear a dove, others have fish (written in Greek, or depicted), the chrisma, or the Cross. Others which are of large size, exhibiting the Crucifixion, or the figure of Christ or the Virgin, are probably later than 800 A.D. Among some casts from gems in Rome, received from Signor Odelli of Rome, are a few which are evidently Christian, the most remarkable being an intaglio representing the raising of Lazarus in a style of art like that which we have in the catacombs, where the same subject is represented.

ring, has the Good Shepherd as before bearing a sheep on his shoulders, with two other sheep at his feet (Chabouillet, Cat. p. 282, n. 2166). Another example, in red jasper, represents the shepherd still as before, having two dogs, or rather perhaps having one dog and one sheep, at his feet and a star and crescent in the field, with retrograde legend IAHN, perhaps for Iah is his name. This fine gem is considered by Mr. King, who possesses it, to be a work of about the end of the second century. He considers "the Sun and Moon conjoined" as "emblems of the Divine presence" (Precious Stones, pp. 160, 431); they may, however, be indications of astral genii, and if so, the gem may be the work of a Christian Gnostic. "The most interesting of all examples of this type," however, he observes (Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 30, London, 1872), "occurs on a large cornelian brought recently from the North of India (Col. Pearce), on which the Good Shepherd stands, bearing his lost and found lamb across his shoulders, surrounded by the mystic letters I.X.Θ.Y.C., the reverse engraved with XPICTE CoZE KAPHTANON AEPOTE (sic): 'O Christ, save Carpianus for ever.' This is cut in exactly the same coarse lettering and similarly arranged in consecutive lines as the Gnostic legends of the fourth century." Three others are mentioned in Böckh's Corp. Inscr. Graec. One (n. 9084) figured by Perret (Catac. de Rome, iv. t. xvi. n. 12), where the shepherd bears a lamb accompanied by a dove and branch, and by an anchor and fishes, with legend IXΘYC; another (n. 9098), figured by Paciaudi (De Baln. Christ. on the title-page) in a square hematite, having on one side the Good Shepherd with two crosses, and a legend on the other, seemingly meant for Αγάθωνα βοήθη; and a third (n. 9107), figured by Le Blant (Bull. de l'Athén. Franç. Feb. 1856, t. 1, n. 10), on plasma, where the Good Shepherd is accompanied by the legend ΑΟΥΚΙ[ΟΥ], the owner of the gem. There are several other gems on which this subject is represented slightly differing from the preceding. (See note at the beginning.)

The Good Shepherd (King)

(ii.) The following five types are mentioned by

Fish. (King)

Clement; of which Christ as the Fish occurs perhaps more frequently than any other. The examples here given may suffice, but the enumeration might be extended. One on some burnt stone, figured by Mr. King, is of good early work, representing some large-headed fish, and reads bou-strophodon HA EIC | 9X HI, i.e. Jesus Christ is one God (El); see his ingenious remarks in Ant. Gems and Rings, ii. 27. A similar fish, accompanied by a crook and palm branch is on a sard preserved in the British Museum, which also contains the following intagli: A fish on which rests a cross; a dove on each limb IHCOTC above and below, in a broken cornelian: ^b a fish upon which is a dove, a sprig behind her; to the left is the chrisma (✠) to the right the owner's name,

RVFI, in cornelian: also a fish well engraved, in an emerald set in a massive gold ring of angular form; on the opposite side, a dove seated on a branch between the letters AE | MI | LIA, cut on the bezel itself. An intaglio, the stone is not particularised, in the Kircherian Museum at Rome bears the engraving IXΘC MT "around an anchor in the loop between its lower arms, which are recurved, and upon the stem of which a fish is placed" (Archaeol. Journ. xxviii. 288 [1871]). A sard published by Le Blant has a representation of a fish, with IXΘYC (retrograde) below it: the Copenhagen Museum possesses a gem having the same type and legend, but written in the usual way: and the legend only, the X being converted into the chrisma, is found on a gem in the Vatican (Böckh, nos. 9083, 9085, 9086). The legend IXΘC inclosed in a wreath is inscribed on a cornelian in the British Museum. A sard, figured by Ficoroni (Gemm. litt. t. xi.), has IXΘC only. A very curious ancient gem, which is best mentioned in this place, is figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 546). It represents an episcopal chair with legend IXYΘ (for IXΘYC) inscribed upon it, besides a monogram on either side, as being the chair of Christ, in which the bishop sits. The same chalcedony is figured by Passeri, who has a dissertation upon it (Thes. Genon. Astrif. iii. 221), and is now, having undergone various fortunes, in the Berlin Museum (Böckh, n. 9080).

Fish, Dove, and Chrisma, inscribed RVFI. (Brit. Museum.)

Other gems which are of this type, but without any suggestive adjuncts, are either known or suspected to be Christian. Mr. King (Gnostics, pl. v. n. 3) figures a fish neatly engraved on a niccolo, bearing the owner's name, T. ACI. AGLAVS, whom he regards as a Christian. The Uzielli Collection (Robinson's Catal. n. 293 [277]^c) had an intaglio of bloodstone in its original bronze setting, bearing a dolphin, which is considered to be "probably early Christian;" and Signor Castellani possesses a fine amethyst cameo^d about 1½ inch by ½, presumed to be Christian, from one side of which, the more convex, a fish of the form of a carp projects boldly, the other side bearing the name of the possessor, VALERIAE, in incised letters. But the most interesting example of this kind is the episcopal ring of Arnulphus, consecrated bishop of Metz in A.D. 614, now preserved in the cathedral treasury; it is set with "an opaque milk-white cornelian," about half an inch in diameter, representing a fish whose head appears above the containing basket, on either side of which is a smaller fish: the work is presumed to be earlier than the fourth century. This is regarded by Cav. de Rossi as a curious illustration of a passage in Tertullian (De Bapt. c. 1): "Nos pisciculi secundum Piscem nostrum in aquis nascimur, nec nisi in aquis permanendo salvi sumus" (Pitra, Spicil. Solesm. tom. iii. p. 578, tab. iii. n. 4. Paris, 1855. Waterton in Arch. Journ. xx. 237 [1863]; Fortnum, ibid. xxviii. 274 [1871]; Marriott, Test. of Catac. p. 123 [with a figure]. Lond. 1870). This type occurs also in subordination to that of the anchor, about to be mentioned. Besides the gems of the fish type here enumerated, the writer is acquainted with the casts of some others, and would also direct the reader to Didron, Christ. Icon. p. 345 (Millington's transl. in Bohn's S. ient. Libr.); Perret, u. s.; Martigny, Dict. s. v. "Poisson"; and Fortnum, Arch. Journ. xxviii. 274, for further information and references. "De Rossi alone" [in his De Christ. monum. IXΘN exhib. in Spicil. Solesm. iii. 555, 576, 577; see Pitra's Auct. 578, Paris, 1855], says the last-named author, "describes about thirty genuine gems on which the fish and variations of the word IXΘC occur. Some others have since been found. . . . It is moreover," he tells us, "more frequently forged than perhaps any other." A remarkable sard intaglio, in the possession of the writer, may be mentioned as a kind of postscript.

The device is a fantastic compound animal, a gryllus of the common type, being probably Roman work of the second or third century. Some Christian possessor has written the word IXΘC about it, in order, it would seem, to christianize such a heathen production. See IXΘC.

Christianised Gryllus. (In the Collection of the writer.)

^c The number in the brackets is that of the sale catalogue (compiled from Mr. Robinson's privately printed catalogue), London, 1861.

^d A drawing has been sent by the Rev. C. W. Jones. With the exception of late Byzantine works Christian camei are very rare. Signor Saulini sends a cast of a cameo (?) gem, stone not specified, of a still larger size, representing two similar fishes, looking opposite ways, the lower inverted; it is also figured by Perret, u. s.

(iii.) Anchor.—The anchor, originally as Crement observes, the signet of Seleucus (see Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. iii. 212), and frequently occurring on the coins of the Seleucidae, whence it passed over to the Jewish money, was frequently employed as a gem type by the Christians, and so much the more readily from its resemblance to the cross; whence the motto, Crux mea anchora. This type occurs both in connection with the preceding and also independently of it. Of the former sort the British Museum contains the four following examples, all probably of Christian work: anchor between two fish, around it the letters APΓ, in black jasper; another with dolphin twisted round it, like the modern Aldine device, about it the preceptive legend ΕΠΙΤΥΧΑΝΟΤ (Lay hold) in red jasper; anchor between two fishes, in niccolo; another between two branches and two fishes, on whose arms two doves are seated, in chalcedony. But the following are more important and unquestionably Christian. A sard figured by Minter (Antiq. Abhandl. 1816, p. 57, t. i. n. 3), of an octagonal form, gives an anchor with two fishes and the legend ΙΗCOT (Böckh, n. 9090). The Berlin Museum has recently acquired a gem bearing an anchor and a sheep and the legend IXΘC: upon the anchor sits a dove with an olive branch in its mouth (Böckh, n. 9081). Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. iii. 278) figures a ring cameo in the Vettori Museum, inscribed ΙΗCOTC above, ΧΡΕΙCΤOC below, having between the words an anchor, with a fish hanging from each end of the stock. An opal in the same museum, figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 545), has on one side a cruciform anchor, on the other, enclosed in an ornamented border, the legend IXΘC written κρουθόν. The Berlin Museum has a red jasper having the word IXΘC and the letters MT, perhaps the owner's initials, disposed around an anchor (Böckh, n. 9079). But the anchor has also other accompanying symbols. Thus another gem in the same museum (Böckh, n. 9082) has around the figure of an anchor the boustrophedon legend ΙΗ | Χ (Jesus Christ), and also the accompanying symbols of a tree, a sheep, doves, a palm, and a human hand. (For others see above under the Good Shepherd.) There are also gems, presumed to be Christian, of which casts have been received from Signor Saulini, in which the anchor is figured by itself alone.

(iv.) Dove.—This type, usually symbolical of the Holy Spirit, has been already mentioned as occurring on gems in conjunction with other Christian types. Besides these, Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. iii. 235) describes and figures, after Mamachi, a gem in which occurs the dove on a palm branch, a star above, and the chrisma (✠) on the left. The British Museum has a garnet with the same device, but no chrisma; and also a portion of a cornelian ring, on the flat bezel of which is engraved a dove holding a branch, considered by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian work of the second or third century (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 140). A sapphire in the same collection bears the same device. The French collection contains a cornelian, the work of which appears to be of the sixth century, on which is engraved a dove, a palm, and a crown, with a monogram of Veranus (?), in style resembling those of the Ostrogothic kings of Italy (Chabouillet, Catal. n. 2167). The dove occurs also on Christian gems found in Rome or preserved in the Roman collections, in most cases accompanied by the chrisma (Saulini, Perret). A pale sard * intaglio in the possession of Mr. Ready has two rudely-engraved doves with a cross between them. "One of the prettiest devices of the class that has come to my knowledge," says Mr. King (Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 26, note), "shews the dove with olive twig in beak, perched upon a wheat-sheaf, apt emblem of the Church, having for supporters a lion and serpent. It pictorially embodies the precept to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. (In possession of F. Taylor.) The British Museum, in fine, has a gem of large size and late work, reading in minuscule letters αναστασι. + του δημου; below the legend is a sheaf of corn, and two doves with olive branches below, indicating that the ingathering of the harvest of souls will be in peace. Other examples are named by Martigny, u. s.

Dove and Sheaf. (C. g.)

(v.) Fisherman.—The type alludes to the Saviour and the apostles as fishers of men. It is rarely found on Christian gems, but we have a few examples. M. de Belloc, in his work entitled La Vierge au Poisson de Raphael (Lyon, 1833), figures an engraved cornelian, which he considers to be Christian, upon which is a fisherman holding a basket in one hand, and in the other a line from which a fish is suspended; the word ΙΧΘΥΣ is written near the fish (Didron, Christian. Iconogr. pp. 345, 364 in Bohn's Illustr. Libr.). This would seem to be a different gem from a cornelian mentioned by Vallarsi in his notes on St. Jerome (i. 18), of the same type with the same inscription (Didron, u. s. p. 349); Martigny speaks of it as excellent in workmanship and probably of great antiquity: he regards the fisherman as the Saviour (Dict. p. 518; Garrucci, Hagiogr. p. 111). A sard intaglio, regarded by Mr. King as "purely Christian," in his own collection is figured in his Gnostics, pl. x. n. 7; it gives two winged figures, probably Cupids, in a boat, one fishing, the other steering; "the mast with the yard, making a true cross, forms a significant and conspicuous feature in the design" (p. 224). Its Christianity, however, seems rather questionable.^e

(vi.) Boat or Ship.—These occur on Christian gems, as being typical of the church, and then sometimes resting on a fish, or of the voyage of the soul to the harbour of eternal rest. Mr. Fortnum describes and figures a fragment of a ring of dark green jasper, probably of the second or third century, purchased in Rome, on the bezel of which is engraved a boat bearing a bird and a branch, probably a cock and palm branch. The boat is supposed to be the church, and the victory of the soul over the world to be indicated by the other types^f (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 140). Aleander (Nav. Eccles. Ref. Symb. p. 13, Rom. 1626) figures a ring-stone; and Ficoroni gives another (Gemme Antig. p. 105, t. xi. 8), on which the ship seems to rest on a fish. A ring figured by cardinal Borgia (De Cruce Velit. p. 213) is set with an antique jasper intaglio, the subject of which is a ship, having six rowers on one side, which, supplying the corresponding six on the other, would represent the twelve apostles; there is also a pilot, or helmsman, and the name ΙΗCΩΤ inscribed on the reverse (Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1871, pp. 274, 275; Mart. Dict. p. 432). A cornelian in the British Museum (intaglio) has a ship with mast and yard-arm in the form of a cross, bearing also a cross at the prow. A fine black jasper intaglio, in the possession of Rev. S. S. Lewis, shows a boat with a Greek cross in the centre. A cornelian, belonging to count Marcolini, an impression of which is published by Lippert (iii. 361), bears a trireme with the labarum, on which is the chrisma and two palm trees; the prow is in the form of a bird's head; the vessel enters into port, and the sea is marked by a fish: in the field are two stars and the unexplained letters E. T. R. A.; below, VGGP. (Raspe's Cat. of Treasures. Engraved Gems, n. 2715). Other gems, whose

^e The gem reproduced by Martigny (u. s.) from Costadoni, showing a fish in human form holding a basket, which Polidori interprets to be the Saviour, is rather, to judge by the figure, an Assyrian or Babylonian gem, representing Dagon (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i p. 381).

^f With this may be compared an antique paste in the Hertz Collection (No. 2525), having a ship with cock-shaped prow, rowed by four benches of sailors; a butterfly above. The allusion to the immortality of the soul can hardly be doubted, but the emblem is pagan rather than Christian.

^g This gem is more fully described below. [See impressions have been sent from Rome, bear a boat with the chrisma, or the chrisma accompanied by a palm above. A sard (intaglio) with the same type is set in a ring in the Naples Museum (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 280).

It will now be seen that we have examples of all the types mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, the lyre only excepted, occurring on gems which are either certainly known or reasonably presumed to be Christian. This type also occurs, but it is uncertain whether any gem on which it is found is to be considered of Christian work.

(vii.) Lyre.—Employed probably as the type of harmony and concord. The only example known to Martigny (Des Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens, Mâcon, 1858) which he could regard as Christian is one in the Royal Library of Turin, of very indifferent work, in a style like many Christian gems, figured by Perret, Catacombes (vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 60). Nor can he add another in his Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, written seven years later (p. 40).^b

The following types are not mentioned by Clemens; the first three of them have been already indicated in connection with those gems which have been described; but they occur on other gems also.

(viii.) Palm.—This symbol of victory, among Pagans, Jews, and Christians, occurs frequently on engraved stones and metal rings, and it is sometimes difficult to decide whether a given engraving is to be considered Pagan or Christian (Arch. Journ. 1871, pp. 275, 276, 280, 282). It has already been noticed that the palm occurs as an accessory type on some of the Christian gems above described; it occurs also in other combinations. On a cornelian in the British Museum a hand holds a palm branch erect, the chrisma is above and MNHMONETE below. In the same museum is a cornelian, presumably of Christian work, on which is a palm branch placed vertically, inclosed in a wreath of laurel: on opposite sides of the branch are the proper names ZOTIKOC and TEPTVAAA, who may possibly have been martyrs. A sard in the Rev. C. W. King's collection bears a palm branch placed horizontally, and below it the acclamation (probably Christian), SVLE VIVE (letters partly inverted). The palm branch occurs also by itself or accompanied by inscriptions on various other gems and rings, which are reasonably supposed or suspected to be of Christian work, which is distinguished, in Mr. Waterton's opinion, by the rude manner of the representation, more truly figuring the natural object

Palm, and Chrisma above

^b Among those bearing this type described by Raspe (u.s. Nos. 3032-3044), or contained in the Hertz Collection (Nos. 1094-1097), there is not one which can safely be pronounced to be Christian, but there are two antique pastes in the latter (Nos. 1094, 1095) in which the sides of the lyre are formed of dolphins or fishes. The sounding-board of one of these has the form of a sleeping animal. The original, as it would seem, of this, a plasma intaglio, is in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis. The occurrence of fish in this connection suggests that the gems may be Christian, but as the dolphin is connected with Apollo the inference is hazardous.

(Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 276). For some of these see King's Cat. of Leake's Gems in Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, p. 9. Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 142; and 1871, p. 276.

(ix.) Cross.—This type, in connection with the dove, or in a disguised form as yard and mast, has been more than once described above. But it occurs on other gems without disguise.¹ A Greek cross in conjunction with a lion, supposed to allude to the church of St. Mark at Alexandria, occurs on an onyx intaglio in the possession of Mr. Fortnum (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 147). An iron ring, set with a cornelian intaglio (burnt), is contained in the British Museum; the device is a cross, accompanied by some animal very rudely engraved (Fortnum, Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 146). Beger (Thes. Palæt.) figures a gem, having a tall Latin cross, from the arms of which hang two fishes.^k Garrucci (Nuism. Constantin. p. 261, (at the end of his Vetri Ornati, Rom. 1864) mentions other gems with the cross type, three of which are in the possession of M. Van den Berghe. Mr. Fortnum describes a massive gold ring in the Castellani collection, embossed with figures of doves in the shoulders, which is set with a garnet, on the face of which is engraved a draped figure seated between two Greek crosses potent (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 281). It is now in the British Museum, and seems late work. The Museum has also a burnt cornelian inscribed TATPINOC, where a female holds a cross. A gem is figured by Garrucci (Hagioglypta, praef. p. v.), where a Greek cross is prefixed to the acclamation VIVAS IN (DEO. sc.), Martigny, in fine, observes that on several gems (one is figured by Perret, vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 74), some of which appear to be considerably older than Constantine, we have engraved representations of the cross¹ (Dict. p. 185). See also § xvii.

(x.) Chrisma, or Monogram of Christ.—This emblem (✠), which is thought by high authorities to be earlier than Constantine (Mart. Dict. p. 416), is found either by itself or in various combinations upon a considerable number of gems, and somewhat varying in form. A fine spherical sapphire, "where the preciousness of the material attests the rank, perhaps patriarchal, of the possessor" (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 28), in the British Museum gives the monogram, having a straight line at right angles to the P on its summit (⌘), which forms a Tau, allusive to the cross. This is also the case with a crystal signet ring, "annulus vetustissimus," formerly in cardinal Barberini's museum (its resting-place being now unknown, Fortnum, in Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 272), figured by De Corte (Syntax. de Ann. p. 120), where a serpent, pecked by two cocks, entwines itself about the base of the Tau: on either side of the upper part are the letters A and ω, and the stone is also inscribed beneath the bezel with the word SALVS.

^k Referred to by King (Gnostics, p. 142).

¹ It may perhaps just be worth mentioning here that certain large pieces of crystal bearing the figure of the cross may be as early as the period embraced in the present work. Douglas (Næn. Brit. t. xx. f. 11) figures a crystal exhumed in 1758 in a barrow near Lowestoft along with coins of Avitus (A.D. 456) and other money of the Lower Empire, now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. It is a boat-shaped piece (1 × 1½ in.), on which is engraved in intaglio a Latin cross potent. It may probably be of the Saxon period, and it looks as if it might once have been inserted in a liturgical book cover or in the lid of a box. But it is not easy to speak of the dates of these crystals and other stones, some of which, engraved or plain, have been also found in Ireland (Valancey, Coll. de Reb. Hibern. vol. iv. pl. li. n. 13; Wilde, Cat. of Mus. of Roy. Irish Acad., pp. 127, 128). Most of them appear to have been amulets.

Mr. Fortnum has a ring of excellent workmanship, purchased at Athens, of massive gold, set with an onyx intaglio bearing the chrisma, "the P being crossed with the third stroke" (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 142). Mr. King (Gnostics, p. 142) mentions a ring cut out of crystal, bearing the chrisma alone, on the face of an oblong tablet, said to have been found in Provence. The same author (l. c. p. 141) mentions an elegant device given in Gori. Dactyl. 211, where the sacred monogram, cut on the face of a solid crystal ring, rests upon the head of a Cupid (or angel?) on each side of whom stands a dove. This style he considers to have been derived from the Sassanian stone rings. Passeri (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. vol. ii. p. 220, t. cc.) figures a gem on which the chrisma is surmounted by a star, the X being formed by two branches of palm. This symbol is also sometimes accompanied by inscriptions both Greek and Latin. Martigny (Dict. p. 418) mentions a cornelian given by Macarius (Hieroglypta, p. 235, ed. Gar.), inscribed with the word IXΘΥC, the X being combined with a P to express the chrisma; possibly the same gem as that described above under § ii. The Berlin Museum has a heliotrope in which the chrisma is accompanied by a fruit-bearing tree and the following inscription: ἐπικαλούμαι Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν Ναζαρενὸν Πατέρα . . . (Böckh, n. 9094; the fragment is here given in part only and in minuscules). The British Museum contains a cornelian bearing the acclamation, DEVSE DIT VIVAS IN DEO, to the right of which is the chrisma, and to the left a small wreath. Mr. King figures a gem in the Vernon Collection (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 28, 37) where the chrisma of a not quite usual form appears in the middle of an olivegarland, with the name of the possessor, ΦΟΙΒΕΙΩΝ, Phœbion (like Hephæstion, from Hephæstus), of which the work is unusually fine. The sacred monogram under various forms is found, as Mr. Fortnum observes (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 271), "more frequently than any other on Christian rings. . . . We find it alone and accompanied by almost all the other emblems, with inscriptions and monograms."^m

^m Various impressions of gems bearing the chrisma, which are more or less similar to those described above,

(xi.) Animals.—It has been already noticed that "a lion," which Mr. Fortnum connects with St. Mark, occurs on an onyx accompanied by a Greek cross. Eudodius, bishop of Pavia about 511, has an epigram, De annulo Firminae, from which we learn that it bore a lion:

"Gestaudus manibus sævit leo."

Whether the lion was intended to have any Christian significance is uncertain. The phenix occurs on an engraved stone in conjunction with the palm, a combination which occurs on other monuments which are indubitably Christian, Perret (vol. iv. pl. xvi. 68; Martigny, Dict. p. 534). In the British Museum are more than one gem bearing sheep, from the collection of the abbé Hamilton, of Rome, which are presumed to be Christian. On one are two sheep, on each side a dolphin; on another are two sheep and palm branches. It might not be difficult to increase the enumeration of these ambiguous types; but they are scarcely worthy of a more extended notice.

Before proceeding further we may observe that the British Museum contains a large pale sard in which the pastor, the chrisma, dove and branch, fish, dolphin, ship, and various adjuncts are combined; another, of smaller size, in two compartments, has the pastor, dove, anchor, fishes, with other figures and animals; they were formerly in the Hamilton Collection, and are figured (with several others from the same collection, which is now in the British Museum) by Ferret (iv. pl. xvi. figs. 5, 8).

The following subjects appear to have been introduced upon gems at a later period than the types already mentioned.^o have been sent from Rome by Signor Saulini: on one the X is formed of two fishes, one holding a wreath (crown of thorns?) the other having a dove on its tail; palm on either side of the monogram.

ⁿ Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. p. 25) mentions that the frog, whose body passes through so many stages, was employed for a Christian signet as an emblem of the Resurrection; he does not however refer to any authority for this. In Raspe's Catalogue of Tassie's Gems (No. 13,355) is a gem bearing a frog with a palm and a serpent; these adjuncts rather suggest that the work may be Christian. See GLASS.

^o The first place would be due to representations of God the Father, if such really existed in the period embraced in this work, abhorrent as such images may appear to many. Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 32) mentions "a large nicolo in an antique massy gold ring, engraved with the Heavenly Father enthroned amidst the twelve patriarchs, the work carefully finished and well drawn." This gem, which he saw in the possession of the late Mr. Forrest, appeared to him to date from the times of the Western Empire. But there seems to be some error here. "During the first centuries of Christianity," says Didron (Christian Iconogr. p. 201, Engl. trans.), "even as late as the 12th century, no portraits of God the Father are to be seen." The hand seems to have been the only permitted symbol. Either, therefore, the work is likely to be later than the 12th century, or (more probably) the interpretation of the group is erroneous. One might suspect the Saviour and the apostles to be intended. Upon a cornelian formerly in the possession of Dr. Nott, the Saviour is represented on a column, with extended arms, having six figures on each side, in the exergue a sheep: in the field and exergue EHCO (sic, for IHCOTC) XPECTOC. It is obvious that these are the twelve apostles, but the Jewish and Gentile churches, as symbolised by them, are most probably intended. See § XII. and GLASS. (A cast sent from Rome by Signor Saulini.)

(xii.) The Saviour.—In the earlier gems the Saviour appears only in the form of emblems, as the Good Shepherd and the Fish, and (more rarely) as the Fisherman; but from about the fourth century onwards the representations become more realistic. Le Blant has a sardonyx, bearing a dead Christ, with the inscription, SALVS RESTITVTA, ascribed to the fourth century (Martigny, Des anneaux chez les prem. Chrét. p. 36). An ancient onyx, figured by Perret (iv. pl. xvi. 85), exhibits the Saviour reaching out his hand to St. Peter as he is about to sink in the waves; their names (in an abbreviated form) are written near them in Greek characters: ΙΗC. ΠΕΤ.; the boat is seen tossed by a storm, a fish just below (Mart. Dict. p. 539. See also Aleander, u. s.; Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christ. t. iv. p. 260, ed. Matr., and Garrucci in Macarius, Hagioglypta, p. 237). A green jasper intaglio in the British Museum, considered by Mr. King to belong most probably to the date of the Western empire, exhibits Christ's entry into Jerusalem, the Saviour being accompanied by three figures, one bearing a palm (Gnost. p. 140). When the coffin of bishop Agilbert, of Paris (seventh century) was opened, De Saussay, who was present, saw on his finger a gold ring with a jewel, on which was a likeness of our Lord and St. Jerome (Marriott, Vestiar. Christ. p. 222, London, 1868). A cameo in agate, probably early mediaeval Italian work of uncertain date, represents the Saviour teaching the three favoured disciples, one by his side, the others fronting him; two angels behind: the disciples are bearded, the Saviour beardless; in the Bibl. Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 294; King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 35, 36). With the exception of Byzantine cameos, and of one or two gems presumed to be Gnostic, "no ancient portraits of the Saviour exist on gems" (King's Gnostics, p. 137).^p Among the earlier Byzantine camei is to be mentioned a fine oval plaque of lapis-lazuli, probably the gift of the emperor Heraclius to king Dagobert (A.D. 628–638), which remained in the Treasury of St. Denys for a thousand years: on one side was the bust of the Saviour, on the other that of his mother (King, Handbook, p. 104; id. in Arch. Journ. 1870, p. 185).

The French collection contains several Byzantine camei bearing portraits of Christ. Some of these on amethyst and jasper, with legend, ΙC. ΧC. (i.e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστός), represent Him with a cruciform nimbus, in a long robe, holding the gospels in the left hand, and giving the benediction with the right (Chabouillet, Cat. nos. 258–260). These remind us of the coins of Justinian II. (A.D. 685–711), and may perhaps be earlier than A.D. 800. So much can hardly be said of a large bloodstone in the British Museum, which represents the bust of the Saviour in high relief; the style rather resembles that of the age of John Zimisces (tenth century), (King's Gnostics, p. 141). A chalcedony in the same museum, representing the Saviour, half-length, holding a book, and in the act of blessing ($1\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{7}{8}$ inches) appears to be earlier.

(xiii.) Christ as the Lamb of God.—Garrucci (in Macar. Hag. pp. 222, 244; Martigny, Dict. p. 226, with figure) has published an annular engraved stone, representing the Lamb of God surrounded by a nimbus which includes the chrisma, standing on a column, the symbol of the church; twelve gems (Rev. xxi.) on it represent the twelve apostles; at the base of the column on either side are two lambs, the Jewish and Gentile believers, looking up at Him: around is the acclamation, IANVARI VIVAS. For the same subject see GLASS.

(xiv.) The Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin.—The British Museum has a small sardonyx cameo of black and white strata (from the Hertz collection, n. 1825), of very neat Byzantine work, and possibly of very high antiquity,^q representing the Annunciation. The Virgin stands inclined towards the winged Cupid-like angel: above is the legend, Ο ΧΑΙΡΕΤΙCΜΟC, and the names of the figures, ΓΑΒΡΙΗΛ and ΜΡ. ΘΥ. (μήτηρ θεοῦ, i.e. mother of God) are written near them. The British Museum, the Hertz collection (n. 1824), and the Paris collection (Chabouillet, nos. 262, 263), have other larger camei on sardonyx (an inch or more wide), representing the same subject, bearing the barbarous legend, ΧΑΙΡΕ (or ΧΕΡΕ), ΚΕΧΑΠΙΤΟΜΕΝΗ (or ΚΑΙΧΑΠΙΤΟΜΕΝΗ), Ο ΚC. ΜΕΤΑ CΟΤ (Luke i. 28). The second of these is referred to "the oldest Christian period" (Hertz, Catalogue, p. 125);

^q Mr. King (Ant. Gems and Rings, ii. 31) thinks that it may probably date as far back as Constantine's reign. But it may be doubted whether the title, μήτηρ θεοῦ, goes so far back. See Pearson, On the Creed, Art. III. With regard to the style of the gem itself, the writer is inclined to put it considerably later than the fourth century.

^r This gem passed into the Uzielli Collection (Robinson's Cat. No. 1119 [646, a.]), where it is called "Byzantine Greek work of uncertain period."

the others are considered by Chabouillet to be of the fifth century. Perhaps they may be rather regarded as early mediaeval (see King's Handbook, p. 111).

(xv.) The Virgin and Child.—An intaglio in the British Museum, green jasper, of very rude workmanship, "executed with the peculiar technique of Gnostic work," and, if this be admitted, apparently about the fourth century^a (see King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 31), represents the Virgin and Child seated, with an angel on each side, two others hovering overhead. The Madonna and child in her arms (both with nimbus), accompanied by their names, IC. XC. and MP. ΘΥ., is represented on a Byzantine cameo of red jasper, in the Paris collection (Chabouillet, n. 265). A similar one on bloodstone ($1\frac{3}{4} \times 1\frac{1}{16}$ inches) is in the British Museum. These may perhaps be early mediaeval.

In the Uzielli collection (n. 284 [300]) was an intaglio on cornelian ($\frac{5}{8}$ by $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch), with the Virgin and Child, with XAIPE and MP. ΘΥ., which Mr. J. C. Robinson calls "Byzantine or mediaeval Greek work of uncertain date." A gem, published by Oderico, gives the Virgin and Child with legend, MP. ΘΥ. Η ΠΗΓΗ, i.e. the image of the Madonna in the church of the Fountain, erected at Constantinople by Justinian, but this gem may be of much later date (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9109). It is probable that this general type would be engraved on Byzantine gems during a great part of the middle ages, from the sixth or seventh century onwards.

(xvi.) Saints or persons unknown.—Bosio and Mannachi (Dei costumi dei primit. Crist. Prefaz.)

(King.)

figure a cornelian, on which are engraved the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul (Mart. Dict. pp. 40, 539). A red jasper intaglio, a graceful new year's gift, exhibits a female saint, perhaps St. Agnes, kneeling before an executioner, who is about to cut off her head with a great razorlike sword; before her a dove holds a branch; above is the chrisma, to declare the presence of her Redeemer in the hour of trial; in the field are the letters ANFT (Annum novum felicem tibi): good work, probably about the age of Constantine^b (King, Anc. Gems, pp. 352, 353, figured).

A cameo in the British Museum, cut in a beautiful sardonyx, possibly as early as the fourth century,^c gives a full-length figure of St. John the Baptist with his name (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 31). The same saint is represented on a cornelian, published by Vettori (pars ii. c. ix.). The Berlin Museum has a black jasper intaglio, reading EIC ΘEOC, and having rudely engraved upon it a female with hands uplifted in prayer (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9103). The British Museum has a Virgin, half-length, with circular nimbus, and uplifted hands, a cameo on bloodstone, with the legend MP. ΘΥ.; which may perhaps be early mediaeval. Besides these examples still existing, we have the following literary notices of rings bearing similar types being worn by bishops and others.

St. Chrysostom tells us that in his time many Christians of Antioch wore in their rings the likeness of St. Meletius (who died A.D. 381), and impressed it on their seals (Hom. de S. Melet. t. ii. p. 519, ed. Venet. 1734). St. Augustine, writing to bishop Victorinus, says that his epistle is sealed "annulo qui exprimit faciem hominis attentis in latus" (Epist. 59 [217]). Ebreghislaus, bishop of Meaux in 660, wore in his ring an intaglio representing St. Paul, the first hermit, on his knees before a crucifix, and above his head the crow, by which he was miraculously fed (Annal. S. Benedict. t. i. p. 456; Waterton in Arch. Journ. 1863, p. 225).^d

To the above should perhaps be added a Byzantine cameo, nearly two inches in diameter, of streaked jasper, representing St. John the Evangelist, with the nimbus, seated, and holding the gospel in his hand. In the field O A (ὁ ἄγιος) ΙΩ Ο ΘΕΟΛΟΓΟΣ; in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, Cat. n. 266). This gem may possibly fall within our period, and is classed near to some that probably do so; but the difficulty of fixing the particular age of mediaeval Byzantine camei is almost insuperable. The greater part of them, in Mr. King's skilled judgment, belong to the age of the Comneni (Ant. Gems and Rings, i. 307).

(xvii.) Imperial or Royal Personages with Christian Accessories.—The art of cameo-engraving, which had fallen into complete abeyance from the time of Septimius Severus, who has bequeathed to posterity many fine camei-portraits of himself and his family, sprang into a new but short life under Constantine. Camei portraits of himself and his sons, "admirable for the material, and by no means despicable for the execution," are found in various private and public collections, on sardonyx stones of large, sometimes very large, dimensions (King, Ant. Gems and Rings, i. 304). One fine gem, at least, marks the change of the imperial religion; it is not however exactly a cameo, but a solid

^a In this case also it seems possible that the date may be much later.

^b In his latest work (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 33) Mr. King thinks that it "can hardly be placed lower than the age of Theodosius, whose best coins it certainly resembles both in style and workmanship."

^c It seems, however, that it may, with at least equal probability, be assigned to about the tenth century.

^d A sardonyx, published by F. Vettori, has on the obverse a portrait of the Virgin with the usual letters MP. ΘΥ., and on the reverse a cross with contracted legend KEB. (for Kyrie Ekeke). ΑΙΟΤΙ ΔΕΧΟΤ, i.e. O Lord! help Lord Leo! Conjecturally referred to Leo (the Wise) A.D. 886-911, but without sufficient reason; it is just possible that the gem may have been executed within the period embraced in this work. See Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9100. A very interesting gem is inserted in a silver plate (gilt) of the age of Justinian: the great martyr (μεγαλομάρτυς) Demetrius is invoked as a mediator with God (μεσσητεύων πρὸς θεόν) to aid Justinian, "king of the Romans upon earth," and in the midst of the plate, just above a picture of St. Demetrius, "opere tessellato," is "amethystus insculpta, more carneolae facie imberbi." This may probably be meant for Demetrius also, but as IC XC (Jesus Christ) ΝΙΚΑ (νικᾷ) occurs higher up, it is not very clear whether it may not be a portrait of the Saviour. The inscription is given at length in Böckh's C. I. G. n. 8042, from Marini's papers, published by Mai. (Script. Vet. Noe. Coll. v. 30, no figures.)

bust. An agate, measuring nearly four inches, in the Bibliothèque Impériale, shows his bust with the paludamentum and cuirass, on the latter is a cross. His head is naked, and his eyes are raised to heaven, as on some of his coins. Formerly the ornament of the extremity of the choir-staff (15th-century work) in La Sainte-Chapelle.

Chabouillet, Cat. n. 287, who refers to Morand's Hist. de la Sainte Chapelle du Palais, (p. 56) for a figure of the gem incorporated with the baton.) Besides this noble piece we have several others also, but of inferior execution.

Passeri describes and figures a gem, preserved at Venice, representing a horseman spearing a dragon with a long lance terminating in a cross above: he regards it as a representation of a Christian emperor, conquering his enemies with the cross; a star, an emblem of Divine providence, in his judgment, is seen above (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. t. 2, pp. 289-297). This interpretation is somewhat confirmed by the types of certain coins of the fourth century, to which age this coin may probably be assigned.

The Mertens-Schauffhausen collection possessed an agate intaglio, which passed into the Leturcq cabinet, exhibiting a full-faced bust of the emperor Mauritius, wearing the imperial crown of the lower empire, and holding a globe, on which rests a Greek cross inscribed, D. N. MAVRITIVS P. P. A. Supposed to be a work of the sixth century, Leturcq, Catid. n. 210.^v The Leturcq collection contained also a green jasper intaglio, giving full-faced portraits of Constant II. (crowned) and of his son Constantine IV. (Pogonatus), both bearded, with a Greek cross between their busts, having a scorpion engraved on the back in the rude style of the so-called Gnostic gems (n. 211). The same collection in fine had an agate intaglio bearing busts of Leo IV. and his son Constantine VI. (Flavius), inscribed, D. N. LEO ET CONSTANTINVS P. P. A., both full-faced and crowned, and holding between them a double-handled cross (n. 212). These rare portraits of the Byzantine Caesars, of the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, appear to be in the same general style as those which appear on their money (see Sabatier, Monn. Byz. pl. xxiv. xxxiv. xli.).

There is one more gem of this class, which falls a few years later than the chronological limits of this work, but which ought hardly to be passed over here in consequence of its extreme interest in helping to fix the limits of gem-engraving in the West before the age of the Renaissance. The magnificent gold cross of king Lotharius, said to be of about the date 823, now preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, is remarkable for the variety of gems, rubies, sapphires, amethysts, and emeralds with which its surface is studded. At the intersection of the arms is inserted a very fine onyx cameo of Augustus, probably a contemporary work, and just below this an oval intaglio of rock crystal, of Frankish work and of very tolerable execution, two inches long and an inch and a half wide, giving the bust of Lotharius, ^v Mr. King, however, has some doubt about its genuineness (Antique Gems, pp. 163, 164). The Leturcq Cabinet was sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, in 1874, the accompanying catalogue by the owner being in French and English.

"his head covered with a close-fitting helmet, with a slightly-projecting frontlet, like those of the latest Roman period; around the bust is the legend, in well-formed Roman letters, + XPE ADIVVA HLOTHARIVM REG." (figured in Cahier et Martin, Mél. d'Arch. vol. i. pl. xxxi.; King's Ant. Gems, p. 305; King's Handbook of Engraved Gems, p. 116).

There still remain to be considered some ancient gems bearing manifest traces of Christianity, which may be separately classed, viz., the Gnostic and the Sassanian.

Gnostic Gems.—A Gnostic origin has been hesitatingly assigned to one or two gems already mentioned, and a great number of gems called Gnostic have been described in Chabouillet's Catalogue. (See also ABRASAX in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.) Of these, a considerable number bear the word ABPACAΞ, more rarely (in the Greek) ABPAΞAC, (variously written in Latin); and this in itself, in the judgment of some, proves a Gnostic origin. Assuming that Basilides, a Christian Gnostic of the second century, be the inventor of the word,² as St. Jerome evidently thought and as several other Christian writers appear to intimate (see the authorities collected by Jablonski, Opusc. t. iv. pp. 82-86, and Bellermann, Ueber die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxas-Bilde, Erst Stück, pp. 10-28), the numerous stones on which the word is written must either be looked on as Gnostic or else as derived through Gnosticism to other forms of faith or superstition. The latter view seems on the whole to be the more probable; for there is no doubt that the word, as transformed into the magical Abracadabra, passed over to the pagans, and was even employed in Christian times until quite lately as a charm against various forms of disease (Passeri, De gemm. Basilid. in Thes. Gemm. Astrif. vol. ii. p. 236, sq.; King in Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 33; Halliwell, Dict. of Archaic Words, s. v. Abracadabra). We have Abraxas occurring in connection with the names, ΙΑΩ (Jehovah), CABAωΘ, ΑΔωΝΑΙ, and with the titles or representations of Harpocrates, Mithras, Mercury, &c. (see Passeri, u. s. &c.), but in no single instance known to the writer, though very possibly such may exist,³ does this word occur on any engraved stone in any connection which can be safely counted upon as Christian. These stones consequently, as well as all others which have been called Gnostic, but shew no manifest sign of Christianity are passed over in this article. Very few of them, if any, can be fixed to any particular Gnostic sect or to Gnosticism generally;^b by much the greater part appear to have been charms. The following very scanty list, however, of unmistakably Christian gems may be with some reason looked on as Gnostic:—

² Some, as Mosheim (De Reb. Christ. ante Constant. p. 350) have thought that the word is probably older than Basilides: on what grounds we know not. This matter deserves a searching examination.

(1.) A portrait of Christ, beardless, to the right; XPICTOT above, a fish underneath. Figured by Raoul-Rochette (Tableau des Catacombes de Rome, frontispiece, Paris, 1853) who regards it as Gnostic (p. 265) from the original in the possession of the marquis de Fortia d'Urban, formerly in the Lajard collection. The stone is white chalcledony, the form is oval; ascribed to the second or third century (Mart. Dict. p. 40).

(2.) Another portrait with the same types and legend, on a truncated cone of white chalcledony, in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1334). This gem, probably of Eastern fabric, is considered to be not later than the middle of the fourth century, and "presents the combination of the ancient Oriental form and of Greek decoration in the same monument" (King, Gnostics, p. 143). Figured by Perret, u. s. n. 47; very similar to the preceding.

Epiphanius makes it a charge against the Carpocratians that they kept painted portraits and images in gold and silver, and other materials, which they pretended to be portraits of Jesus (Hæres. c. 27, § 6). These gems, therefore, may probably be the work of some Gnostic sect.^c b The seven vowels, the "Music of the Spheres" occur frequently on this class of stones, and are also mentioned in the lately discovered Gnostic work entitled Pistis, Sophia; but their veneration or magical use can hardly be regarded as exclusively Marcosian or Gnostic (see Walsh, Essay on Ancient Coins, Medals, and Gems, pp. 48-51; King's Gnostics, p. 93; King in Arch. Journ. 1868, pp. 105-107). From the names of the angels mentioned Matter (Hist. Crit. du Gnost. Pl. p. 16, t. i. E. 9) thinks that a gem which he figures after Chifflet (fig. 24) may belong to the sect of the Ophites. One of the very few gems which really appear to savour of the Gnostic philosophy is a sard, of which an impression has been sent by the Rev. W. T. T. Drake; reading σ $\delta\iota\alpha$ $\pi\alpha\nu\tau\omega\nu$ $\nu\omicron\nu\varsigma$. $\alpha\lambda\theta\eta\rho$, $\pi\upsilon\rho$, $\pi\upsilon\epsilon\nu\mu\alpha$. $\epsilon\lambda\omega\epsilon\nu$, $\epsilon\lambda\omega\epsilon\nu$; i. e. Elohim; there was also an inscription round the edge which has been a good deal broken: in the field are monograms or mystic characters. The letters may be of the third or fourth century.

If indeed we could with Bellermann (Gemmen mit dem Abrazas-Bilde, iii. pp. 11, 12) interpret the letters CEMEC EIAAM (misread by him) occurring on gems with the ABPACAE legend or figure, to mean, This is the Messiah of God, זה משיח יי , the number of Gnostic gems might be increased considerably; but in truth the words signify in Hebrew Eternal Sun (Matter, u. s. pp. 17, 29, t. i. F. 5; King, Gnostics, p. 76).

c The numerous portraits of the Saviour which existed in St. Augustine's time differed much from each other; so that his face "innumerablem cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur, quæ tamen una erat, quæcumque erat" (Aug. De Trin. viii. 4). A portrait quite different from the above is rudely engraved, apparently by a much later hand, on the back of a tiny ancient cornelian in the possession of M. Forget, which bears on the other side a fish only: it is figured by Le Blant, Inscr. Christ. de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 371. The realistic representation is here, as in both the preceding gems, combined with the symbol.

CHRIST. ANT

(3.) The sun between two stars, EICVVC. XPECTVZ. TABPIE[A.] ANANIA. AME[N.] in two lines (Passeri, Thes. Gemm. Astrif. ii. p. 277, who does not name the stone). The names of angels, as planetary or astral genii, were invoked by the Ophites, and probably by other Gnostic sects; Gabriel presided over the serpent (King, Gnostics, p. 88). This gem (n. 155 in the Cappello Museum), which is doubtless magical, may well have been produced by some Christian Gnostic, perhaps of the fourth century, when similar barbarous orthography occurs.

(4.) Four-winged deity, standing on a circle formed by a serpent, holding two sceptres; legend obliterated. R The chrisma in the midst o. a circle formed by a serpent biting its tail. Hematite, in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 2178). The figure is a good deal similar to one on another gem, bearing the inscription ABPAÆAC (Chabouillet, n. 2176); the reverse shows it to be the work of a Christian, perhaps of a later Basilidian.

(5.) Iao (Jehovah) under the form of a four-winged mummy, which has the heads of a jackal, a vulture, and a hawk; in the field three stars, legend effaced; below on a cartouche, IAO. R. Trophy between a monogram made up of I and N (possibly for Jesus of Nazareth) and the chrisma; at the base of the trophy is another chrisma. In the Bibliothèque Impériale; serpentine (Chabouillet, n. 2220).

Chabouillet regards the trophy as a figure of the cross triumphant, and thinks the gem belongs to one of the Gnostic sects, who especially revered the Saviour.

Later Persian and Sassanid Gems.—This is a class of engraved stones, which may best be treated separately as being of a different form, conical or hemispherical, to those already named; and bearing legends, when legends are present, in the Pehlevi character. The following meagre list consists wholly of intagli; those in the French collection are thought by Chabouillet to be earlier than the middle of the fourth century; but some appear to be later.

(1.) The Sacrifice of Abraham.—The patriarch holds the knife to slay his son lying on an altar (shaped like a Persian fire-altar); he turns back and sees the angel pointing out the ram; striped sardonyx. Bibl. Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1330). Another gem, of which Mr. King sends an impression, represents an aged Jew, in the field a child: whether this be the same subject or not, is uncertain.

(2.) The Visitation of the Virgin.—St. Elizabeth and the Virgin standing, joining hands; star and crescent (sun and moon) between them: Pehlevi legend, characters connected; cornelian; French collection (Chabouillet, n. 1332). Same subject probably, but without legend; long cross between the figures; sard (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii. p. 45, pl. iv. n. 13). The latter gem is supposed by Mr. King, its owner, to be "the signet of some Nestorian Christian."

(3.) The Virgin and Child.—The Virgin Mary seated, holding the infant Saviour: Pehlevi legend; garnet; Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1331). The cursive form of the Pehlevi character indicates a late age, i.e. that it is probably of Nestorian work (King, Handbook, p. 103).

(4.) The Fish.—Fish placed in the middle of the Christian monogram, which is formed of the letters IX (Jesus Christ). Annular seal; cornelian; same collection (Chabouillet, n. 1333).

Before bringing this account of Christian gems to a close, it remains to be mentioned that some of them bear inscriptions only, both Greek and Latin, and these may better be named here than under the article INSCRIPTIONS.

(1.) Greek Inscriptions.—A red jasper in the British Museum, in an antique gold setting of eored wire, is inscribed, ΘΕΟΣ ΘΕΟΥ ΤΙΟΣ ΤΗΡΕΙ, i.e. O God, Son of God, guard me! A gem, figured by Ficoroni, has ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ, sc. δῶδλος (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9091). On a sardonyx, published by Le Blant, we read—ΧΡΕΙΣΤΟΣ ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΜΕΤ ΕΜΟΥ, i.e. Jesus Christ be with me! (Id. n. 9096). A broken gem in the Copenhagen Museum, reads more at length to the same effect (Id. 9095). An inscription on a gem published by Quaranta, at Naples, whose date, though uncertain, may be suspected to be late, very possibly later than the period embraced by this work, reads, ΙΩΗΦ ΣΥΝΠΑΡΑΤΑΘΗΤΙ | ΕΜΟΙ ΚΑΙ ΤΟΙΣ ΕΡΓΟΙΣ | ΜΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΔΟΣ ΜΟΙ ΧΑΡΙΝ, i.e. O Joseph, aid me and my works, and grant me grace! (Id. 9099). A few other unimportant gems bear inscriptions, sometimes in raised letters, which may probably be Christian, such as ΜΑΡΙΑ ΖΗΧΑΙΣ ΠΟΛΛΟΙΣ ΕΤΕCΙΝ, and the like (see Böckh, nos. 9104-9106).

(2.) Latin Inscriptions.—The acclamation VIVAS IN DEO occurs (varied) on several engraved stones, figured by Ficoroni (Gemm. Ant. Lit. tabb. vii. xi.; Martigny, Dict. p. 8); we have also MAXSENTI VIVAS TVIS F. (for cum tuis feliciter). (Perret, vol. iv. t. xvi. n. 58; Martigny, u. s.)^d On a cameo sard found in a Christian grave we read ROXANE D (dubris), B (bene), QVESQVAS (quiescat), (Buonarrotti, Vetr. Cimit. p. 170, t. 24). Occasionally the inscription is figured in metal round the stone, as in a gold ring inscribed VIVAS IN DEO ASBOLI, found in the Soane, the stone of which is lost; supposed to be of the third or fourth century (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, tom. i. p. 64, pl. n. 6). It was not uncommon from the sixth century onwards for signet rings, both in stone and metal, to be marked with the owner's name in monogram. Avitus, bishop of Vienne, had such a signet in iron; and a red jasper of the Lower empire, in the Bosanquet collection, reads, ANTONINVS, in monogram, which may not improbably be Christian (King, Handbook, p. 107). One of the earliest episcopal gems extant is probably one which was found at Villaverde in Spain, set in a bronze ring, inscribed FEBRVARIVS | EPI SCOPVS (the stone is not specified); it may in all likelihood be referred to the Visigothic period (Hübner, Inscr. Hispan. Christ. n. 205). The series may fitly close with a red cameo gem, preserved in the public library at Madrid, reading in three lines, the text of Joh. xix. 36. OS NON COMINVEÑIS ES (sic) EO. (Hübner, u. s. n. 208).

The preceding enumeration, though professionally incomplete, is more full, it is believed, than any hitherto published; the great rarity of Christian gems renders an apology for a detailed catalogue unnecessary. A few words in conclusion on the materials and the style of art and uses of these gems. The most usual material is the sard, of which the cornelian* is only an inferior form, and the allied stones, the onyx, sardonyx, and chalcedony; next to these in point of number may be placed other kindred stones, the jaspers, whether red, green, or black. Sometimes the stone is heliotrope (or bloodstone), niccolo, crystal, amethyst, plasma, emerald, opal, lapis lazuli, serpentine, and, very rarely, sapphire. Garnet is occasionally found, a stone in which the Sassanian gem-engravings are often formed, and among these we have a Christian example. The hematite is especially the material on which the syncretistic designs, commonly called Gnostic, are engraved; and one of the few Christian gems of that class in this enumeration is of that material.

In engravings which range in all likelihood from the second to the ninth century^e (and some of those here mentioned, being of uncertain date, may be later even than that), we must expect that there will be a considerable amount of variation in the style and excellence of the workmanship. When the work is fine, the fact has been recorded, if known to the writer. Much more commonly the work is mediocre. "The art exhibited in early Christian gems is almost invariably of a low order," observes Mr. Fortnum; "they were for the most part the production of a period of decadence. The greater number have been cut by means of the wheel. Hence arises an additional difficulty in distinguishing the genuine from the false. Their rude workmanship is easy to copy with the same instrument as that with which they were cut; antique stones are abundant at hand, and Roman artists are apt and facile in imitation" (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 292).

* These are not well distinguished in the preceding enumeration; the nomenclature here adopted is that of the author who names the gem; and this remark must be extended to the other stones mentioned. For much information in a small space on the materials of gems Prof. Story Maskelyne's Introduction to the Marlborough Gems (pp. xxvii.-xxxvi. 1870), may be consulted; as well as Mr. King's elaborate work on Precious Stones and Gems, London, 1865.

^d It is but rarely that any work save the work of the stone itself supplies date for conjecturing its age. However the fine emerald bearing a fish, described above, is enclosed in an hexagonal gold setting, which Mr. King calls "a pattern announcing for date the early years of the third century" (Antique Gems and Rings, ii. 29). De Rossi admits the great difficulty of fixing the age of Christian gems, but thinks that a good many of those which bear the fish (type or legend) and anchor are of the fourth and fifth centuries, none being later (in Pitra's Spicil. Solesm. iii. 555, 556).

^e This gem bears three heads, doubtless those of Maxentius and his family: it does not strictly fall within this section, but is placed here to accompany the other similar acclamations.

By much the greater part of the gems mentioned were used for finger-rings, those in intaglio being also employed as seals. Others, however, especially the Gnostic, were amulets, and carried about the person, suspended or otherwise, as charms. The larger camei, of the Byzantine period, appear to have been made for the purpose of decorating church plate or other ecclesiastical objects. (Martigny, Des anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens et de l'anneau épiscopal en particulier, Mâcon, 1858; Fortnum in Arch. Journ. 1869 and 1871; Early Christian Finger-rings; and King, Antique Gems and Rings, vol. ii. pp. 24-37 (Early Christian Glyptic Art), Lond. 1872, as well as his earlier books referred to above.) Much information also is to be gleaned from various catalogues of gems and other books, to which reference is made in the above works and in this paper.) [C. B.]

GENEROSUS. [SCILLITA.]

GENESIUS. (1) Martyr at Rome in the time of Diocletian; commemorated Aug. 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); Aug. 24 (Mart. Hieron., Cal. Allatii et Frontonis).

(2) Martyr, of Arles (circa A.D. 303); commemorated Aug. 25 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GENETHLIA. [CALENDAR; FESTIVAL.]

GENETHLIACI, says Augustine, who condemns all such arts (De Doc. Christ. ii. 21), were so called on account of their founding their predictions on the planets which ruled a man's birthday (γενέθλια); a more common name was Mathematici [ASTROLOGERS; DIVINATION]. He again refers, in the Confessions (iv. 3; vii. 6), to the folly and impiety of supposing that a man's vices were attributable to the fact that the planets Venus, Mars, or Saturn presided over his birth. The passage relating to this matter given in the Decree of Gratian (causa 26, qu. 4, c. 1) as from Augustine, is in fact from Rabanus Maurus De Mag. Priestija, and was by him compiled mainly from Augustine and Isidore. In another passage of Augustine (Conf. iv. 3, quoted in Decret. can. 26, qu. 2, c. 8) Gratian seems to have read "planetarios" for the "planos" of recent editions. All augurs, aruspices, mathematici, and other impostors of that kind were condemned by a law of Con-stantinus, A.D. 357 (Code, lib. v.; De Maleficiis et Mathematicis, in Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, p. iii. tit. iv. cc. 12-14). [C.]

GENIUS OF THE EMPEROR. In the early centuries of the church, one of the tests by which Christians were detected was, to require them to make oath "by the genius or the fortune of the emperor;" an oath which the Christians, however willing to pray for kings, constantly refused as savouring of idolatry. Thus Polycarp (Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 18) was required to swear by the fortune (τύχην) of Caesar. And Saturninus (Acta Marti. Scillit. c. 1, in Ruinart, p. 86, 2nd ed.) adjured Speratus, one of the martyrs of Scillita, "tantum jura per genium regis nostri;" to which he replied "Ego imperatoris mundi genium nescio."

Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 29) reprobates the deification of the emperor, and the heathen practice of swearing by his "genius" or "daemon;" and Tertullian (Apol. c. 32) says that, although Christians did not swear by the genius of the Caesars, they swore by a more august oath, "per salutem eorum." We do not, says Origen (c. Celsum, bk. 8, p. 421, Spencer), swear by the emperor's fortune (τύχην βασιλέως), any more than by other reputed deities; for (as some at least think) they who swear by his fortune swear by his daemon, and Christians would die rather than take such an oath (Bingham's Antiquities, xvi. vii. 7). [C.]

GENOFEVA or GENOVEFA, virgin-saint, of Paris († circa 514 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 3 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); translation Oct. 28 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GENTILLY, COUNCIL OF (Gentiliacense Concilium), held A.D. 767, at Gentilly, near Paris, but authentic records of its proceedings are wanting. Annalists of the next age say that it was assembled by Pepin to consider a twofold question that had arisen between the Eastern and Western churches respecting the Trinity and the images of the saints (Pertz, i. 144). Quite possibly the iconoclastic council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, may have been discussed there, but there is no proof that the dispute between the two churches on the procession of the Holy Ghost had commenced as yet. The letter of pope Paul to Pepin (Mansi, xii. 614) is much too vague to be relied on, and what embassies are recorded to have come from the east in his reign are still less to the purpose (Ibid. p. 677; comp. Pagi, ad Baron. A.D. 766, n. 3). [E. S. F.]

GENUFLECTENTES. [PENITENTS.]

GENUFLEXION, PROSTRATION, ETC. The early Christians used five different postures in their worship. They stood upright, or with the head and back bent forward, they knelt on both knees, and they prostrated themselves at length (prostrato omni corpore in terrâ; said of penitents at their reconciliation, Sacram. Gelas. lib. i. nn. xvi. xxxviii. in Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. coll. 504, 550).

Standing had been the more common posture in prayer among the Jews (Neh. ix. 2-4; St. Matt. vi. 5; St. Luke xviii. 11, 13); but they knelt (2 Chron. vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Liturg. Rom. c. 1; Num. xiv. 5; and prostrated themselves also (Num. xiv. 5; Josh. v. 14; 1 Kings xviii. 39, &c.); and the first converts to the gospel imported their former customs into the church. Thus Stephen knelt in his last prayer (Acts vii. 60); St. Peter knelt when he besought God for the life of Dorcas (ix. 40); St. Paul, when at Ephesus he prayed for the elders (xx. 36); the brethren at Tyre and their wives and children knelt with him on the shore, when he left them to go to Jerusalem (xxi. 5). In the language of the same apostle, "bowing the knee" to God is synonymous with "praying" to him (Eph. iii. 14). The Christian knelt in prayer more than the unconverted Jew; and this was natural, for the greater knowledge of God produced a stronger sense of unworthiness, and thus led to more marked and frequent expressions of humility in drawing nigh to him. "The bending of the knees is as a token of penitence and sorrow" (Cassian. Coll. xxi. c. xx. p. 795). This was the recognized principle, and it ruled the occasions on which the posture was employed. "The knee," says St. Ambrose, "is made flexible, by which, beyond other members, the offence of the Lord is mitigated, wrath appeased, grace called forth" (Hexaemeron, lib. vi. c. ix. n. 74).

* To the last-named author the writer is deeply indebted for impressions of several gems and for the loan of his beautiful plates for the present article: they are drawn, like all the others (when not copied from other books), to twice the diameter of the originals.

Before we proceed it should be explained that the early church made no distinction in language between "kneeling" and "prostration." It is evident that men did not kneel upright, but threw themselves more or less forward, so that the posture might have either name. Sometimes indeed they so supported themselves by putting their hands or arms on the ground, that "kneeling" was a position of rest compared with standing. Thus Cassian complains that some western monks, when prostrate on the ground, "often wished that same bowing of the limbs (which he expressly calls genu flectere) to be prolonged, not so much for the sake of prayer as of refreshment" (Instit. lib. ii. c. 7). The same inference may be drawn from the fact that the third class of public penitents were indifferently called kneelers or prostrators, were said either γόνα κλίνειν, genu flectere, or ὑποπίπτειν, se substernere. Thus in a canon made at Neocaesarea in Pontus about A.D. 314, we read, can. v., "Let a catechumen . . . who has fallen into sin, if he be a kneeler (γόνα κλίνων), become a hearer." Similarly the eighty-second canon of the so-called fourth council of Carthage held in 398: "Let penitents (the prostrators were especially so called) kneel even on days of relaxation." But the same class were far more frequently described as prostrators. For example, in the eleventh canon of Nicaea, A.D. 325, it is decreed that certain offenders "shall be prostrators (ὑποπεσούνται) for seven years." (Compare can. xii.; Conc. Ancy. cann. iv. v. &c.; Greg. Thaum. viii. ix.; Basil. ad Amphilo. lvi. lvii. &c.; and many others.) A more direct piece of evidence comes from the 7th century. Pseudo-Dionysius (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. v. sed. iii. § 2, tom. i. p. 364) says that "the approach to the Divine altar and the prostration (of candidates for holy orders) intimates to all who are admitted to priestly functions that they must entirely submit their personal life to God, from whom their consecration comes," &c.; whereupon his scholiast Maximus, A.D. 645, explains "prostration" to mean "kneeling" (p. 375). So in the West, as late as the 9th century, in the same canon, "fixis in terram genibus" and "humiliter in terram prosterni" (Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, can. 37) are employed to describe the same posture. Other indications of similar usage will be observed in some passages below.

Kneeling or prostration was probably the general posture of the early Christians in prayer not regulated by public authority. Thus Clemens Romanus, in a general exhortation, "Let us fall down before the Lord, and beseech Him with tears," &c. (Epist. i. ad Cor. c. 48). When St. Ignatius prayed for the churches before his martyrdom, it was "cum genuflexione omnium fratrum" (Martyrium S. Ign. c. vi.). Hermas represents himself, before his first vision, "kneeling down and beginning to pray to God and confess his sins" (lib. i. vis. i. § 1). Hegesippus, A.D. 170, relates that St. James the Just "used to enter the temple alone, and to be found lying on his knees (κείμενος ἐπὶ τοῖς γόνασι)" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. xxiii.). He adds that his knees from continual kneeling became callous like those of a camel. When Eusebius relates the story of the Melitine legion in the Marcomannic war, about 174, he says of the Christian soldiers, "They put their knees on the ground, as our custom is in prayer" (Ibid. lib. v. c. v.). Tertullian, having referred to the same event some sixteen years after its occurrence, asks, "When have not even droughts been driven away by our kneelings and fastings?" (Ad Scapulam, c. iv.). We read in the Life of St. Cyprian, by Pontius his deacon, that on his way to death he "knelt on the earth, and prostrated himself in prayer to God" (Vita Opp. prefixa). Eusebius tells us that Constantine the Great used "at stated times every day, shutting himself up in secret closets of his palace, there to converse alone with God, and falling on his knees to ask importunately for the things whereof he had need" (Vita Constant. lib. iv. c. xxii.). In his last illness, "kneeling on the ground, he was a suppliant to God," &c. (Ibid. c. lxi.). Gregory Nazianzen, speaking of his sister's habits of devotion, mentions "the bowing of her knees become callous, and as it were grown to the ground" (Orat. viii. § 13. Compare St. Jerome in Epist. ad Marcellam de Asellâ). Augustine, relating a miraculous answer to prayer in the healing of a sick person, says, "While we were fixing our knees and laying ourselves on the ground (terrae incumbentes) in the usual manner, he flung himself forward, as if thrown heavily down by some one pushing him, and began to pray," &c. (De Civ. Dei, lib. xxii. c. viii. § 2). Elsewhere the same father, speaking of private prayer, says, "They who pray do with the members of their body that which befits suppliants, when they fix their knees, stretch forth their hands, or even prostrate themselves on the ground" (De Curâ pro Mortuis, c. v.). Only in this last passage, it will be observed, are kneeling and prostration distinguished from each other.

But the early Christians knelt or prostrated themselves as each chose, in the stated common worship of the church also. Thus Arnobius:—"To Him (i. e. Christ) we all by custom prostrate ourselves: Him with united (collatis) prayers we adore" (Adv. Gent. lib. i. c. 27). Epiphanius: "The church commands us to send up prayers to God without ceasing, with all frequency, and earnest supplications, and kneeling on the appointed days, by night and in the day, and in some places they celebrate synaxes even on the sabbath," &c. (De Fide, § 24). St. Jerome says that it is according to "ecclesiastical custom to bend the knee to Christ" (Comm. in Isai. c. xlv. v. 23). St. Chrysostom (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24), of the celebration of the Holy Communion:—"Again, after we have shut out from the sacred precincts those who cannot partake of the Holy Table, there must be another kind of prayer, and we all in like manner lie on the floor (δμοίως ἐπ' ἐδάφους κείμεθα), and all in like manner rise up." We understand this better on a reference to the liturgy in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions. There we find (lib. viii. c. ix. Cotel. tom. i. p. 396) that the "first prayer of the faithful" was said by all kneeling, the deacon crying out, "Let us, the faithful, all kneel." During the rest of the liturgy all stood.

At other times of service the rule was for all to kneel in prayer, except on Sundays and between Easter and Whitsuntide. Few customs are more frequently mentioned by early writers, and none perhaps more frequently said to be derived from the age of the apostles. The earliest witness is Irenaeus, in a fragment of his work on Easter preserved in the "Questions and Answers to the Orthodox," Quaest. 115, ascribed to Justin Martyr. Irenaeus traced it to the apostles. In answer to a question respecting the reason and origin of the custom, the latter writer says, "Since it behoved us always to remember both our own fall into sins and the grace of our Christ through which we have arisen from the fall, therefore our kneeling on the six days is a sign of our fall into sins, but our not kneeling on the Lord's day is a sign of the rising again, through which, by the grace of Christ, we have been delivered from our sins and from death, their due, now itself put to death." Ibid. Other witnesses are Tertullian, speaking both of Sunday and the paschal season (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.; similarly, De Orat. c. xxiii.); Peter of Alexandria, A.D. 301, can. xv. of Sunday only. The council of Nicaea, 325, both of Sunday and the days of Pentecost, can. xx.; St. Hilary, also of the "Week of Weeks" and the Lord's day both (Prolog. in Psalm. § 12), who refers it to the apostles. His expression is, "No one worships with his body prostrated on the ground." Epiphanius, also of both (De Fide, § 22). St. Basil, of both, as an apostolical tradition (De Spiritu Sancto, c. lxvi., al. xxvii.). St. Jerome, likewise of both (Dial. contr. Luciferianos, c. iv.); and again, of the fifty days, in Proem. in Ep. ad Eph., "We neither bend the knee nor bow ourselves to the ground." St. Augustine, after giving the Scriptural reason, says, "On this account both are fasts relaxed [during the paschal quinquagesima] and we pray standing, which is a sign of the resurrection, whence also the same is observed at the altar on all Lord's days." (Ep. lv. ad Januar. c. xv. n. 28. Compare c. xvii. n. 32.) From St. Maximus of Turin, A.D. 422, we learn the same facts and the reason (Hom. iii. De Pentec.). Cassian, A.D. 424, mentions the restriction on kneeling at those times (Instit. lib. ii. c. xviii.; Collat. xxi. c. xx.). In the collection of canons put forth by Martin, a Pannonian by birth, but bishop of Bracara in Spain, A.D. 560, the same prohibition occurs, borrowed from a Greek or oriental source (can.

lvii.). His words are, "non prostrati, nec humiliati." The 90th canon of the Trullan council, held at Constantinople in 691, forbids kneeling "from the evening entrance of the priests to the altar on Saturday until the next evening on the Lord's day." The council does not mention the longer period, and its object seems to have been merely to settle the hours at which the observance should begin and end.

From the fact that the 20th canon of Nicaea is not found in the abridgement of canons by Ruffinus (Hist. Eccl. lib. x. c. v.), nor in an ancient codex supposed to be the authorised collection of the church of Rome, Quesnel (Diss. xii., at the end of St. Leo's Works, c. v.) supposed that the custom of not kneeling on Sunday, &c. was never received at Rome. See Routh, Opuscula, tom. ii. p. 444, or Reliquiae Sacrae, tom. iv. p. 75, ed. 2. We find, however, that the prohibition was enforced in the dominions of the Frankish princes after they had imposed the Roman office on their subjects. Those times were excepted from the general order for kneeling at prayer made by the third council of Tours, A.D. 813, can. 37. It was forbidden by a capitulary of Louis the Godly, A.D. 817 (Capit. Reg. Franc. tom. ii. col. 586, cap. li.) during "the Pentecost week." Rabanus Maurus, also, at Mentz, A.D. 847, says, as if vouching for a present fact, "On those days the knees are not bent in prayer." "On the Lord's day we pray standing" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. cc. 41-2). It is very improbable, therefore, that the custom was not known and observed at Rome.

In all the ancient liturgies except the Roman, if, indeed, that be an exception (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 579), the bishop gave a blessing before the communion. In all but the Clementine this was preceded by a monition from the deacon: e.g., in St. James and St. Basil, "Let us bow down our heads unto the Lord;" in St. Chrysostom, "Bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Liturg. PP., pp. 32, 66, 102); in St. Mark, "Bow your heads to Jesus Christ" (Renaud. tom. i. p. 160); in the Mozarabic, "Humiliate vos benedictioni" (Missale, Leslie, pp. 6, 246); in a Roman Ordo, early, but of uncertain date, "Humiliate vos ad benedictionem" (Ord. vi. § 11, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 75). Several liturgies had a benediction after the communion also, for which the people bowed themselves. In some, indeed, the deacon here repeated his direction. See St. James (Lit. PP. p. 39); the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil and of St. Cyril (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 85, 125). In Egypt, for this reason, benedictions were usually called "Prayers of Inclination," or "Of Bowing the Head" (Renaud. u. s. pp. 35, 36, 50, 77, &c.). The same gesture, similarly bidden by the deacon, was employed in other parts of the service. See St. James, u. s. p. 9, and Renaud. u. s. pp. 77, 79, 105, &c. In particular, the catechumens bowed while the prayer proper to them was said before their dismissal. Thus the deacon, in St. Basil and in St. Chrysostom: "Ye catechumens, bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Lit. PP., pp. 48, 87). The Malabar: "Incline your heads for the laying on of hands, and receive the blessing" (Hist. Eccl. Malab. Raulin, p. 304).

Two sermons of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, A.D. 602, illustrate our subject, as regards the habits of the people, in a graphic manner:—"I intreat and admonish you, dearest brethren, that as often as prayer is said by the clergy at the altar, or prayer is bidden by the deacon, ye faithfully bow, not your hearts only, but your bodies also; for when I often, as I ought, and heedfully take notice, as the deacon cries, 'Let us bend our knees,' I see the greater part standing like upright columns." "Let it not be grievous to him, who from some weakness cannot bend his knees, either to bow his back or incline his head." Again: "In like manner I admonish you of this, dearest brethren, that as often as the deacon shall proclaim that ye ought to bow yourselves for the benediction, ye faithfully incline both bodies and heads; because the benediction, though given to you through man, is yet not given from man." (Serm. Caes. lxxxv. §§ 1, 5; Sim. lxxxiv. §§ 1, 2.)

The priest himself often inclined his head during the prayers. (See St. James, u. s. pp. 7, 13, 17, &c., and St. Mark, u. s. pp. 150, 153.) Many observances of this kind are lost to us from the want of rubrics in the ancient liturgies, or from their incompleteness. This is especially the case with those of the West; but there is one Ordo of the age of Charlemagne in which the priest is directed to say the prayer In spiritu humilitatis "bowed before the altar." (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. v.) We might here also cite the Mozarabic and Milanese missals, if the antiquity of their rubrics were not generally uncertain.

From pseudo-Dionysius we learn that while bishops and priests at their ordination knelt on both knees, deacons knelt on one only (De Eccl. Hier. c. v. § ii. tom. i. p. 364.) [W. E. S.]

GEOGRAPHY, ECCLESIASTICAL. [NOTITIA.]

GEORGIUS. (1) Chozebita, Holy Father, A.D. 820; commemorated with Aemilianus, Jan. 8 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Of Malaeum, Holy Father, (saec. v. VI.); commemorated April 4 (Ib.).

(3) Bishop of Mitylene († circa 816), Holy Father; commemorated April 7 (Ib.).

(4) Deacon, martyr at Cordova with Aurelius, Felix, Nathalia, and Liliota, A.D. 852; commemorated Aug. 27 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Μεγαλομάρτυρ καὶ τροπαιοφόρος, A.D. 296; commemorated April 23 (Cal. Byzant.); "Natale," April 23 (Mart. Bedae); the dedication (ἐγκαίνια) of his church in Lydia is commemorated on Nov. 3 (Cal. Byzant.).

(6) De monte Atho; commemorated June 27 (Cal. Georg.).

(7) Victoriosus; commemorated Sept. 28 (Cal. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

GERASIMUS, Holy Father, δ ἐν Ἰορδάνῃ, in the time of Constantine Pogonatus; commemorated March 4 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

GEREON, martyr with 318 others at Cologne under Maximian; commemorated Oct. 10 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GERMANICA CONCILIA, councils celebrated in Germany, but at places unknown.

1. A.D. 743, probably, being the first of five said to have met under St. Boniface by his biographer, but great obscurity hangs over their date, number, and canons, to say the least.

Mansi really settles nothing (xii. 355 and seq.), and the Oxford editors of Wilkins still less (iii. 382, note). Again, in the preface to this council it is Carloman, mayor of the palace who speaks, and its seven canons, besides running in his name form the first of his capitularies (Mansi, ib. 366, and App. 104). Certainly, the first of them constituting Boniface archbishop over the bishops of his dominions cannot have been decreed but by him. True, there is a letter from Boniface to pope Zachary requesting leave for holding a synod of this kind, which was at once given (Mansi, ib. 312-19), and in another, purporting to be from Boniface to archbishop Cuthbert (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 376), three sets of canons are quoted as having been decreed by the writer, of which these form the second. Still, even so, when and where were the other two sets passed? What Mansi prints (xii. 383) as "statutes of St. Boniface" in one place, were probably the work of a later hand, as he says in another (ib. 362).

2. A.D. 745, at Mayence possibly, where Aldebert and Clement were pronounced heretics, and Gervilion of Mayence deposed to be succeeded by Boniface (Mansi, ib. 371).

3. A.D. 747, at which the first four general councils were ordered to be received. Possibly the tenth of the letters of pope Zachary may relate to this (Mansi, ib. 409 and 342).

4. A.D. 759, at which Othmar, abbot of St. Gall, was unjustly condemned (Mansi, ib. 660). [E. S. Ff.]

GERMANICUS, martyr at Smyrna under Marcus Antoninus and Lucius Aurelius; commemorated Jan. 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GERMANUS. (1) Bishop of Paris and confessor († 576 A.D.); commemorated May 28 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); translation (deposition, Ado) July 25 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Bishop of Auxerre and confessor; "transitus" commemorated July 31 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi); Aug. 1 (Mart. Bedae); translation (natalis, Ado) Oct. 1 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) [DONATIANUS (2).]

(4) Martyr in Spain with Servandus; commemorated Oct. 23 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(5) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Caesarius, Theophilus, and Vitalis, under Decius; commemorated Nov. 3 (Ib.).

(6) Of Constantinople, A.D. 730; commemorated May 12 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

GERONA, COUNCIL OF (Gerundense concilium), held A.D. 517, at Gerona in Catalonia, and passed ten canons on discipline, to which seven of the ten bishops present at the synod of Tarragona the year before subscribed. By the first the order laid down for celebrating mass and saying the psalter and ministering in general throughout the province of Tarragona is to be that of the metropolitan church. By the last the Lord's prayer is to be said on all days after matins and vespers by the priest. By the second and third rogation days are to be kept with abstinence twice a year; viz., the three last days of Whitsun week, and the first three days in November; or, one of them being a Sunday, the three last days of the week following (Mansi, viii. 547 and seq.). [E. S. Ff.]

GERUNDENSE CONCILIUM. [GERONA, COUNCIL OF.]

GERVASIUS, martyr at Milan with Protasius, his brother, under Nero; commemorated June 19 (Mart. Bedae, Hieron., Cal. Carthag., Cal. et Sacrament. Frontonis, Mart. Adonis, Usuardi); also with Nazarius, and Celsus, June 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet.), and Oct. 14 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

GERVASIUS AND PROTASIIUS, SS., IN ART. The basilica of St. Ambrose in Milan was dedicated by him, June 19th 387, to these martyrs, whose bones he transferred to it. The name of the church has, however, been derived by posterity from that of its founder. The author may refer to the personal testimony of Father Ambrose St. John of the Oratory, as to a late discovery of bones in the Basilica of St. Ambrose, which seems strongly to confirm the tradition of the burial of actually martyred persons among its foundations.^a

St. Gervasius appears repeatedly in the paintings of the Ambrosian basilica, especially in the great mosaic of the apse (Sommerard, Album des Arts, pl. xix. 9 série). St. Protasius is with him, as in other parts of the church. This mosaic cannot be later than the 9th century, and may probably be of the same date as that in the great church of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna, 7th century. (See Ciampini Vet. Monumenta, tom. ii. pl. xxv. No. 11, and p. 95 in text.) Two portrait medallions of these saints are to be seen in the church of St. Vitale in the same city. [R. St. J. T.]

GETULIUS, martyr at Rome with Aman-tius, Cerealis, and Primitivus, in the time of Adrian (circa 124 A.D.); "passio," June 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GIDEON or GEDEON, the prophet; commemorated with Joshua, Sept. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GIFTS. [ARRHAE; ELEMENTS, p. 600.]

GILBERTUS, "in territorio Parisiacensi, vico Christoilo;" commemorated with Agodus, and innumerable others of both sexes, June 24 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GILDARDUS, bishop of Rouen († post 598); "natalis" June 8 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

GILDING. A frequent mode of decorating the interiors of churches was by gilding. The earliest reference we have to it is in the letter of the emperor Constantine to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, relating to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, which he was about to have built, consulting him, among other points, as to the character of the ceiling he wished to have constructed. The emperor evidently inclined to ceiling divided into panels (λακωνάρια, laqueata), inasmuch as it could be decorated with gold (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. c. 32). This plan was carried out on the most magnificent scale, and, "by means of compartments, stretched its vast expanse over the whole basilica, covered throughout with resplendent gold, so as to make the whole temple dazzling as with a blaze of light" (Ib. c. 36). The beams of the roof of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were originally, A.D. 386, covered with gold-leaf.

(Petrus, l'Assio Beat. Apost.)

The church built by St. Paulinus at Nola had also a panelled ceiling, "alto et lacunato culmine" (Paulin. Epist. xxxii. 12), but gilding is not expressly mentioned. References to these ceilings of gilded panelling are frequent in Jerome, who speaks of "the laquearia and roofs gleaming with gold," "the gilded ceilings," and the like, with some expression of regret that so much that might have been devoted to Christ's poor was lavished on architectural decoration (Hieron. lib. ii. in Zach. viii.; Epist. ii. ad Nepot.; Epist. viii. ad Demetriad.). From the last-quoted passage we learn that the capitals of the pillars were also gilt, and that the altars were ornamented with gold and jewels. In the more magnificent churches erected in Justinian's reign, the altars were often of silver plated with gold. The altar given by Pulcheria, A.D. 414, to the church at Constantinople was elaborately constructed of gold and precious stones (Soz. H. E. ix. 1). This was surpassed by the altar given by Justinian to St. Sophia, which was all of gold resplendent with gems (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. p. 47). The altar at St. Ambrogio, at Milan, made A.D. 835, is covered with plates of gold and silver, with subjects in high relief [ALTAR, p. 64]. The domes which crowned the early churches in the East were often gilt externally. (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. VIII. viii. 5; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 182.) [E. V.]

GIRDLE (ζώνη; baleus, cingulum, zona). Among nations who wore long flowing robes, it is obvious that the use of the girdle would be necessary for convenience in walking, or in active work. This very way, however, of using the girdle would cause it to be more or less hidden by the dress: and thus we are à priori prepared for the fact that, while in the early Christian centuries we continually meet with the girdle used as a matter of practical convenience, it is not till the eighth century that we find it recognized as an ecclesiastical vestment strictly so called. The use of it in these earlier times seems not unfrequently to have carried with it the idea of an imitation of the ancient Jewish prophets, and thus to have been worn by those who followed a monastic life, and those who professed, in reality or in seeming, to imitate their austerities. We find, for example, pope Celestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.) finding fault with those who, by affecting this style of dress ("amicti pallio et lumbos praecincti"), seemed to claim for themselves a sanctity of life not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vienn. et Narb. c. 2; Patrol. I. 431). Salvianus (ob.

^a See note, p. 433, J. H. Newman's Historical Sketches, Pickering, 1872. A letter of the greatest interest, which seems to leave little room for doubt as to the authenticity of the bodies of St. Ambrose and the two martyrs.

circa 495 A.D.) refers to the same idea, in the words addressed to an unworthy monk, "licet fidem cingulo afferas" (Adv. avaritiam iv. 5; Patrol. liii. 232). See also Basil (Epist. 45 ad monachum lapsum; Patrol. Gr. xxxii. 366). To take an instance of a different type, Fulgentius (ob. 533 A.D.) on his elevation to the see of Ruspe, is said in his biography (formerly attributed to Ferrandus Diaconus) to have retained the girdle with the rest of the monastic habit—"pelliceo cingulo tanquam monachus utebatur" (c. 37; Patrol. lxxv. 136). The Rule of St. Benedict forbade the laying aside of the monastic girdle even at night; for the monks were to sleep "vestiti . . . et cincti cingulis aut funibus" (Regula S. Benedicti, c. 22; see also Regula S. Donati, c. 65).

It may further be remarked that the girdle was commonly worn as an ornament by sovereigns and nobles. Thus, in a homily once assigned to Chrysostom, but now generally believed to be a work of the sixth century, the girdle is spoken of as an ordinary ornament of kings, and with this royal use of it is compared the girdle of our Lord (Hom. de Uno Legislatore, c. 3; vol. vi. 409, ed. Montfaucon). It will readily be seen how important a bearing the above facts have on the main general question, to which we can only refer thus in passing, as to whether the dress of the early Christian ministry was derived from that of the Levitical priesthood. In this last, it will be remembered, the girdle was a very important element.

It has been said that it was not till the 8th century that we meet with the girdle as an ecclesiastical vestment in the strict sense of the word. It is true that we do meet with references to it at an earlier period, as to that worn by Gregory the Great, which later generations are said by his biographer to have regarded as a precious relic (Joannis Diaconi Vita S. Greg. Magni, iv. 80; Patrol. lxxv. 228). Still, it must be remembered, the use of an article of dress by ecclesiastics is a totally different thing from their use of it because they are ecclesiastics; and for instances of this latter we must pass on to a later period.

Perhaps the earliest reference of this kind is one by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740 A.D.), in his description of the various priestly vestments (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Contemplatio; Patrol. Gr. xcviii. 394), in which he also alludes to the napkin attached to the girdle worn by deacons (τὸ ἐγγεῖριον τὸ ἐπὶ τῆς ζώνης). Rabanus Maurus, in his treatise de Institutione Clericorum (i. 17; Patrol. cvii. 306), a work probably written about the year 819 A.D., refers to the girdle as one of the regular Christian vestments, and dwells on the symbolism of it at some length. A curious injunction, for which a curious reason is given, as to the wearing of the girdle, is found in one of the so-called Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea, edited by Abraham Ecchelenensis (can. 66; Labbe ii. 335). According to this, the clergy are forbidden to wear a girdle during divine service.

In earlier times the girdle was often doubtlessly richly adorned: the reference we have already given to its regal use is illustrative of this, and we may further cite Chrysostom (Hom. in 1^{am} Isai. 48; vol. v. 521), where, inveighing against various articles of luxury in dress, he speaks of golden girdles. Apparently, too, this state of things prevailed after the girdle became a recognized ecclesiastical vestment, the excessive ornamentation being, it would seem, viewed as a secular element in the ecclesiastical dress. Thus we find Durandus (ob. 1296 A.D.) speaking of the clergy in the time of the emperor Louis I., the son of Charlemagne, as laying aside "Cingula auro texta, exquisitas vestes, et alia secularia ornamenta" (Rationale Div. Off. iii. 1). A further illustration of this is furnished by the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in which he bequeaths, among other precious articles, "zonas quinque, una cum auro et gemmis pretiosis, et alias quattuor cum auro" (Patrol. cxxxii. 468).

Later liturgical writers [e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animae, i. 206; Patrol. clxxii. 606), Innocent iii. (de Sacro Altaris mysterio, i. 52; Patrol. ccxvii. 793), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. iii. 4)] speak further of an under girdle (subcingulum, subcinctorium, succinctorium), and generally as a vestment peculiar to bishops. So in the ancient mass given by Menard (Greg. Sacr. col. 249) from the Cd. Ratoldi, the bishop puts on both a cingulum and a balteus, the former perhaps the unseen and simple primitive girdle, the latter the elaborate ornament of later times. This subject, however, falls beyond our limits; reference may be made to Bona de Rebus Liturg. i. 24. 15.

A brief remark may be made in passing as to the special significance of the girdle in reference to the bestowal or deprivation of office. Thus Gregory the Great congratulates a friend "præfecturae vos suscepisse cingula" (Epist. x. 37; Patrol. lxxvii. 1094). Atto, bishop of Vercellae (ob. circa 960 A.D.), writing to one bishop Azo, orders that a man who should contract a marriage within the prohibited degrees "cinguli sui patiaturs amissionem" (Epist. 5; Patrol. cxxiv. 107). Similar references are often found in the Theodosian code, and elsewhere (see e.g. Cod. Theodos. lib. viii. tit. i. l. 11; lib. x. tit. 26, l. 1), in a way that often suggests the belt of knighthood of later times.

For further references to the subject of the girdle in its different aspects, see Ducange's Glossarium s. vv.; Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, p. 213, etc.; Hefele, Die liturgischen Gewänder, pp. 178 sqq.; Bock, Geschichte der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, ii. pp. 50 sqq. [R. S.]

GLADIATORS. A passion for gladiatorial combats had a strong hold upon the popular mind of pagan Rome; and under the empire magnificent amphitheatres were built for such exhibitions, and others of an almost equally barbarous nature, which seem to have presented a peculiarly fascinating attraction both to men and women in those times.

Augustine mentions a case in which even a Christian, having been induced to be present at one of these exhibitions, and having kept his eyes closed for a time—on opening them, at a sudden outcry which he heard, instead of being shocked or disgusted at the sight, was hurried along with the spirit of the assembled people—was overcome with a wild and savage delight at beholding the scene of bloodshed and death, and carried away with him an inextinguishable desire to witness the same spectacles again (August. Conf. vi. 8).

Some pagan moralists expressed more or less strongly their disapprobation of the gladiatorial shows, as being inhuman and demoralizing (Seneca, Ep. vii. and Pliny, Ep. iv. 22); but they were too popular to be checked by such remonstrances; and nothing effectual was done to stop them until they were opposed and finally suppressed by the intervention of Christian principles and Christian heroism.

The church expressed its abhorrence of these barbarous games as soon as it came in contact with them, not only by discountenancing attendance at them, but by refusing to admit gladiators to Christian baptism (see Constit. Apostol. viii. 32). In this canon, charioteers, racers, and many others, are included in the same condemnation; probably because the public exhibitions in which they took a part were more or less connected with idolatry. And for the same reason such persons, if they had already been received into the church, were to be punished by excommunication (Concil. Arelat. i. 4).

The first imperial edict prohibiting the exhibition of gladiators was issued by Constantine in A.D. 325, just after the council of Nice had been convened (Cod. Theod. xv. 12, 1). Forty years later Valentinian forbade that any Christian criminals should be condemned to fight as gladiators; and in A.D. 367 he included in a similar exemption those who had been in the imperial service about the court (Palatini) (Cod. Theod. ix. 40, 8 and 11).

Honorius, at the end of this century, ordered that no slave, who had been a gladiator, should be taken into the service of a senator (Cod. Theod. xv. 12, 3).

All these edicts resulted from the operation of Christian principles and feelings, and they show the rise and growth of a more civilized opinion, which these imperial utterances also helped to promote; but they produced little or no direct effect in putting a stop to such exhibitions.

The decree of Constantine seems to have applied only to the province of Phœnicia—to the prefect of which it was addressed; or, at any rate, it very soon became a dead letter; for a few years later Libanius alludes to gladiatorial shows as still regularly exhibited in Syria (Libanius, de vita sua, 3). And although they were never seen in Constantinople—where a passion for chariot races seems to have supplied their place—yet at Rome and in the Western empire they continued unrestricted, except by some trifling regulations. Even Theodosius the Great, though in some things very submissive to church authorities, compelled his Sarmatian prisoners to fight as gladiators; for which he was applauded by Symmachus, as having imitated approved examples of older times, and having made those minister to the pleasure of the people, who had previously been their dread (Symmachus, Ep. x. 61).

Thus these sanguinary games held their place among the popular amusements, and afforded their savage gratification to the multitude until their suppression was at last effected by the courage and self-devotion of an individual Christian.

In the year 404, while a show of gladiators was being exhibited at Rome in honour of the victories of Stilicho, an Asiatic monk named Telemachus, who had come to Rome for the purpose of endeavouring to stop this barbarous practice, rushed into the amphitheatre, and strove to separate the combatants. The spectators—enraged at his attempt to deprive them of their favourite amusement—stoned him to death. But a deep impression was produced. Telemachus was justly honoured as a martyr, and the emperor Honorius—taking advantage of the feeling which had been evoked—effectually put a stop to gladiatorial combats, which were never exhibited again (Theodoret, H. E. v. 26).

GLASS. (i.) Window glass.—The use of glass in windows in Roman times was much more common than was formerly supposed, and examples of such glass have been met with not only in Pompeii, but in our own country in various places. It was also used by Christians in early times, though perhaps not very commonly, for the windows of their churches, and then it was sometimes coloured. Thus Prudentius, speaking of the Basilica of St. Paul, built by Constantine, says: "In the arched window ran (panes of) wonderfully variegated glass: it shone like a meadow decked with spring flowers." ^a Glass, probably of the church destroyed A.D. 420, has been lately found at Trèves (Archæol. xl. 194). Venantius Fortunatus (circa 560) thus speaks (lib. ii. poem. 11) of the windows of the church in Paris:

Artificisque manu clausit in arce diem."

From Gaul artists in glass were first introduced into Britain (A.D. 676) by Benedict Biscop for the church windows at Weremouth in Durham, "ad cancellandas ecclesie porticumque et coenaculorum ejus fenestras" (Bed. Vit. S. Benedict. § 5). Other early examples may be seen in Ducange, s. v. Vitreæ, and Benthams' Hist. and Antiq. of Ely, p. 21 (ed. 2). Pope Leo III. (circa 795) adorned the windows of the apse of the basilica of the Lateran with glass of several colours, "ex vitro diversis coloribus" (Anastasius Vitæ Pontiff. p. 208, C. ed. Murat.); and this, as some think, "is the earliest instance of the kind that can be cited with confidence" (Winston, Anc. Glass Paint., p. 2; Fleury, H. E. xlv. 20).

Painted glass belongs apparently to an age a little later than the present work embraces. "It is a fact," says M. Labarte, "acknowledged by all archaeologists, that we do not now know any painted glass to which can be assigned with certainty an earlier date than that of the 11th century" ^b (Handbook, p. 69). The invention itself, however, may perhaps have been somewhat earlier. ^c

Peristeph. xii. 53, 54.

The above interpretation, which is substantially that of Emeric David and Labarte, seems much preferable to that which makes hyalo mean mosaics (Labarte, Handbook of Arts of Middle Ages, c. ii. p. 66, Engl. trans.).

^b Two examples only, belonging to this century, are figured by M. Lesteyrie in his great work, Histoire de la Peinture sur Verre.

^c The art is described with many details by the monk Theophilus, whose age is unfortunately uncertain. Lessing, (ii.) Glass vessels.—These were used by the Christians as well as by the heathen for interment with the dead, and the so-called lacrymatories, which are really unguent bottles, have been found in the catacombs of Rome (Seroux d'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art par ses Monum. t. viii. f. 21, "Sculpture"), and elsewhere, as Todi, Villeja, and Sardinia: the vessels are of various kinds, and are sometimes ornamented with letters and sometimes with palm-branches (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 89). Perret figures a long drinking-glass, copied here, ornamented with palms (incised), from the catacombs; at the bottom is some red substance: see below. The Slade Collection, recently acquired by the British Museum, contains a vessel of the same general form, of white glass, found at Cologne, probably of the 4th or 5th century, with incised figures of Adam and Eve, and of Moses striking the rock.

Glass incised Cup. (Perret.)

The Sloane Collection in the same museum has a plain glass beaker from the catacombs embedded in the original plaster: likewise a glass ampulla marked with a cross and a on each side, also from the catacombs. At the bottom of some of these small vessels has been found a dark crust, and it has been made a question whether this is the sediment of the blood of the martyr buried there or of some other substance. There are even some vessels inscribed SANGVIS, or SANG, or SA (Airinghi, Rom. Subt. t. i. p. 499); but De Rossi, Garrucci, and Martigny (Dict. p. 592 q. r.) are agreed that they are forgeries. These, however, do not necessarily prove that the substance found in genuine glass vessels is never in any case blood; and according to Martigny, the chemical researches of Broglia in 1845, supposed that he wrote in the 9th century; if this were so, the invention may have been before 800; but it is now generally admitted that his age must be later: Labarte thinks that he probably lived in the 12th century. His Diversarum artium Schedula does not speak of the art of glass as being a new invention. See Labarte u. s. pp. 48-51.

and others, have shewn that at the bottom of glass vessels found in Christian tombs at Milan blood is still to be recognised. Without impugning the honesty or the correctness of these researches, although as regards the latter it would be satisfactory if some confirmatory evidence should be discovered, it is allowable to suppose that the usual unguents (or perhaps wine) may have been contained in other of these vessels. The early Christians also employed glass as one of the materials for chalices.^d See CHALICE. Their most remarkable glass vessels, however, are those which have figures in gold leaf inside their flat bases; and these have hitherto been found almost exclusively in the Roman catacombs, and are generally considered to have been made in Rome alone. Of these some (about thirty) are in the British Museum, a smaller number in Paris, a few others in various Italian museums and in private continental and English collections, more particularly that of Mr. Wilshire; from which last the South Kensington Loan Court, and the Leeds Art Exhibition in 1868, having been largely enriched, these curious relics have become tolerably familiar to many of our countrymen. It is, however, in the Kircherian Museum and in that of the Propaganda, and above all, in the Vatican at Rome, that the greatest number are preserved. From these various sources, and from the works of Airinghi, Buonarrotti, Boldetti, &c., Padre Garrucci drew up his great work on the subject, entitled Vetri ornati di figure in oro, fol. with 42 plates, comprising figures of about 320 specimens,^e many, however, being quite fragmentary and of little value. The first edition appeared in Rome in 1858, the second (much enlarged) in 1864. As nearly all that is known of them is contained in this one work, which has been also used in illustration of various articles in this Dictionary, a somewhat slight notice may suffice for this place. The greater part of these glasses are manifestly the bottoms of drinking cups (the inscriptions on many of them implying as much), some few have been plates. "Their peculiarity," say Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, "consists in a design having been executed in gold leaf on the flat bottom of the cup, in such a manner as that the figures and letters should be seen from the inside. . . . The gold leaf was protected by a plate of glass which was welded by fire, so as to form one solid mass with the cup. These cups, like the other articles found in the catacombs, were stuck into the still soft cement of the newly closed grave; and the double glass bottom imbedded in the plaster has resisted the action of time, while the thinner portion of the cup, exposed to accident and decay by standing out from the plaster, has in almost every instance perished. Boldetti informs us that he found two or three cups entire, and his representation of one of them is given in Padre Garrucci's work, t. xxxix. 7^a, 7^b" (Roma Sotterranea, p. 276).

^d The far-famed Sacro Catino of Genoa, taken by the Crusaders at Caesarea in 1101, made of glass (not, as formerly supposed, of a single emerald) has been fabled to be the dish used at the Saviour's Last Supper; but although it is undoubtedly very ancient, its history is quite unknown. Some account of it is given in Murray's Hand-book of Northern Italy, under "Genoa."

^e About twenty others are described only; the genuineness of some of them is suspected.

The cup, whose figure is referred to, is a species of cylix, with two small handles (their bases being recurved) at the sides, without a stem: upon its flat bottom are two three-quarter-length figures in a medallion, inscribed PETRVS, PAVLVS, the two apostles who, above all persons, are by far the most frequently represented in the glass of the catacombs. Garrucci figures a fragment of another vessel with channelled ribs, which must have been nearly of the shape of our tumblers (t. xxxviii. f. 9, b). He thinks that others must have been in the form of a half-egg (Pref. p. vii.). Many of the medallions found in the catacombs are of very small size, little more than an inch in diameter; these were long supposed to be centres of the bottoms of small drinking-cups, but the discovery in 1864 and 1865 of two flat gilded glass plates at Cologne (both broken) has revealed their real character.

On one of these plates, found near the church of St. Severinus,^f about 10 inches in diameter, made of clear glass, were "inserted, while in a state of fusion, a number of small medallions of green glass exactly similar to those found in Rome, and which together form a series of scriptural subjects.^g These medallions being of double glass

^f "The patena found near the church of St. Ursula differs from the other discovered two years before, in having the subjects depicted in gold and colours on the surface of the glass instead of being within medallions of double glass. The drawing is also of a better style of art. It is now in the Slade Collection" (Brownlow and Northcote, u.s. pp. 277, 294; figured in Catalogue of Slade Collection, p. 50). The subjects represented on this glass are Moses at the Red Sea, Jonah, Daniel in the lions' den, the three children in the fiery furnace, the sacrifice of Isaac, the Nativity, and the healing of the man sick of the palsy.

^g A figure of the two fragments of this plate is given by Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, u.s. p. 290. They have resisted the ravages of time and accidents, which have destroyed the more thin and fragile glass of the patena. De Rossi has seen in the plaster of loculi in the catacombs the impression of large plates of this description, which have probably perished in the attempt to detach them from the cement" (Brownlow and Northcote, u.s. p. 291).

The cups, whose bottoms (or parts of them) now remain, were of various dimensions; the largest hitherto found have medallions of about five inches in diameter, others are about half that size: around the painted part there was a margin of plain glass. Sometimes, but very rarely as it would seem, the side of the cup as well as the bottom was ornamented with figures in gold leaf. Garrucci figures one fragment of such a side which is preserved in the Kircherian Museum^h (t. xxxix. f. 9). The figures on the gold leaf were rendered more distinct by edging the outlines and other parts with dark lines; and other colours as green, white, and red of various tints were sparingly introduced: also on the outside of the glass bottoms various colours are found, especially azure, also green, violet, indigo, and crimson (Garrucci, Pref. p. vii.).ⁱ

The subjects represented on these glasses may now be considered. A few of them are taken from the classical mythology or represent secular subjects, whether games or trades, and these may probably not have been the works of Christian artists at all.^k It is indeed an unexplained contain twenty medallions. Eight of these have only a star in the centre. Three others appear to have the three children in the Babylonian furnace, one figure in each medallion. Four others have the history of Jonah in as many parts;—in the ship; under the gourd; swallowed by the whale; and vomited out by the same. Another gives Adam and Eve, the serpent round the tree being between them. The interpretation of the others is less certain. One has a figure holding a rod, which is supposed to be the Saviour; probably another medallion contained Lazarus. It is in the possession of Mr. Pepys of Cologne. See De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, pp. 89-91, and a beautiful figure in gold and colour.

ⁱ The figures in Garrucci's work are uncoloured, at least no coloured copy has been seen by the writer. In Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote's work, so often laid under contribution, are two beautiful plates (xvii. and xviii.) shewing the pale bluish colour of the glass and the pencilling of the gold leaf with deep green. Martigny gives examples of the use of colour in the following specimens, figured by Perret, vol. iv. Purple in bands on the drapery (pl. xxxiii. 114): green in the sea-waves (xxix. 76): flesh-colour in the face of the Saviour (xxxiii. 102). Silver is occasionally used for white garments and the bandages of a corpse (Lazarus). In other cases we have gold or silver figures on an azure ground (Dict. p. 279).

^k Garrucci and Wiseman consider this art to have been exercised by the Christians alone; but this is both primâ facie improbable and does not very well accord with the existence of pagan types on some specimens "such as no Christian artist of the early ages would ever have thought of depicting," being wholly incapable of any Christian adaptation. See Brownlow and Northcote, u.s. p. 278. It must be confessed, however, that Garrucci (pref. p. xiv.) is able to refer to a silver casket bearing Christian emblems and also a triton and a mermaid; as well as to Sidonius difficulty how such glasses as represent Hercules, Minerva, Serapis, and the like should have been found in Christian catacombs at all; if indeed it be certain that they were found there.¹ It is beside the present purpose to say more of these.^m The greater part of the designs, however, are connected with the Jewish or Christian religion; and, as has been already seen in part, subjects from the Old and New Testaments are sometimes grouped together on the same glass. A description of two perfect bottoms of cups, forming in each case a circular medallion, will show the mode of treatment.

(1) A bust draped in the centre, enclosed in a circle with legend ZESES (Live! i.e. enjoy life!). Around, without distinction into compartments, but with leaves and pellets interspersed, are: Jesus turning the water into wine; Tobit and the fish; Jesus ordering the man sick of the palsy to carry his bed; Jesus present with the Three Children in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace (Garrucci, t. i. f. 1).

(2) Two busts (a man and his wife?) draped in the centre, enclosed in a circle as before, with legend PIE ZESES (Drink! live!). Around, in the same style as before, are the following sub-Apollinaris and Ennodius for examples of the same kind of thing: yet without dwelling on the fact that the monument no less than the authors very possibly belongs to a period when paganism had no longer any vigorous life (Visconti, Opere Varie, t. 1, p. 212, thinks it is of the fourth or fifth century, the latter, to judge from the monument itself, which now reposes in the British Museum, seems at least as probable as the former), and might therefore, as now, afford subjects for Christian artists, yet the paganism on these glasses is more seriously pronounced: e.g. t. xxxv. 1, "In nomine Herculis Acherontini (wrongly written Acherontino)... felices bibatis." See also t. xxxv. 8.

jects: Christ foretelling redemption to Adam and Eve; the sacrifice of Isaac; Moses striking the rock; Jesus telling the sick man to carry his bed; Jesus raising Lazarus (id. t. i. f. 3).

More usually, however, a single subject occupies the bottom of the glass. Thus we have on one (t. vi. f. 1) Christ as the Good Shepherd bearing a lamb on his shoulders, with a sheep and tree on each side, all enclosed in a circle; and the Greek legend enclosed in another circle outside, POTΦE ΠΙΕ ΖΗΘΑΙC META TΩN CΩN ΠΑΝΤΩN ΒΟΙΤ (for ΒΙΟΤ?), i.e. Drink, Rufus, may you enjoy life with all yours! long life to you! On another glass (t. vi. f. 9) occurs the same subject treated a little differently, with the nearly equivalent Latin legend: DIGNITAS AMICORVM VIVAS CVM TVIS FELICITER, i.e. Here's to our worthy friends! may you live happily with all yours! Dignitas amicorum, a frequently recurring acclamation on these glasses, is thought to be equivalent to digni amici, the form in which a Roman host drank his friends' health. On another (t. vi. f. 7), bearing the same subject enclosed in a square, we have the legend: BIBAS (doubtless for vivas) IN PACE DEI CONCORDI, a double border of dentels being enclosed in another outside square. On another, Christ is represented at full length in the midst of seven water pots (for the six of the Gospel are invariably changed into seven, probably from a symbolical feeling, and with a secret reference to the eucharist), surrounded by the legend DIGNITAS AMICORUM VIVAS IM (sic) PACE DEI ZESES: where vivas may either be taken for bibas, or (which seems better) zeses may be regarded as a superfluous repetition of vivas (t. vii. f. 2).

The Good Shepherd. (Garrucci.)

It will now probably be thought sufficient to indicate briefly the subjects from the Old Testament including the Apocrypha and from the New, which can be recognised with certainty or probability upon these glasses, excluding those on the Cologne fragments. They are all contained in the first eight plates of Garrucci's work, but are here set down nearly in their Biblical order. Adam and Eve; Noah in the Ark; Sacrifice of Isaac; Joseph in the pit (?); Moses striking the rock; Moses lifting up the brazen serpent (?); the candlestick and other instruments of Mosaic worship; the Spies bearing the grapes of Canaan; Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still (?); Jonah's history (in several parts); the Three Children in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace; Daniel and the lions; Daniel destroying the Dragon; Susannah and the Elders (?); Tobit and the Fish.

The Wise Men offering gifts (?); Christ turning water into wine; Christ healing the sick of the palsy; Christ multiplying the seven loaves; Christ raising Lazarus; Christ as the Good Shepherd.

The chrisma or monogram of Christ is also of frequent occurrence, sometimes in connection with Saints, sometimes interposed between a husband and wife, sometimes between α and ω (tavv. i. vii. xi. xiv. xvii. xx. xxv. xxvi. xxix. xxxix.).

The only representation of the Crucifixion (t. xl. 1) is considered to be false.

"The Blessed Virgin is represented sometimes alone, with her name (MARIA) over her head, praying between two olive-trees, sometimes with the apostles Peter and Paul on either side of her; sometimes accompanied by the virgin martyr St. Agnes" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 280). The apostles most frequently represented (on more than seventy glasses) are St. Peter and St. Paul, their names being added; sometimes singly, more often conjointly. "The two apostles are represented side by side, sometimes standing, sometimes seated. In some instances Christ is represented in the air . . . holding over the head of each a crown of victory; or in other instances a single crown is suspended between the two, as if to show that in their death they were not divided. This crown becomes sometimes a circle surrounding the labarum or chrisma, which is often supported on a pillar, thus symbolising 'the pillar and ground of the truth'" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 285).^a We have also single examples of the names of John, Thomas, Philip, and Jude, most probably the apostles; and two or three other names which occur in the New Testament, are also found: Lucas, Silvanus, Timotheus, Stephen (written Istephanus); these are probably the same persons whose names are mentioned in the New Testament. (For the glasses on which these names occur, see Garrucci's Index, p. 109.)

There are, besides the persons mentioned in Scripture, a good many others which are of note in ecclesiastical history. St. Agnes occurs more than a dozen times, St. Laurence seven times, and St. Hippolytus four times; the following among others occur less frequently, St. Callistus, St. Cyprian, and St. Marcellinus, the last of whom was martyred under Diocletian, A.D. 304 (see Garrucci's Index, as above). Besides these, many other proper names, probably of the possessors, occur either along with their miniatures or without them (see Garrucci's Index, as before). There is nothing which deserves to be called a real portrait in any of these representations, which are mostly, perhaps all, executed in the debased style of the 4th century; and as the saints have no emblems attached their figures have but little interest. We have also on these glasses scenes of domestic Christian life—married life, and family life. The occurrence of the chrisma makes their Christian character certain: where this or the name of Christ or God does not occur, it is rash to say anything definite (Garrucci, tavv. xxvi.—xxxix.).

A few more words may suffice for the inscriptions. The acclamations, of which several specimens have been given, are mostly of a convivial character, and either in Greek (rarely), or in Latin (most usually), or in a mixture of the two (not unfrequently):^o none of them at all favour the supposition that they were used as chalices. Other acclamations, as VIVATIS IN DEO; and MARTVRA EPECETE VIVATIS, express good wishes to the married couple (id. t. xxvi. 11, 12). On a very few of the glasses we have, as it appears, invocations of saints or legends which acknowledge their patronage. Thus a broken fragment has PETRVS PROTEG.; whether any letters followed, it is impossible to say: the word may either be protegit or protegat or even protege (id. t. x. f. 1). Another fine but meagre fragment exhibits the Saviour (apparently) with the chrisma and the α and ω , bearing a Latin cross with legend, . . . ANE (Salviane, or some other proper name) VIVAS IN CR[ISTO ET] LAVRENTIO (id. t. xx. f. 1). Another (u. s. f. 2), which is also broken, but slightly, has VITO (or perhaps VICTOR) [VIV]AS IN NOMINE LAVRETI (for Laurenti). The inscription PETRVS, written in two instances against Moses striking the rock (id. t. x.

Nov. 1864), thinks it is of the second or third century. Notwithstanding these high but somewhat discordant authorities, the writer ventures to express his own strong suspicion that the style of the medal bespeaks the age of the Renaissance: it is most probably of the 15th century or thereabouts.

^o We give here two or three of this mixed character: CVM TVS FELICITE ZESES (Garr. t. xl. 1); DIGNITAS AMICORVM PACE ZESES CVM TVS OMNIVS BIBE ET PROPINA (t. xii. 2). (Both the above glasses have figures of Peter and Paul, with their names added.) On the same plate are other examples of bilingual redundancy: such as—VIVAS PACE ZESES, VIVAS CVM TVS ZESES.

f. 9; Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. pl. xvii. 2, and p. 287), is also of some theological importance as indicating that Peter was then looked upon as the Moses of the new Israel of God, as Prudentius speaks. The honour, however, appears to be divided between Peter and Paul on another glass, unfortunately mutilated. Christ stands on a hill between Peter and Paul. Above is the common legend PIE Z[ES]ES: below are the words IERVSALE . IORDANES . BECLE (for Bethlehem, C = Θ?). Peter is here the apostle of the Jews, Paul of the Gentiles, who first worshipped the Saviour at Bethlehem. Below are sheep adoring the Lamb on a hill between them, symbolising both churches (Garrucci, t. x. f. 8.)

The orthography of the legends is sometimes barbarous.^p Thus Jesus is written ZESVS (viii. 5); ZESVS (vii. 17), &c. CHRISTVS is spelt CRISTVS (viii. 5, xii. 1, &c.); TIMOTHEVS becomes TIMOTEVVS (xvii. 2); HIPPOLYTVS, EPOLITVS (xix. 7), or IPOLLTUS (xxv. 5); CYPRIANVS, CRIPRANVS (xx. 6); SVCINVS, TZVCINVS (xxviii. 6); SEVERE, SEBERE (xxix. 5); PHILIPPVS, FILPVVS (xxv. 6). We have also BIBAS for VIVAS (vi. 7); VIBATIS for VIVATIS (xxix. 4); IM PACE for IN PACE (vii. 2, xv. 3); PIE for PIIE

The Adoration of the Saviour. (Garrucci.)

(i. 3, &c.); PIEZ for Πις (xxvi. 10). There are a few other instances of similar orthographic changes, to say nothing of such blunders as DIGNITAS for DIGNITAS, and CRISTVS for CRISTVS (Christus) (Garr. p. 53).

The dates of these works are defined to some extent by their subjects. On one of them (xxxiii. 5) a heap of money is depicted, among which we recognise the coins of Caracalla and one of the Faustinas. On another, as has been said, occurs the name of Marcellinus, probably the bishop of Rome, martyred A.D. 304.^q The martyrdom of St. Agnes, who is so often represented, probably took place about the same time. The appearance of the dress, arrangement of the hair, and of the general art and orthography induces Garrucci (Prof. p. ix.) to consider them all anterior to Theodosius (A.D. 380). De Rossi attempts a more precise limitation, and thinks that they range from the middle of the 3rd to the beginning of the 4th century (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 279). We shall probably be not far wrong in saying that few or none of them are much earlier or later than the 4th century.^r The art of the coins of that century, as well as of the MS. illuminations which are assigned to about the same age, strongly remind us of these glasses, more especially of those on which the chrisma is depicted.^s The execution of some glasses is indeed better than that of others, and occasionally reaches considerable excellence; but to speak generally, they belong to a period in which taste and vigour and correctness of drawing have sensibly declined. They possess, however, apart from their main subjects, much interest as showing the styles of borders and other ornamentations then prevalent, besides giving costume and a variety of domestic objects.^t

^p Garrucci lays stress on this orthography for fixing the date: "questa maniera di scrittura così costante rinviava al secolo quarto" (prof. p. ix.). He appears to consider that these glasses all belong to that century.

^q The martyrdoms of Vincentius and of Genesius, whose names similarly occur, also took place under Diocletian (Garrucci, prof. pp. viii. ix.).

With regard to the uses of these glasses a consideration of the types, coupled with the inscriptions, will lead us to secure conclusions. Even if it were well established "that in Tertullian's

^r Mr. Marriott (Testim. of the Catacombs, p. 16), after observing that "these glasses, with few exceptions, belong to a period of very degraded art," considers that "there are very strong reasons of a technical kind, in reference to the use of the nimbus, for assigning many of them to the 5th, if not to the 6th century." But if these glasses were found in the catacombs, it is hardly possible to place any of them later than the first quarter of the 5th century: after the year 410 no inscriptions occur in the catacombs, and they have become rarer and rarer from the beginning of the last quarter of the 4th century. See INSCRIPTIONS. It is true that "Popes Symmachus Vigilius and John III. did their best to repair the damage which had been done in the catacombs by the Lombards and others" in restoring the inscriptions of Pope Damasus, but they would scarcely have replaced the glass vessels which had been stuck into the cement which closed the graves. See Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 170.

^s The chrisma with the α and ω (xxxix. 1) is identical in treatment with the same types upon the coins of Constantius II., Magnentius, and Decentius. And this monogram, whenever it occurs, with scarcely an exception (see, however, xvii. 7, where the general style and art differ also), is of the same form (P) that is usual on the coins of the fourth century: another form (P) is said to occur on a coin of Licinius jun. (Garrucci, Numism. Constantin. p. 102; appendix to his Vetri Ornati).

^t Martigny observes that those of the best work (instancing the Good Shepherd, Garr. vii. 1, reproduced here, which is perhaps the best executed of all and the oldest) have Greek legends, being probably the work of Greek artists (Dict. p. 279).

^u Is it altogether certain that calices are chalices for the communion? St. Ambrose speaks of those "qui calices ad sepulchra martyrum deferunt atque illic in vesperum bibunt" (De obtest. et sacr. potant.). If not, it may then well be that Tertullian is alluding to some such glasses as these: but scarcely any which remain to us can be so early as A.D. 200. Chrysostom (Homil. in S. Melet.) says that the portrait of Meletius was depicted ἐν ἐκπώμασι καὶ φιάλαις; such vessels may possibly have been similar to those of which we have specimens; if so, the art will probably be Asiatic as well as European. We have indeed a bottom of a small glass vessel which simply reads MLITI (for Meleti probably) DVLICIS ANIMA (xxxviii. 4): yet this can hardly be the same person; it may be a present from a parent to a child, or the like. The remark of Cardinal Wiseman appears to be well founded, that "not a single author, certainly not a single profane author, mentions the time the Good Shepherd was depicted on chalices, possibly glass chalices ("procedant ipsae picturae calicum vestrorum, si vel in illis perhibebit interpretatio," De pudicit. c. 7; see also c. 10), there is certainly nothing in these glasses bearing that type or any other type, which would bear out the conclusion that they were chalices for the communion.* They were at once sacred and convivial, and must therefore have been used in meetings which were both one and the other. Such were the agapae, such were the commemorations of martyrs, such were Christian marriages. On all such occasions, and perhaps others, these glasses were used; more especially, it may be, in the commemorations of St. Peter and St. Paul (so often represented thereon), which were "observed as a general holiday in Rome during the fourth century, very much as Christmas now is among ourselves" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 283). In a well-known passage of St. Augustine (Confess. vi. 2), he mentions that his mother Monica never took more than one cup (pocillum) to the commemoration of the various martyrs—implying that some took more; perhaps bearing effigies of the particular martyrs to be commemorated.

With regard to the plates, large fragments of which have been found at Cologne and smaller ones at Rome, as well as impressions in mortar of entire plates at the latter place, the most obvious and natural interpretation of them would be that they were made use of in the same festivities as those in which the glass cups were employed. Monica, at Milan, as her son informs us, "brought to the commemorations of the Saints, as was the custom in Africa, pulse and bread and wine" (Confess. vi. 2). We may then reasonably suppose that these plates were for the purpose of holding the bread or other solid food used in the same commemorations as those in which wine was drunk. A different view, however, as was perhaps to be expected, is taken of them by those who (like Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote) think that "it is quite possible that some of our glasses may be fragments of chalices" (u. s. p. 293). Anastasius in the Vitae Pontif. s. v. Zephyrinus, says "that he made it a constitution of the church, that ministers should carry glass patenas (patenae vireae) into the church in front of the priests, while the bishop celebrated mass with the priests standing before him, and that in this manner . . . the priest should receive the bread to administer it to the people." Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, commenting on this passage, say (u. s. p. 293): "The fragments of the two large patenae discovered at Cologne, correspond exactly to the kind of glass here mentioned. The scriptural subjects and the absence of all allusions to secular feasting" there are no inscriptions at all on these glasses "accord well with so sacred a purpose, and we may therefore fairly presume that those other smaller glasses" found in Rome, "of which we have also spoken, may also be remains of the patenae used to existence of this art" (Lecture, p. 7). The most that can be said is that Tertullian and Chrysostom may possibly allude to it. The passage quoted by Garrucci from the monk Theophilus (Div. Art. Sched. c. 13), who probably lived about the 12th century, refers to a different mode of decoration, as he himself observes (pref. p. vi.).

convey the Blessed Sacrament from the pope's altar to the parish churches of Rome. Padre Garrucci thinks this not improbable, although he does not admit that any of our catacomb glasses ever formed portions of eucharistic chalices." The reader must be left to form his own opinion, but the subjects on the patenae being much the same as those on the bottoms of the cups, it seems to be by far the most probable supposition, that the purpose of the plates and of the cups was one and the same, whatever that purpose was. (Garrucci, Vetri ornati di figure in oro, Roma, 1858 and 1864 (ed. 2), fol. 42 plates: the preface contains an account of the literature of the subject, pp. xvii. xviii. and a discussion of the date and use of these vessels; De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. for 1864 and 1866; Brownlow and Northcote, Roma Sotterranea, c. vii. 1869. Wiseman (Card.), Lecture delivered in Dublin, 1858, published by M. Walsh, Dublin, 1859; certainly not revised by the Cardinal himself, but giving a fair view of the subject in a short space.)

(iii.) Glass pastes.—Another use of glass among Christian as well as other artists was to make imitations or copies of gems therein. A few such have come down to our times. A paste in imitation of red jasper, published by Le Blant, which exhibits a Pastor Bonus of the usual type, with the legend ΔΟΥΛΟΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ, may serve as an example (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 9093). Other gem pastes in imitation of niccolo and garnet exhibit varieties of the chrisma (British Museum, Castellani Collection). Of more importance are the following. A Nativity, in green glass, published by Venuti (Acad. di Cortona, t. vii. p. 45), and described and figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 431), which is ascribed to the 6th century; it is a semicircular plaque, bearing the words Η ΓΕΝΝΗCIC above, and a defaced legend below: the Magi adore the Saviour, at whom an ox and an ass are gazing: Mary is lying on a bed, and Joseph is seated in meditation. The Vettori Museum, now in the Vatican, has a large oval plaque of coloured glass (Vettori, Num. Aer. expl. p. 37; Martigny, Dict. p. 431, with a figure), which seems to be early medieval; it is also a Nativity: the infant Saviour has a cruciform nimbus; two oxen look at him in the manger; Joseph and Mary are seated near him; the moon and the star of the Magi are in the field. (A cast sent from Rome; the British Museum has three other examples cast from the same mould; one is red, in imitation of jasper; the others are of deep colour.) See NATIVITY. A large glass plaque of the same general form, but less regular ($1\frac{1}{4}$ by $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches), now, it is believed, in the Vatican, of uncertain date, represents a dead saint prostrate; in the centre a semiaureole resting upon her, including the Virgin with cruciform nimbus and Child without any nimbus, a glorified head with circular nimbus (Joseph?) near the Virgin's knees, ΓΧ in field: outside the aureole on both sides saints and angels (both with circular nimbus) in the act of adoration: perhaps early medieval. (A cast sent from Rome.) We have also glass pastes nearly an inch in diameter which are supposed to have been pendants for necklaces, and are considered to go back to the early Christian centuries: one in green glass shews two Israelites contemplating the brassen serpent; another, a red paste, has the Saviour blessing the twelve apostles; a third, probably Christian, has a frog, which was sometimes taken as a symbol of the Resurrection, being found on a Christian lamp, accompanied by a cross and the inscription, ΕΥΘΕΙΜΙ ΑΝΑΚΤΑCΙC (Chabouillet, nos. 3474, 3475, 3453). M. Le Blant has a small oblong glass plaque, which he acquired in Rome, which was once, he thinks, part of an ancient Christian necklace; it bears in golden characters the word in two lines, enclosed in a parallelogram and a crenulated outer margin. He regards it as a

"concise expression of the charity which should unite all men" (Insc. Chrét. de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 43, with a figure). The British Museum and the French Collection contain various other Christian works in this material, some of which are more or less similar to those which have been already described, or to the Byzantine cameo named under GEMS; but as they are of uncertain date (perhaps none of them being earlier than the 9th century* while some may probably be much later) they need hardly be mentioned here.

(iv.) Mosaics.—Glass, in fine, was employed from very early times in the construction of mosaics. The cubes were sometimes coloured; sometimes, in the ages of the Lower Empire, underlaid with a ground of gold or silver leaf, "by this means shedding over the large works of the artists in mosaic a splendour before unknown" (Labarte, u. s. p. 94). See MOSAICS.

[C. B.]

GLEBE. The word Gleba is used for a farm or estate in the Theodosian Codex (Leg. 72, De Decurion.); but the technical sense in which it is used by English writers, to designate certain lands belonging to an ecclesiastical benefice, is later than our period. See ENDOWMENT, PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

GLORIA. [NIMBUS.]

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS. There is considerable difficulty in tracing out the history of this hymn, because at one period both it and the SANCTUS were entitled indiscriminately Hymnus Angelicus. In later years the latter is called Hymnus Seraphicus; whilst the title Hymnus Angelicus or Hymnus Angelorum is confined to the former. The hymn is found in various forms.

1. We have simply the words of St. Luke, ii. 14. This is of course the primitive form, everything that has been added to it having been composed,—as the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633, Mansi, x. 623) reminds us,—by the ecclesiastical doctors. For this reason the council would not allow any expanded form to be sung in the churches. In this short form the words were recited by the priest, according to the liturgy of St. James, when the priest "sealed" the gifts. (Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, iv. 103.) The same simple form may be seen elsewhere: and is continued to this day in the

2. The seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions, c. 47, contains an enlarged form of the hymn,—without any introduction in the oldest manuscript; but two, of the 14th and 16th century respectively, entitle the chapter "Morning Prayer." (Lagarde, p. 229.) This version has a peculiar reading: "We worship Thee through the great High Priest, Thee who art one God, unbegotten, alone, inapproachable." We read too "O Lord, only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and Holy Spirit." The hymn ends "Thou only art holy, Thou only art Lord, Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father. Amen."

3. The treatise which is ascribed to Athanasius "de Virginitate" (Migne, xxviii. 251) is undoubtedly spurious, but it gives some insight into the life of a Greek virgin, within our chronological limits. In § 20 (Migne, ut sup. 275) we read "In the morning, say the Psalm O God, my God, early will I seek Thee (Psalm lxii.). At dawn, the 'Benedicite' and Glory to God in the Highest, and the rest." This is the reading of the Basle and English MSS. But others proceed with the first three clauses: "We hymn Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, and the rest." As this difference of the text may be due to a late interpolation, we are left in uncertainty as to the words of the hymn when this treatise was composed. (Mr. Palmer, Orig. Liturg. ii. 158 does not note the doubts regarding this passage.)

4. The famous Codex Alexandrinus in the British Museum, of the close of the 5th century, puts some of our doubts at rest. This manuscript, after the psalms, contains the thirteen canticles of the Greek church: i. the song of Moses in Exodus; ii. ditto in Deuteronomy; iii. the prayer of Hannah; iv. prayer of Isaiah. (xxvi. 9–20); v. prayer of Jonah; vi. of Habakkuk; vii. of Hezekiah (Isaiah, xxxviii.); viii. of Manasseh; ix. prayer of the three children (εὐλόγητος, Daniel iii. 26); x. hymn of the three children (our Benedicite) entitled "Hymn of our fathers;" xi. prayer of Mary, the Mother of God; xii. of Symeon; xiii. of Zachariah (compare CANTICLES). These conclude with the Gloria in Excelsis in Greek, the hymn being entitled ὕμνος ἑσθλός. This version has been often printed, as by Usher, in his tract De symbolo Romano: Bunsen, Analecta ante-Nicaena, iii. 86; Dr. Campion, Interleaved Prayer Book, 1873, p. 321. It differs slightly from the version of the Apostolic Constitutions, and proceeds with words which distinctively mark it as a morning hymn, some of which words have passed into our Te Deum. It is thus found in the beautiful Zurich psalter reprinted by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra, and in other great psalters; and, in a form very nearly resembling this, it is used in the Greek communion to this day (Horology, ut sup. pp. 69, 70).

5. A Latin translation of this Greek version of the "Gloria in Excelsis," adapted for evening prayer, is contained in the book of hymns of the ancient Irish church, which once belonged to Archbishop Usher, and which has been edited for the Irish Archaeological and Celtic Society by Dr. Todd (part ii. p. 179). In the famous Bangor antiphony discovered at Milan by Muratori, and reprinted imperfectly by him in his Ancient tom. iv. pp. 121, &c. (see Migne, tom. 72) we find at the very end "ad vesperum et ad matutinum: Gloria in Excelsis Deo et in terra pax &c." but Muratori unhappily did not copy it out. Thus we are ignorant of the text. However, the hymn given by Thomasius (Psalterium cum canticis, Rom. 1697, p. 760, or Oper. tom. iii. p. 613) as the Hymnus Angelicus of the Ambrosian breviary, is another and independent translation of the Greek form of the hymn. It was directed to be used daily at matins.

6. Thus it seems clear that when the well known Latin form of the hymn was inserted in the Latin psalters, it was used in the daily or weekly hour services of the clergy. We have additional evidence of this in the rule of Caesarius, c. xxi. and in that of Aurelian. It is there ordered to be used at matins on Sundays.

7. This Latin form Bunsen considered to have been as old as Hilary of Poitiers, to whom indeed Alcuin ascribed the additions to the scripture words. The Roman Catholic ritualists are not satisfied with the testimony of Alcuin, and seem to consider that the hymn in the modern Latin form is of more recent origin. Yet it is found in this form in a very interesting manuscript in the British Museum—Royal 2 A xx.—which is of the eighth century: in the famous Codex Bobiensis, from which Mabillon extracted the "Sacramentarium Gallicanum" (Museum Italicum, i. 273; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 776; or Migne, 72, p. 455): in the so-called Mozarabic liturgy ascribed to St. Isidore (see Migne, 85, p. 531) and in a form very slightly different in the Gothic breviary (Migne, 86, p. 886).

8. The first introduction of the "Gloria in Excelsis" into the Eucharistic service has been ascribed to Telesphorus, but no confidence can be placed in the tradition. The sacramentary of Gregory directed that a bishop might use the "Gloria in Excelsis" on all Sundays and festivals: a presbyter only at Easter. This rule continued long in the Roman church, and constituted one point of difference between the Roman and Gallican churches, in the latter of which no such difference between bishop and presbyter had been observed. Etherius and Beatus shew that in Spain they always sang it on Sundays and festivals; but they quote only the scriptural words, and if we bear in mind the decree of Toledo, we may suppose that only these words were used (the Mozarabic liturgy shews many marks of interpolations). In the liturgies the hymn was generally sung at the commencement of the service; but Mr. Palmer notes that in the Gallican sacramentary (see above) it was used amongst the thanksgivings after communion.

9. The absence of the hymn from St. Germanus's account of the Gallican liturgy has been noted. He says that the words at the end of the gospel, "Glory be to Thee O Lord," were uttered in imitation (?) of the angels' words "Glory to God in the highest" (clamantibus clericis Gloria tibi Domine in specie angelorum qui nascente Domino Gloria in excelsis pastoribus apparentibus cecinerunt. Migne, 72, p. 91). St. Germanus died about the year 585 or 587. This seems to give a superior limit to its introduction into the eucharistic service.

10. It is worthy of notice that whilst the Alexandrine manuscript has in the text of St. CHRIST. ANT.

Luke εὐδοκίας (the reading of Ν* B* D) yet in the morning hymn it as well as all the other copies of the hymn read εὐδοκία. [C. A. S.]

GLORIA PATRI. [DOXOLOGY.]

GLOVES. (χειροθήκη: Chirotheca, Gantus, Gicantus, Vantus, Wantus, Wanto.) It would seem that gloves in the strict sense of the word were unknown to the early Greeks and Romans. (See on this point Casaubon's Animadv. in Athenaeum, xii. 2.) That they were in use, however, among the ancient Persians appears from Xenophon (Cyropaedia, viii. 8. 17). The European custom of wearing them seems to have originated with the German nations, as the Teutonic origin of the common Latin word for them clearly shews: and although, as an ecclesiastical vestment, properly so called, gloves do not appear till the 12th century (the first extant mention of them in that character being in Honorius Augustodunensis, ob. circa 1152 A.D.), they had been used for centuries as articles of practical convenience. Thus we find them mentioned in the life of St. Columbanus, by Jonas Bobbiensis (formerly included among the works of Bede)—"tegumenta manuum quae Galli wantos vocant" (Vita S. Columbani, c. 25; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1026). In the above instance, the gloves are spoken of as used "ad operam laboris," but sometimes they were obviously of a costly nature, for in the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in a long list of valuable articles, he mentions "annulum aureum unum cum gemmis pretiosis et vuantos paria unum" (Patrol. cxxxii. 468).

The employment of a glove in connection with the granting or bequeathing of land, is a custom which hardly falls within our present limits: an example may, however, be given. (See Notgeri Leodiensis [ob. 1008 A.D.] Vita S. Hadulmi, c. 10; Patrol. cxxxix. 1146; also Martene, Anecd. i. 57.) GOD THE FATHER, REPRESENTATIONS OF.* For the first four centuries, at least, no attempt was made at representing the actual Presence of the First Person of the Trinity. It was indicated invariably by the symbolic HAND proceeding from a cloud. Martigny quotes the words of St. Augustine (Epist. cxlviii. 4), "Quum audimus manus, operationem intelligere debemus," from which it would seem that the great father saw a tendency to anthropomorphic misapplication of the words hand and eye, or ear of God, as they are frequently used in the Old Testament. The distinction between analogy and similitude has been so often neglected, that bodily parts as well as passions (like those of anger, repentance, &c.) are often attributed to the incorporeal and infinite being. This has been repeatedly noticed, as (e. g.) by Drs. Whately and Mansel. St. Augustine's expressions show that he was thoroughly awake to the misconception, and consequent irreverence, involved in the forgetful use of such terms as the Divine hand or eye for the Divine power or knowledge. "Quidquid," he says, "dum ista cogitas, corporeae similitudinis occurrerit, abige, abnue, nega, respue, fuge."

The symbolic hand appears in Christian representations of several subjects from the Old Testament, principally connected with events in the lives of Abraham and Moses. The two are found corresponding to each other in Bottari (Sculture e Pitt. sagre, vol. i. tav. 27; also i. tav. 89). Moses is receiving the book of the law in ii. tav. 128. Elsewhere Abraham is alone (vol. ii. tav. 59, and i. tav. 33, from the Callixtine catacomb). In vol. iii. 37 (from cemetery of St. Agnes), the Deity appears to be represented in human form. He is delivering to Adam and Eve respectively the ears of corn and the lamb, as tokens of the labours of their fallen state, and their sentence to "delve and spin." See also Buonarrotti, p. 1. Cardinal Bosio, and latterly M. Perret (vol. i. 57 pl.), give a copy of a painting of Moses striking the rock, and also in the act of loosening the shoe from his foot. Ciampini's plates (Vet. Mon. t. ii. pp. 81, tav. xxiv. also tavv. xvi. and xx. tav. xvii. D.) are important illustrations of this symbol, more especially those of the mosaic of the Transfiguration in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and of the Sacrifice of Isaac in St. Vitale. The author does not find the hand as representing the First Person of the Trinity in pictures of the baptism of our Lord; but it probably occurs in that connexion.

The hand proceeding from clouds appears in the Sacramentary written for Drogon bishop of Metz, and son of Charlemagne, above the Canon of the Mass.

GOLDEN NUMBER. [EASTER.]

GOOD FRIDAY. The anniversary of Christ's Passion and Death was from very early times observed with great solemnity by the church. It was known by various names, ἡμέρα τοῦ σταυροῦ, σωτηρία, or τὰ σωτήρια; πάσχα σταυρώσιμον, in contrast to πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον, Easter Day; or, adopting the Jewish designation (Joh. xix. 14, 31, 42), παρασκευή, either alone, or with the adjectives μεγάλη, or ἀγία: in the Latin church Parasceue, Feria Sexta in Parasceue (Antiphonar. Gregor.), Sexta Feria Major. in Hierusalem (Sacramentar. Gregor.). The day was observed as a strict fast, which was continued by those who could endure it to beyond midnight on the following day (Apost. Constit. v. 18). The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, severely condemned those who ended their fast on this day at 3 P.M. and then indulged in feasting, and ordered that all save the very young and the very old and the sick should abstain from all food till after the services of the day were concluded. All who refused obedience to this rule were denied a participation in the Paschal Eucharist (can. viii.; Labbe, Concil. v. 1707). Not food alone, but the use of oil and the bath were forbidden by a canon of Gangra (Nonocanon, can. 434, apud Coteler. Eccl. Græc. Monum. i. 138) with the indignant apostrophe, Ὁ Χριστὸς ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ καὶ σὺ ἐν τῷ βαλανείῳ; In process of time the day came to be distinguished by a peculiar ritual and customs marking the solemn character of the day. The bells were silent from the midnight of Wednesday (Ordo Roman. apud Muratori, ii. 714). The kiss of peace was prohibited (Tert. de Orat. 18). The altar was stripped of its ornaments, and even of its covering. The processions were without chanting (Sacram. Gelas. Muratori i. 559). The lamps and candles were gradually extinguished during matins (Ordo Roman. u.s.). A long series of intercessory collects was used. A cross was erected in front of the altar, blessed, and adored (Sacram. Gelas. u.s.). There was no consecration of the Lord's Supper, but the reserved eucharist of the previous day was partaken of by the faithful.

This communion subsequently received the name of "the Mass of the Presanctified," Missa Praesantificatorum, but incorrectly, the term Missa usually implying consecration. Thus Amalarius states that on Good Friday "the mass is not celebrated" (de Eccl. Offic. iv. 20; Rab. Maur. de Instit. Cler. ii. 37; pseudo-Aluin, Hittorp col. 251). The reason of this prohibition of celebration is evident. The eucharist being the highest Christian feast, was deemed out of harmony with the penitential character of the day, for "how," says Balsamon (Bevereg. Pandect. i. 219), "can one mourn and rejoice at the same time?" As early as the council of Laodicea, c. A.D. 365, this prohibition was extended to the whole of Lent, with the exception of Saturdays and Sundays (can. 49; Labbe Concil. i. 1506). In the letter to Decentius ascribed to Innocent I. c. A.D. 402, but probably not to be placed so early, the restriction is limited to Good Friday and Easter Eve, on which days the tradition of the church was that the sacraments were not to be celebrated at all; "isto biduo sacramenta penitus non celebrari" (Labbe Concil. ii. 1246). At this period there was no communion of any kind on Good Friday. How early the natural desire to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood on the day when it was offered for us on the cross, led to the reservation of the previously consecrated elements for the purpose of communion, we have no certain knowledge. It is evident from a decree of the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, that in the first half of the seventh century, there was no celebration of the Lord's Supper on Good Friday in Spain. At that time it was a wide-spread custom, which the council condemned, to keep the doors of the churches closed on Good Friday, so that there was no divine service, nor any preaching of the Passion to the people. The council ordained that the Lord's death should be preached on that day, and that the people should pray for the pardon of their sins, that so they might be better fitted to celebrate the resurrection and partake of the eucharist at Easter (can. viii. Labbe Concil. v. 1707). We learn also from the acts of the 16th council, held sixty years later, A.D. 693, that on that day "the altars were stripped and no one was permitted to celebrate mass" (B. vi.

1355). In the Greek church the custom of communicating in the previously consecrated elements was established before the middle of the seventh century, for we find it mentioned as a general practice during the whole of Lent, in the acts of the Trullan (or Quinisext) council A.D. 692 (can. 52, Labbe vi. 1165). It first appears in the West in the Regula Magistri, a monastic rule compiled probably in the seventh century, printed by Broekie (Codex Regul. I. ii. p. 269). It was established in Rome before the end of the eighth century, when the ritual of Good Friday is prescribed in the Ordo Romanus (Muratori Liburg. Rom. Vet. ii. 995). The observance of Good Friday commenced at midnight, when all rose for service. Nine Psalms were said with their responsions, these were followed by three lections from the Lamentations, commencing Lam. ii. 8, "Cogitavit Dominus dissipare;" three from the Tractatus of St. Augustine on Psalm 63, and three from the Epistle to the Hebrews, beginning c. iv. 11, "Festinemus ergo &c." Mattins then followed, during which the lights in the church were gradually extinguished, beginning at the entrance, until by the end of the third nocturn only the seven lamps burning at the altar were left alight. These were also put out, one by one, alternately right and left at the commencement of each Psalm, the middle lamp, the last left burning, being extinguished at the gospel. At the third hour all the presbyters and clergy of the city assembled in expectation of the pontiff. On his arrival the subdeacon commenced the lection from Hosea v. 15, "Haec dicit Dominus Deus; in tribulatione sua, &c.," and then was sung as an antiphon Hab. iii. 1-3, "Domine audiui, &c.," After some prayers said by the pontiff, and the second lection, Exod. xii. 1, "In diebus illis dixit Dominus ad Moysen et Aaron, &c.," Ps. xci. or cxi. was sung, and the Passion according to St. John was recited by the deacon. This over, two deacons stript the altar of the white linen cloth, previously put on "sub evangelio," in a stealthy manner, "in modum furantis." The pontiff came before the altar and recited a series of eighteen prayers, a portion of which form the basis of the Good Friday collects of the church of England. The first and last collect stand alone. The other sixteen are in pairs. Before each pair the deacon warned the people to kneel and after it to rise. "Adnuntiat diaconus flectamus genua; iterum dicite levate." These collects are—(1) for the peace and unity of the church; (2) for perseverance in the faith; (3) for the pope and chief bishop (antistes); (4) for the bishops of their diocese; (5) for all bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, &c.; (6) for all orders of men in the holy church; (7) for the emperor; (8) for the Roman empire; (9) (10) for catechumens; (11) against sickness, famine, pestilence, and other evils; (12) for all in trouble; (13) (14) for heretics and schismatics; (15) (16) for Jews; (17) (18) for pagans and idolaters. A direction is given that the prayers for the Jews are not to be said kneeling. The collects are given in the Sacramentary of Gregory, as printed by Pamelius, and in that of Gelasius, as well as in the old Gallican missal. This last contains the direction to the celebrant "eadem die non salutat (i.e. does not say pax vobiscum), nec psallet." These collects finished, all were to leave the church

"Adoration of the cross succeeds." The cross is placed a little distance in front of the altar, supported on either side by acolytes. A kneeling stool being placed in front, the pontiff kneels, and adores and kisses the cross, followed by the clergy and people in order. The Ambrosian missal given by Pamelius contains four prayers for the ceremony: "Oratio super crucem;" "Benedictio crucis;" "Oratio ad crucem adorandam;" "Oratio post adoratam crucem." In the Antiphonarium of Gregory also given by Pamelius we have an "Antiphon ad crucem adorandam." The adoration of the cross was followed by the communion of the presanctified. "Two presbyters enter the sacristy or other place in which the Body of the Lord which remained from the previous day was placed, and put it in a paten, and let a subdeacon hold before them a chalice with unconsecrated wine, and another the paten with the Body of the Lord. One presbyter takes the paten, the other the chalice, and they carry and set them on the stript altar" (Ord. Rom. u. s.). The cross is meanwhile saluted by the laity, while the hymn Ecce lignum Crucis is sung, and Ps. cxix. recited. The salutation of the cross being completed, the Lord's Prayer is recited, "and when they have said Amen the pontiff takes of the holy thing, and puts it into the chalice saying nothing (nihil dicens), and all communicate cum silentio." The rubrics of the Gelasian Sacramentary agree in the main with the Ordo, except that they speak of the reservation of the Blood as well as of the Body of the Lord, and direct that the reserved sacrament be brought out of the sacristy and set on the altar by deacons instead of presbyters. The adoration of the cross by the clergy succeeds the placing of the consecrated elements on the altar, and is followed by the actual communion (Muratori u. s. i. 559, sq.) It merits notice that all early authorities prescribe a general communion on Good Friday, "all communicate silently." This custom had entirely ceased in Rome at the beginning of the 9th century (Amalar. de Eccl. Off. i. 15), and though it lingered for a long time in some parts, it gradually died out in the West, and at the present day in the Roman church no one but the celebrant communicates on Good Friday. The pontiff pronounces peace to them "in the name of the Father, &c." The people answer, "and with thy spirit." "After a little space each says his vespers privately, and so they go to table" (Muratori ii. 995-996). [E. V.]

GOODS, COMMUNITY OF. The idea that all property should belong to a community and not to individuals may be traced to a very high antiquity. The Pythagorean society is commonly supposed to have been constituted on the basis of a community of goods, though probably only those who had reached the highest grade of the initiated renounced all private possessions (Ritter and Preller, Hist. Phil., p. 58). Plato, also, in his imaginary Republic, condemns the institution of private property in the strongest manner, as the source of all greed and meanness; he therefore allows it only to the third and lowest class of his citizens—those who are by nature qualified to seek only low and material ends in life, and are consequently excluded from all share in the government of the state. The two higher classes are to live wholly for the state, a condition—the philosopher holds—incompatible with the possession of private property (Politia, iv., p. 421 c ff.; Leges, v. p. 739 B.).

To turn from heathen to Jewish social institutions, Josephus tells us (Bellum Jud. ii. 8, § 3) of the Essenes, that each member on entrance threw his goods into the common stock, so that there was found among them neither poverty nor riches. In like manner the Therapeutae on Lake Moeris had all things in common.

It was while the Therapeutae and Essenes were still flourishing communities that the gospel of Christ was first proclaimed. And here, too, we read of the earlier church of Jerusalem, that they “had all things common” (Acts ii. 44)—a passage which has often served fanatical sects as a justification of their communism. And yet it is clear from the book of the Acts itself that property made over to the community was of the nature of a voluntary gift; those who entered the church were not deprived of the right to possess property (Acts v. 4); Ananias was not punished for failing to contribute the whole of his property, but for fraud and lying in pretending to give the whole while he only gave part.

In the apostolic age generally it is past all controversy that nothing like a community of goods existed in the church. The churches are evidently contemplated as containing the same variety of wealth and station as ordinary society; contributions are made of freewill; the rich are charged to “be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;” the cheerful giver is commended (2 Cor. ix. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18). The disturbed state of the Thessalonians, and their unwillingness to labour while they expected the immediate advent of Christ, had (so far as appears) no connexion with any communistic views. Nor does the testimony of the next age favour the idea that the earliest Christian society was communistic. The writer of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5) speaks of a “common table,” and no more. Tertulian, indeed (Apolog. c. 39), says, in so many words, that Christians had all things in common except their wives (omnia indiscreta sunt apud nos praeter uxores); but it is evident that this is nothing more than a characteristically violent expression for their mutual love and charity; for in the very same chapter he states expressly, that the contributions of the brethren to the common fund were wholly voluntary (modicam unusquisque stipem menstrua die, vel quum velit, et si modo velit, et si modo possit, apponit). Lactantius (Epit. Div. Institt. c. 38) especially condemns communism as one of the cardinal vices of Plato’s Republic, which he would hardly have done if he had supposed the same principle to have animated the first society of believers. The interpretation of Acts ii. 44 as relating to an absolute community of goods seems in fact to have taken its rise from Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Acta App.). Some writers in modern times have seen in this supposed communism of the early Christians at Jerusalem an indication of an Essene influence. (See against this view Von Wegnern, in Illgen’s Zeitschrift xi. 2. p. 1 ff.).

As, however, within the church so strong an expression was given to the duty of mutual love and succour, and of the brotherhood of man in Christ, it could scarcely fail but that here and there enthusiastic sects would exaggerate and develope these principles into absolute renunciation of property. This was in fact the case. During the ecclesiastical troubles in Africa in the 4th century, the Donatists were never weary of reproaching their orthodox opponents with the wealth and power which they derived from their connexion with the state. Some of their own adherents, in consequence of these denunciations, renounced private possessions altogether—a renunciation which led to vagabondage and mendicancy rather than to holiness. These CIRCUMCELLIONS—as they came to be called—became the nucleus of a band of discontented peasants and runaway slaves, whose excesses at last required the forcible interference of the government to put them down. And other sects also rejected the idea of property; the Apotactici or Apostolici, as they arrogantly called themselves (says St. Augustine, De Haeres. c. 40), admitted none into their community who lived with wives or possessed private property (res proprias habentes); and, a common characteristic of heresy, denied salvation to all outside their own sect. The Eustathians also, who were condemned at the council of Gangra about the year 370 (Conc. Gangr. Praef.) held that those who did not give up their private wealth were beyond all hope of salvation. The laws of the empire imposed upon Apotactici the same penalties that were laid upon other heretics, except the confiscation of goods; they could not be deprived of that which they had already renounced (Codex Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 5, de Haeret. ll. 7 et 11).

When Pachomius († 348) first drew together into one body [COENOBITUM] a number of anchorites and wandering mendicants at Tabennae in Upper Egypt, he instituted a system of organized labour and common participation in the fruits of labour. Stewards [OECONOMUS] managed the property of the society for the benefit of the whole, and distributed the excess of income to the poor and needy of the neighbourhood. St. Basil, St. Benedict, and other founders of monastic orders, enjoined the same rule of individual poverty on the members of their societies, and so there arose throughout Christendom, in East and West, religious societies of celibates organized on communistic principles [MONASTICISM]. From the 8th century onward the secular clergy also, who lived the canonical life, adopted, to some extent, the principle of community of goods [CANONICI]. [C.]

GOSPEL, THE LITURGICAL. I. Introduction.—Among the Jews, certainly from the time of the Maccabees, and probably before, one lesson from the Pentateuch and another from the “Prophets” (i. e. from some of the later historical books, and from those more properly called prophetical) were read in the synagogues every sabbath day. Fifty-four portions from the Pentateuch (called Paraschioth), and as many from the "Prophets" (Hapthoroth), were appointed for this purpose. As the Jews intercalated a month every second or third year, this number was required. When there were not fifty-four sabbaths in a year, they read two of the shorter lessons together, once or twice in the year, as might be necessary; so that the whole of both selections was read through annually. The Paraschioth are generally very long, some extending over four or five chapters; but the Hapthoroth are as a rule short, often only a part of one chapter. Tables of both may be seen in Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures, pt. iii. ch. i. sect. iv. The foregoing facts will enable the reader to judge how far the first Christians were indebted to the traditions of the synagogue for the practice of reading Holy Scripture in their synaxis, and for the method of reading it. At all events we may be certain that the Old Testament, so long the only known repository of the "oracles of God," and still acknowledged to be "able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii. 15), would be no more neglected in their common exercises of religion than it was in their private study. At the same time it was inevitable that, when the New Testament came to be written, lessons from that should be read either in addition to or instead of those from the Old. There was, however, a short period during which the Old Testament only would be read in Christian assemblies, viz. before the events of the Gospel were committed to writing; and there is in the most ancient liturgy, that of St. James, a rubric, evidently genuine, which appears to have been framed during this interval. "Then the sacred oracles of the Old Covenant and of the Prophets are read at great length (διεξοδικώματα, some understand "consecutively," but the Jewish precedent favours the former reading); and the incarnation of the Son of God, and His sufferings, His resurrection from the dead, and ascension into heaven, and, again, His second coming with glory, are set forth." As Mr. Trollope points out (The Greek Liturgy of St. James, p. 42), we have here the Old Testament read, but the great events of the Gospel related to the people as if not yet in writing.

II. Evidence of use.—Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, describing the celebration of the Eucharist, says, "The commentaries of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as time permits" (Apol. i. c. 67). A lesson from the gospels was without doubt included under the former head. St. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a confessor whom he had ordained lector, as "reading the precepts and the gospel of the Lord" from the stand (pulpitum) (Ep. xxxix.). Eusebius, A.D. 315, says that St. Peter authorised the use of the gospel of St. Mark "in the churches." For this he refers to the Hypotyposes of Clemens of Alexandria (not of Rome, as Bona and others) and to Papias; but elsewhere he cites both passages, and neither of them contains the words "in the churches." What he says, therefore, does not, as many have imagined, prove from Papias the custom of the apostolic church, but is only a proof of the practice of his own age, in the light of which he read those earlier writers

(see Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. xv.; and compare lib. v. c. xiv., lib. iii. c. xxxix.). Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, speaks vaguely of the "reading of Scripture" (Præf. in Catech. §§ iii. iv.); nor are any of his catechetical homilies on lessons from the gospel. Optatus, A.D. 368, addressing the Donatist clergy, says, "Ye begin with the lessons of the Lord, and ye expand your expositions to our injury; ye bring forth the gospel, and make a reproach against an absent brother" (De Schism. Donat. lib. iv. c. v.). The so-called Constitutions of the Apostles put an order into their mouths, which begins thus: "After the reading of the law and the prophets and our epistles, and the acts and the gospels, let" &c. (lib. viii. c. v. Cotel. tom. i. p. 392). Pseudo-Dionysius tells us that in the liturgy, after the Psalms, "follows the reading of the tablets of holy writ by the ministers" (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. iii. § ii. tom. i. p. 284). These tablets are explained by Maximus the scholiast on Dionysius, A.D. 645, to be the Old and New Testament (Ibid. p. 305). St. Chrysostom frequently gave notice of the text on which he proposed to preach some days before; but in one homily he says, "On one day of the week, or on the sabbath (Saturday), at least, let each take in his hands, and, sitting at home, read that section (περικοπήν) of the gospels which is going to be read among you" (Hom. xi. in St. Joh. Ev. § 1). This implies that they knew what the lesson from the gospels would be; and therefore that a table of such lessons was drawn up and accessible to all. St. Augustine, in Africa, often preached on the gospel. Thus one of his sermons begins, "The chapter of the holy gospel which we heard, when it was just now read," &c. (Serm. lv. § 1). Another: "We heard, when the gospel was read," &c. (Serm. lxi. § 1). The council of Laodicea, probably about 365, has a canon ordering the "gospels to be read with other scriptures on the sabbath" (Can. xvi.). The omission of the gospel on Saturday had without doubt been merely a local custom. A council of Orange, A.D. 441, can. xviii., ordered that thenceforward the gospel should be read to the catechumens, as well as the faithful, in all the churches of the province. That of Valencia, A.D. 524, ordered that "the most holy gospels be read in the mass of the catechumens before the illation of the gifts, in the order of lessons after the apostle," i.e. the epistle (Can. i.). In France, 554, a constitution of Childebert mentions the gospels, prophets, and apostle, as read from the altar (Capit. Reg. Franc. ed. Baluz. tom. i. col. 7). Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, in his exposition of the liturgy, similarly recognises the prophecy, apostle, and gospel (printed by Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii.). Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, tells a story of certain clerks in the days of Childebert, who "having laid the three books, i.e. of the prophecy, the apostle, and the gospels on the altar," prayed for an augury from the passages at which they should open, each "having made an agreement among themselves that every one should read at mass that which he first opened on in the book" (Hist. Franc. lib. iv. c. xvi.). This implies that in Gaul at least the lessons were still left to the choice of those who were to read them. In the next century, however, the Gallican church had a lectionary, a copy of which, nearly complete, in Merovingian characters, was found by Mabillon in the monastery at Luxeuil. It provides a gospel for every mass (Liturg. Gall. lib. ii. pp. 97-173). Luxeuil is in the province of Besançon; but the eucharistic lessons (of which the gospel is always one) in the Sacramentary found at Bobio, which is believed to be of the use of that province, and is certainly of about the same age as the lectionary, differ nevertheless from those in that book. From this we may perhaps infer that although the lessons were then generally fixed, every bishop was at liberty to make his own selection. There is another ancient lectionary, ascribed to St. Jerome, and known as the Liber Comitis, or Comes Hieronymi; but from internal evidence shown to be the work of a Gallican compiler in the 8th century. This has been printed from two MSS., one of which provides three lessons for above two hundred days and occasions; the other for the most part only two; but the gospel is never omitted in either. The shorter recension may be seen in the Rituale SS. Patrum of Pamelius, tom. ii. pp. 1-61. The longer is printed by Baluze in the Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. ii. coll. 1309-1351.

III. Provision for use.—In the West, generally, a gospel has been always provided for every Sunday and for other holy days. The number of gospels (and other lessons) in the Liber Comitis already mentioned suggests that at one time there was a partial attempt to assign proper lessons to every day in the year. However this may be, the Roman use retained them for every day in Lent, and the Mozarabic for every Wednesday and Friday (except the first) during that season (see Missale Mixtum, Leslie, pp. 89-154). There was no such provision in the Gallican Sacramentary found at Bobio (see Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. coll. 815-835, or Mus. Ital. tom. i. pp. 301-319), nor, so far as we can judge in the Lectionary of Luxeuil (Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. p. 124). Eight leaves are missing in this MS. between Ash Wednesday and Palm Sunday, but they could hardly have contained more than the Sunday lessons. The ancient Irish Sacramentary, of which but one copy exists in manuscript, probably of the 6th century, is singular in the West in having but one gospel and epistle for the whole year, the former being the sixth chapter of St. John, the latter the eleventh chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians. See O'Connor's Append. to vol. i. of the Catal. of the MSS. at Stowe, p. 45. The fact is also attested by Dr. Todd (see Pref. to the Liber. Eccl. de B. Terrenani de Arbuthnott, p. xxiv.).

In the West the gospels appear to have been chosen without any reference to their place in the books of the New Testament. But, in the Greek church, those four books have been divided into lessons (τμήματα, μέρη, περικοπές, ἀναγνώσματα, ἀναγνώσεις); so that they may be read through in order, only interrupted when a festival with its proper lesson intervenes (Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Gr. Diss. i. p. 35). It is probably in accordance with this arrangement that the canon of Laodicea, already cited, does not order lessons from the gospels, or sections, or portions, or the like, to be read on Saturday with other scriptures, but the gospels themselves, i.e. the four books so called. From this it may be inferred that the Greek method was the normal practice of the whole Eastern church before the separation of the Nestorians and Monophysites. There was an exception, however, at one period, whether beginning before or after that separation, in the church of Malabar, the ancient liturgy of which presents but one epistle and gospel for every celebration—the former composed from 2 Cor. v. 1-10, and Heb. iv. 12, 13; the latter taken from St. John v. vv. 19-29. As neither have any special reference to the Eucharist, it may be inferred that the peculiarity was, unlike that of the Irish missal, unintentional, and resulting, probably, from the destruction of sacred books in a season of persecution, and from the ignorance that followed it.

IV. The Book of the Gospels.—The book which contained the four gospels as divided for eucharistic use was called by the Greeks Εὐαγγέλιον. The oldest writer cited as using the word in this specific sense is Palladius, A.D. 400: "He brings the 'gospel' to him and exacts the oath." (Hist. Lausiac. c. 86.) Another proof of the antiquity of the usage is the fact that the Nestorians, who were cut off from the church in the 5th century, retain the term Euangelion in this limited sense to the present day (Badger's Nestorians, v. ii. p. 19). The book is similarly called "the gospel" in the liturgy of St. Mark (Renaud. tom. i. p. 136) and others.

V. By whom read.—In Africa the eucharistic gospel was read by those of the order of readers in the 3rd century (see Cypr. Ep. xxxix. and Ep. xxxviii.). It was generally, however, assigned to a higher order: "After these (i.e. the other lessons), let a deacon or presbyter read the gospels" (Constit. Apostol. lib. ii. c. lvii.). Sozomen, A.D. 440, tells us that among the Alexandrians the "archdeacon alone read that sacred book (of the gospels); but among others the deacons, and in many churches the priests only" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.). He adds that "on high days bishops read it, as at Constantinople, on the first day of the paschal feast." The liturgies of St. Mark (Renaud. tom. i. p. 138), St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69) give this office to the deacon. This was also the common practice in the West. Thus St. Jerome says to Sabinian, "Thou wast wont to read the gospel as a deacon" (Ep. xciii.). St. Isidore of Seville, writing about the year 610, is a witness to the same practice (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 8). We observe it also in the most ancient "Ordines Romani" (Mus. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 10, 46); and it became the rule throughout Europe, when a deacon was present.

VI. Where read.—The gospel was perhaps generally read from a stand called Ambo (Ἀμβών) or Pulpitum even in the earliest ages. It certainly was so when the celebrant himself did not read it. Thus St. Cyprian, as before quoted, speaks of Celerinus, the reader, as officiating "on a pulpit, i.e. on the tribunal of the church," and generally of confessors raised to that order as "coming to the pulpit after the stocks" (Epp. xxxviii., xxxix.). The Ordo Romanus in use in the 8th century orders the gospel to be read from the higher step of the ambo, the epistle having been read from a lower (Ord. ii. nn. 7, 8). In some churches there was a separate ambo for the gospel. An example occurred in the church of St. Clement at Rome, where also the gospel ambo was a "little higher and more ornate" (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. iv. n. iii.). This became to some extent a rule (Seulamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 222). We hear of the ambo in the East also. Thus Sozomen, speaking of a tomb over which a church had been built, says that it was "near the ambo, that is to say, the rostrum (Βήμα) of the readers" (Hist. Eccl. lib. ix. c. ii.). The same historian tells us that St. Chrysostom, that he might be better heard, used to preach at Constantinople "sitting on the rostrum of the readers" (lib. v. c. v.), and Socrates, referring to a particular occasion, speaks of him as "seated on the ambo, from which he was wont also before that to preach in order to be heard" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. v.). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, forbade any who had not received the proper benediction to "proclaim the words of God to the people on the ambo" (can. xxxiii.). In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the deacon who reads the gospel "stands elevated on the ambo or in the appointed place" (Goar, p. 69).

VII. Read towards the South.—It was an early, but we think not primitive, custom in the West for the gospeller to "stand facing the south, where the men were wont to assemble" (Ord. Rom. ii. c. 8). Amalarius, an early commentator on the Ordo Romanus, suggests that this was because the men were supposed to receive the gospel first, and to teach it to their wives at home (1 Cor. xiv. 35). See his Ecloga, n. xv. Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 553. It is probable, however, that a different custom prevailed at the same time in France, or very soon after. For in the latter part of the 9th century Remigius of Auxerre tells us that "the Levite (deacon), when about to pronounce the words of the gospel, turns his face towards the north," as defying Satan, who was supposed (from Isai. xiv. 13) to dwell there (De Celeb. Missae, ad. calc. Libri Pseudo-Alcuini, de Div. Off. Hittorp, col. 280).

VIII. Attendant rites.—From a very early period the reading of the gospel was attended with circumstances of solemnity. In the Greek church it has for many ages been brought into the church out of the chapel of Prothesis in a rite known as the Little Entrance, the bringing in of the gifts being the Great Entrance. While the choir is singing the Glory at the end of the third antiphon the priest and deacon, after bowing thrice before the altar, go out for the book of the gospels. They return into the church, the deacon carrying the gospel, preceded by lights, and welcomed by a special anthem. After a circuit of some length on the north side of the church they stop at the holy doors, where the priest says, secretly, the "Prayer of the Entrance." The deacon then asks for, and the priest gives, a "blessing on the Entrance," troparia being sung meanwhile. When they are ended, the deacon shows the gospel to the people, saying, "Wisdom. Stand up." They then enter the bema, and the book is laid on the holy table till required for use (Euchoiologum, Goar, pp. 67, 124, 160). This is found in the older liturgy of St. Basil, as well as that of St. Chrysostom, but it is impossible to say how much of it was practised in the age of those great bishops. There is no trace of the Little Entrance in the liturgy of Jerusalem, from which that of Caesarea (St.

Basil) was derived, nor in the Nestorian liturgies, which came from an independent source before the 5th century. On the other hand, there is a simpler form of the rite in the Armenian liturgy, which was borrowed from Caesarea in the time of St. Basil, and influenced in its subsequent growth by the residence of St. Chrysostom in Armenia, where he died (Le Brun, Diss. sur les Liturgies, x. artt. iv. xiii.). We observe, also, an elaborate rendering of the same rite in liturgies that can hardly have been indebted to those of the Greek church after the 6th century at least. "As the book of the gospels," remarks Renaudot, "is carried to the ambo with great ceremony among the Copts, so it is certain that it is in like manner done among the Syrians; and they received it from the Greeks" (tom. ii. p. 69). For the Coptic Entrance see tom. i. p. 210. A short rubric in the liturgy of St. Mark tells us when the Entrance takes place; but it is not described (Renaud. tom. i. p. 136).

Another proof of the antiquity of the Little Entrance is found in its resemblance to a ceremony practised at Rome in certain pontifical masses of the 7th and 8th centuries. The gospel was brought in a case or casket from the basilica of St. John Lateran to the reginary church in which the celebration took place by an acolyte in attendance on the bishop, but under the care of the archdeacon. It was made ready by the reader at the door of the Secretarium, while the bishop was within preparing for the service. The acolyte then carried it "into the presbytery to before the altar," preceded by a subdeacon, who then took it from him, and "with his own hands placed it with honour upon the altar" (Ord. Rom. i. §§ 3, 4, 5; ii. 2, 4, 5).

As an example of the ritual when the gospel was to be read, we may, for the East, cite St. Mark: "The deacon, when about to read the gospel, says, 'Bless, sir.' The priest, 'The Lord bless and strengthen, and make us hearers of His holy gospel, who is God blessed now and ever, and for ever, Amen.' The deacon, 'Stand, let us hear the holy gospel.' The priest, 'Peace be to all.' The people, 'And to thy spirit.' Then the deacon reads the gospel"—(Renaud. tom. i. p. 138). At Rome, in the pontifical masses before mentioned, the deacon having received a blessing from the bishop, "The Lord be in thy heart and on thy lips," after kissing the gospels, took the book off the altar, and went towards the ambo, preceded by two subdeacons—one with incense—and followed by a third. There the acolytes made a passage for the preceding subdeacons and the deacon. The latter then rested his book on the left arm of the subdeacon without a censer, who opened it at the place already marked. The deacon then, with his finger in the place, went up to that stage of the ambo from which he was to read, the two subdeacons going to stand before the steps by which he would descend. The gospel ended, the bishop says, "Peace be to thee," and "The Lord be with you." Resp., "And with thy spirit." As the deacon came down, the subdeacon who had opened the book took it from him, and handed it to the third subdeacon who had followed. He, holding it on his planeta, before his breast, offers it to be kissed by all engaged in the rite, and then puts it into the case or casket before mentioned, held ready by the acolyte who had brought it into the church (Ord. Rom. i. § 11). An Ordo, somewhat later, but not lower than the 8th century, tells us that "the candles were extinguished in their place after the gospel was read" (Ord. ii. § 9). The custom of lighting candles at the reading of the gospel came from the East, where it prevailed in the 4th century. "Through all the churches of the East," says St. Jerome, "when the gospel is to be read, lights are burned, though the sun be already shining" (Contra Vigilant. § 7). St. Isidore of Seville, in a work written in 636, says that "acolytes in Greek are called coferarii in Latin, from their bearing wax candles when the gospel is to be read," &c. (Etymol. lib. vii. c. xii. § 29). This is probably the earliest notice in the West, though the first Ordo Romanus belongs almost certainly to the same century. The symbolism of the lights needs no explanation (see St. John i. 9; viii. 12).

IX. Heard standing.—It was probably from the very first the custom for the people to hear the gospel standing, out of reverence. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. ii. c. lvii.: "When the gospel is being read, let all the presbyters and the deacons and all the people stand with great quietness." Philostorgius, A.D. 425, says that Theophilus the Indian, when visiting his native country, about the year 345, found that the people "performed the hearing of the gospel lessons sitting, and had some other practices which the Divine law did not sanction" (Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. § 5). His language shows how important the rite was considered. Isidore of Pelusium, 412, says, in the same spirit, "When the True Shepherd becomes present through the opening of the adorable gospels, the bishop both rises and lays aside the habit (the ὑποφόριον) which he wears symbolical of Him" (Ep. cxxvi. Hermínio Comiti). In accordance with this, Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.) tells us that there was "a strange custom among the Alexandrians, for, when the gospels were read, the bishop did not stand up, which," he adds, "I have neither known nor heard of among others." The same rule prevailed in the West. Amalarius, writing about 827, says: "During the celebration of these, i.e. the lesson (epistle) and the prophecy, we are wont to sit, after the custom of the ancients." Then, when he speaks of the gospel: "Up to this time we sit; now we must rise at the words of the gospel" (De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. cc. 11, 18). At the same time all turned to the East, and laid down the staff on which, at that period, they commonly leaned, "nor was there crown or other covering on their heads" (Ord. Rom. ii. § 8; Amal. u. s. c. 18).

X. The Doxologies.—The doxology now common after the announcement of the gospel is mentioned by writers within our period. Thus Heterius and Beatus, in Spain, A.D. 785: "The deacon commands all to be silent, and says, 'The lesson of the holy gospel according to Matthew.' All the people answer, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord'" (Adv. Elipm. lib. i. c. lxvi.). Compare the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, pp. 2, 45, &c.). Amalarius only recommends it. After advising the people to pray for a profitable hearing, he adds: "Let him who is not quick to take in the words of the gospel, at least say, 'Glory,'" &c. (lib. iii. c. 18). The practice probably came through Spain, like several other rites, from the East. In the homily De Circo, ascribed incorrectly to St. Chrysostom, we read, "When the deacon is about to open the gospel, we all fix our eyes on him and keep silence; but when he begins the course of reading, we forthwith stand up, and respond, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord'" (Opp. St. Chrys. tom. viii. p. 723, ed. Gaume). Compare the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69). The use of this form was probably not very extensive before the 6th century, or we should have found it in all the Nestorian and Eutychian rites. The liturgy of Malabar (Nestorian), however, does give "Glory to Christ the Lord" (Hist. Eccl. Malab. Raulin, p. 306); the Ethiopic, "Glory be to Thee alway, O Christ, our Lord and God," &c. (Renaud. tom. i. p. 510); and the Armenian, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord, our God" (Neale's Eastern Church, Introd. p. 414).

There is no very early evidence of a doxology after the gospel. The liturgy of Malabar repeats that given above. The Ethiopic has, "The cherubim and seraphim send glory up to Thee." The Armenian, like the Malabar, has the same after as before. There was none in the early Roman liturgy, and Amen seems to have been the common response in the middle ages (Notitia Eucharistica, p. 228).

XI. In what language read.—As the first converts to the gospel spoke Greek, all the liturgies were originally in that language. It is not known when Latin was adopted in the services at Rome, but the church there had been founded more than a century and a half before it produced a single Latin writer. It was, therefore, natural that Greek should be occasionally and partially used in the services after the general use of Latin had begun. In particular the eucharistic lessons were on certain days read in both languages. The chief evidence of this is the fact that it continued as a traditional custom throughout the middle ages (see Notitia Euch. p. 207); but we also find some early testimony to the usage. Thus Amalarius: "Six lessons were read by the ancient Romans [on the Saturdays of the Ember weeks] in Greek and Latin (which custom is kept up at Constantinople to this day), for two reasons, if I mistake not; the one, because there were Greeks present, to whom Latin was not known; the other, because both people were of one mind" (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 1). This statement obtains collateral support from the earliest Ordo Romanus, in which the four lessons used at the general baptism on Easter Eve are ordered to be read in Greek and Latin (§ 40). Nicholas I., A.D. 858, writing to the emperor Michael, confirms the statement of Amalarius as to the practice at Constantinople. He affirms that "daily, or any how, on the principal feasts," the church there was "reported to recite the apostolic and evangelic lessons in that language (the Latin) first, and afterwards pronounce the very same lessons in Greek, for the sake of the Greeks" (Ep. viii., Labb. Conc. tom. viii. col. 298). When John VIII., in the same century, gave permission for the celebration of the Holy Communion in the Slavonic tongue, he made this proviso, that, "to show it greater honour, the gospel should be read in Latin, and afterwards published in Slavonic in the ears of the people who did not understand Latin; as appears to be done in some churches" (Ep. cclxvii.; Labb. Conc. tom. ix. col. 177). In the churches of Syria the gospel and epistle are still read both in the old Syriac and in the better understood Arabic (Renaud. tom. ii. p. 69); and in Egypt in both Coptic and Arabic (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 5-8). When they were first read in Arabic we do not know; but it was probably before the 9th century, as both countries were conquered and overrun by the Arabs in the former half of the 7th.

XII. From the 6th century downward we meet with repeated instances of a custom of inclosing the gospels in cases, covers, or caskets, adorned with gems and the precious metals. The first Ordo Romanus, in giving directions for the pontifical mass, to which we have referred above, orders, that on festivals the keeper of the vestry at St. John's Lateran shall give out "a larger chalice and paten, and larger gospels under his seal, noting the number of the gems that they be not lost" (§ 3). Childebert I., A.D. 531, is said by Gregory of Tours to have returned from an expedition into Spain, bringing with him, among other spoils, "sixty chalices, fifteen patens, twenty cases for the gospels (evangeliorum capsas), all adorned with pure gold and precious gems" (Hist. Franc. lib. iii. c. x.). The same writer tells us that one of the emperors of Rome caused to be made for the church at Lyons "a case for inclosing the holy gospels and a paten and chalice of pure gold and precious stones" (De Glor. Confess. cap. lxiii.). Gregory the Great gave to the king of the Lombards "a lectionary (lectionem) of the holy gospel inclosed in a Persian case (theca)" (Epp. lib. xii. Ep. vii. ad Theodol.) [W. E. S.]

GOSPELLER. [GOSPEL, § V. p. 742.]

GOSPELS, BOOK OF. [LITURGICAL BOOKS: GOSPEL, § IV. p. 742.]

GOSPELS IN ART. [See FOUR RIVERS, EVANGELISTS.] The sources of the four rivers, represented continually on the sarcophagi (Botтари, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xvi. and passim) have doubtless reference to the four gospels, as well as to the streams which watered the garden of Eden. See also the woodcut of the Lateran Cross s. v. CROSS.

Rolls of the gospels, or other sacred books are often represented on glasses and cups (Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. ii. viii. 1, xiv. 2). A case containing the gospels is represented in the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna (see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. I. lxvii.). They are generally rolls, sometimes with umbilici and capsae. In Buonarrotti, Frammenti di vasi antichi, tav. viii. 1, the rolls of the four gospels surround a representation of the miracle of the seven loaves, with probable reference to Matt. iv. 4, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

The portraits or symbolic representations of the Evangelists very commonly bear the gospels from the earliest date: indeed the symbol of four scrolls or books, placed in the four angles of a Greek cross, are asserted by Mrs. Jameson to be the earliest type of the Four Evangelists, and must certainly be among the earliest. In the baptistery at Ravenna (Ciampini, V. M. I. p. 234) there is a mosaic of the four gospels resting on four tables, each with its title. This dates from A.D. 451.

The figures of apostles, passim in ancient mediæval and modern art, bear rolls or volumes in their hands; but Martigny remarks very ingeniously and thoughtfully, that in the earliest examples of apostles the volume must be considered to be that of the Law and the Prophets, to which and to whom they referred all men in their preaching, even from the day of Pentecost. In one instance a picture at the bottom of a cup representing an adoration of the Magi (Buonarrotti ix. 3) the book of the gospels is placed near one of the three, in token of their being the first, with the shepherds, to bear the good tidings of the Saviour of Mankind.

A symbol of the gospel, and of the evangelists, of the highest antiquity (indeed, as Mr. Hemans thinks, of the Constantinian period) is the painting of four jewelled books at the juncture of the arms of a large cross, also jewelled, on the vault of a hall belonging to the Thermae of Trajan; consecrated for Christian worship by pope Sylvester in the time of Constantine, and still serving as a crypt-chapel below the church of SS. Martino e Silvestro on the Esquiline Hill.

GRACE AT MEALS. The Jews were wont to give thanks at table, one of the company saying the prayer "in the plural number, Let us bless, &c.," and the rest answering Amen (Beracoth cap. vii.; Lightfoot Horæ Hebr. in St. Matt. xv. 36). When our Lord was about to feed the multitudes He took the loaves and fishes, and "blessed" (St. Matt. xiv. 19; St. Mark vi. 41; St. Luke ix. 16) or "gave thanks" (St. Matt. xv. 36; St. Mark viii. 6; St. John vi. 11) before He distributed them. This was in accordance with the Jewish custom, which thus, with the sanction of our Lord's example, passed into His church. St. Chrysostom, commenting on Matt. xiv. 19-21, says that He then "taught us that we should not touch a table before giving thanks to Him who provides this food" (Hom. xlix.). In commenting on the account of the Last Supper, he refers to the "Grace" said after meat also:—"He gave thanks before distributing to the disciples, that we may give thanks too. He gave thanks and sang hymns after distributing, that we may do the same thing" (In St. Matt. xxvi. 30; Hom. lxxxvii.). That this was the general practice of the early Christians is proved by many testimonies. St. Paul, to whatever else he may allude beside, certainly recognizes it in 1 Tim. iv. 3-5. Meats, he there teaches, were "created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, both owns the principle, and vouches for the observance. "As it is meet that before taking food we bless the Maker of all these things, so also does it become us, when drinking, to sing psalms unto Him; forasmuch as we are partaking of His creatures" (Paedag. lib. ii. c. iv. § 44; see also § 77). Of the model Christian, he says, "His sacrifices are prayers and praises, and the reading of Scripture before the banqueting; psalms and hymns after it" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vii. § 49). Again: "Referring the reverent enjoyment of all things to God, he ever offers to the giver of all things the first-fruits of meat and drink and anointing oil, yielding thanks," &c. (Ibid. § 36). Tertullian, writing probably in 202: "We do not recline (at an entertainment) before prayer be first tasted . . . After water for the hands and lights, each, as he is able, is called out to sing to God from the Holy Scriptures, or from his own mind. In like manner prayer puts an end to the feast" (Liber Apol. adv. Gentes, c. xxxix.). St. Cyprian, writing in 246: "Nor let the banquetting hour be void of heavenly grace. Let the temperate entertainment resound with psalms, and do ye each undertake this wonted duty according to the strength of your memory or excellence of voice" (Ad Donat. sub fin.). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "Let prayers be said before taking food in meet acknowledgment of the gifts of God, both of those which He is now giving and of those which He has put in store for the future. Let prayers be said after food containing a return of thanks for the things given, and request for those promised" (Ep. ii. ad Greg. Naz. § 6). Sozomen, A.D. 440, says of the younger Theodosius, that he would eat nothing "before he had blessed the Creator of all things" (Hist. Eccles. Orat. ad Imp. libro i. praeftixa).

Examples remain of the early Graces, both of the East and West. E.g. the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vii. c. 49) furnish the following Εὐχὴ ἐν ἁρίστω, Prayer at the midday meal: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who feedest me from my youth up, who givest food to all flesh. Fill our hearts with joy and gladness; that always having a sufficiency we may abound unto every good work, in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom be glory and honour and power unto Thee, world without end, Amen" (Patres Apostol. Cotel. tom. i. p. 385). This prayer (slightly varied) is also given to be said after meals in the treatise De Virginitate ascribed (most improbably) to St. Athanasius. The writer first gives it and then proceeds as follows: "And when thou art seated at table and hast begun to break the bread, having thrice sealed it with the sign of the cross, thus give thanks, 'We give thanks unto Thee, our Father, for Thy holy resurrection [i. e. wrought and to be wrought in us, if the reading be correct]; for through Thy Son Jesus Christ hast Thou made it known unto us; and as this bread upon this table was in separate grains, and being gathered together became one thing, so let Thy church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom; for Thine is the power and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.' And this prayer thou oughtest to say when thou breakest bread and desirest to eat; but when thou dost set it on the table and sittest down, say Our Father all through. But the prayer above written (Blessed art Thou, O God [Lord, Const. Apost.]) we say after we have made our meal and have risen from table" (§§ 12, 13, inter Athanas. Opp.). A short paraphrase, as it appears, of an Eastern Grace at meals may also be seen in the anonymous commentary (probably of the sixth century) on the Book of Job printed with the works of Origen (lib. iii.).

The following examples from the Gelasian Sacramentary are probably the most ancient Graces of the Latin church now extant: Prayers before Meat. (1) "Refresh us, O Lord, with Thy gifts, and sustain us with the bounty of Thy riches; through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen." (2) "Let us be refreshed, O Lord, from Thy grants and gifts, and satiated with Thy blessing; through, &c." (3) "Protect us, O Lord our God, and afford needful sustenance to our frailty; through, &c." (4) "Bless, O Lord, Thy gifts, which of Thy bounty we are about to take; through, &c." (5) "O God, who dost always invite us to spiritual delights, give a blessing on Thy gifts; that we may attain to a sanctified reception of those things which are to be eaten in Thy name; through, &c." (6) "May Thy gifts, O Lord, refresh us, and Thy grace console us; through, &c." Prayers after Meals.—(1) "Satisfied, O Lord, with the gifts of Thy riches, we give Thee thanks for these things which we receive from Thy bounty, beseeching Thy mercy that that which was needful for our bodies may not be burdensome to our minds; through, &c." (2) "We have been satisfied, O Lord, with Thy grants and gifts. Replenish us with Thy mercy, Thou who art blessed; who with the Father and Holy Ghost livest and reignest God for ever and ever. Amen." Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vetus, tom. i. col. 745. Compare the Benedictio ad Mensam, and Benedictio post Mensam levitam in the Gallican Sacramentary of the 7th century found at Bobio (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 959).

GRACILIANUS. [FELICISSIMA.]

GRADO, COUNCIL OF (Gradense concilium), held A.D. 579 at Grado for the transfer thither of the see of Aquileia, supposing its acts genuine, but Istria was at this time out of communion with Rome for not accepting the 5th council, and the part assigned to Elias, bishop of Aquileia, throughout is suspicious. A legate from Rome at his instance exhibited a letter as from pope Pelagius II. to him authorising this change, which was accordingly confirmed. Then he requested that the definition of the 4th council might be recited, which was also done. In the subscriptions which follow his own comes first, after him that of the legate, nineteen bishops or their representatives follow, and last of all twelve presbyters in their own names. Mansi regards it as a forgery (ix. 927).

GRADUAL (Responsorium Graduale or Gradale; or simply Responsorium or Responsum; or Graduale. In mediaeval English Grayl spelt variously.)—I. This was an anthem sung after the epistle in most of the Latin churches. Originally, it seems that a whole psalm was sung, at least in Africa, as we gather from several allusions in the Sermons of St. Augustine. Thus in one he says, "To this belongs that which the apostolic lesson (Col. iii. 9) before the canticle of the psalm presignified, saying 'Put off, &c.'" (Serm. xxxii. c. iv.). "We have heard the apostle, we have heard the psalm, we have heard the gospel" (Serm. clxv. c. i.). Again:—"We have heard the first lesson of the apostle, 'This is a faithful saying, &c.' (1 Tim. i. 15) Then we sang a psalm, mutually exhorting one another, saying with one voice, one heart, 'O come, let us worship,' &c. (Ps. xciv. 6). After these the gospel lesson showed us the cleansing of the ten lepers" (Serm. clxxvi. c. i.). In his Retractions (lib. ii. c. xi.) St. Augustine speaks of a custom which began at Carthage in his time of "saying hymns at the altar from the Book of Psalms, either before the oblation or when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people." The hymn before the oblation has been understood by some to be the psalm before the gospel; but a hymn sung before the catechumens left would hardly have been called by so precise a writer as Augustine a hymn before the oblation. He must rather have meant the offertory which immediately preceded the offering of the elements. Nor was the Gradual sung at the altar, but, as we shall see, from the lector's ambo. We infer, therefore, that the psalm after the epistle was a custom of the church before the age of St. Augustine. Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495, tells us that Musaeus, a presbyter of that city, A.D. 458, at the request of his bishop, selected "from the Holy Scriptures lessons suitable to the feast-days of the whole year, and besides, responsory chapters of psalms adapted to the seasons and lessons" (De Viris Illust. c. lxxix.). Another witness is Gregory of Tours, who relates that on a certain occasion in the year 585, his deacon "who had said the responsory at the masses before day" was ordered by king Guntram to sing before him, and that afterwards all the priests present sang a responsory psalm, each with one of his clerks (Hist. Franc. L. viii. § iii.). The Antiphony ascribed to Gregory I. must have undergone changes down to the 11th or 12th century, if it was not originally compiled then. It contains Graduals (there called Responsories) for use throughout the year; but from our uncertainty about their age, we need only state the fact. It was printed by Pamelius (Liturgicon, tom. ii. p. 62), and by Thomasius at Rome in 1683. The earliest Ordo Romanus extant, which describes a pontifical mass of the 7th century, fully recognizes the use of the Gradual: "After he (the subdeacon) has read (the epistle) the cantor ascends [the steps of the ambo] with the cantatory, and says the Response" (§ 10; Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 9). Again: "With regard to the Gradual Responsory, it is [in Lent] sung to the end by him who begins it, and the verse in like manner" (§ 26, p. 18). Compare Ordo ii. § 7. Amalarius (Prol. in Lib. de Ord. Antiph. Hittorp. col. 504) explains the term 'cantatory.' "That which we call the Gradual (Gradale) they (the Romans), call Cantatorium; which in some churches among them is still, according to the old custom, comprised in one volume." It was, in fact, a book containing all the Graduals for the year.

II. Strictly only the first verse of the anthem was called the Gradual. The rest was technically called the "verse." The mode of singing it was not everywhere the same; but Amalarius describes at some length how this was done at Rome, whence, he assures us (De Eccles. Off. L. iii. c. 11; De Ord. Ant. u.s.), the Gradual was derived to other churches:—"The precentor in the first row sings the Responsory to the end. The succentors respond (i.e. sing the Responsory) in like manner. The precentor then sings the verse. The verse being ended, the succentors a second time begin the Responsory from the first word, and continue it to the end. Then the precentor sings, 'Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost.' This being ended, the succentors take up the Responsory about the middle, and continue it to the end. Lastly the precentor begins the Responsory from the first word and continues it to the end. Which being over the succentors for the third time repeat the Responsory from the beginning and continue it to the end." Amalarius also tells us that "the Gloria was not sung with Responsories from the first" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 18); from which we infer with probability that they were in use before that doxology was composed.

III. The mode of singing adopted for the Gradual, in which one sang alone for a while and many responded was probably in use from the very infancy of the church. In the Apostolical Constitutions the apostles are made to direct that at the celebration of the holy eucharist one of the deacons shall "chant the hymns of David, and the people subchant the ends of the verses" (L. ii. c. lvii.). When St. Athanasius (A.D. 356) found his church surrounded by more than 5000 soldiers, and a violent crowd of Arians, he placed himself on his throne and "directed the deacon to read a psalm, and the people to respond, 'For His mercy endureth for ever'" (Apol. de Fugâ suâ, § 24). Eusebius, too, citing Philo's account of certain "Ascetæ" in Egypt, among other of their customs which he declares to belong to the Christians, mentions that one would "chant a psalm in measured strains, the rest listening in silence, but singing the last parts of the hymns together" (Euseb. Hist. L. II. c. xvii.). Whether those ascetics were Jews or Christians the narrative of Philo shows that the practice must have been known to the Jewish converts of the 1st century, and may even then have been adopted by them.

IV. From Easter Eve to the Saturday in Whitsun week inclusively the Gradual was followed, and at last supplanted by the Alleluia. This had been long known in the West and used, though not prescribed, on public occasions of religious joy. At Rome it was only sung on Easter day, as Sozomen informs us (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. cap. xix.), and his statement is copied by Cassiodorus (Hist. Eccl. Tripart. L. xiii. c. xxxix.), who lived at Rome, A.D. 514. Their authority, however, can only prove the fact for an age before their own; for Gregory I. affirms that it was introduced at Rome in masses by St. Jerome (who had learnt it at Jerusalem) in the time of Damasus, A.D. 384 (Epist. lib. vii.; Lp. lxxv.). This, of course, refers to its use between Easter and Pentecost; as Gregory himself extended it "beyond the time of Pentecost" (ibid.). In the Antiphony ascribed to him it is only omitted between Septuagesima Sunday and Easter (Pamel. Liturg. tom. ii. pp. 81-110). Amalarius (u.s. cap. 13) speaks of it as "sung on feast days."

V. The Tract was another anthem sometimes sung after the epistle. Originally it was always from the Book of Psalms; and like the Gradual was a remnant and evidence of their early use in celebrations as a part of Holy Scripture. The Tract and Gradual differed at first, in all probability, only in being sung differently; or in other words the Tract was nothing more than the Gradual as it was chanted in seasons of humiliation. It is for this reason that we treat of them together. Very soon, however, a Tract was often sung after the Gradual; or, as it would, we presume, be then viewed, a third verse was added to the anthem, which was sung tractim; i. e. continuously by the cantor without any assistance from the choir. Although the language is obscure, we may perhaps infer that they were sometimes sung together under the first Ordo Romanus. "If it shall be the time for the Alleluia to be said, well; but if for the Tract, well again; but if not let the response (Gradual) only be sung" (§ 10). The Tract is never used without a responsory in the so-called Gregorian Antiphony. Though properly penitential (Amalarius De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 3), the Tract was not always of a mournful character. "Sometimes," says Amalarius, "the Tract expresses tribulation, sometimes joy" (Ibid. lib. iii. c. 13). It was sung from the same place as the Gradual (Ord. Rom. I. § 10; II. § 7), and at first by the same cantor (Ord. I. § 7); but later on by another (Ord. III. § 9). The origin of the name, from cantus tractus, a sustained unbroken chant, appears certain. Honorius of Autun, A.D. 1130, is the earliest extant authority for it (Gemma Animae, lib. i. c. 96); but it is approved by all the best ritualists.

The mode of chanting the Tract was probably borrowed from the early monks, who sang the psalms by turns, one at a time. Thus Cassian, A.D. 424, "One rises to sing psalms unto the Lord before the company" (De Coenob. Instit. lib. ii. c. v.). "They divide the aforesaid number of twelve psalms in such a manner that if two brethren be present, they sing six each; if three, four; if four, three" (Ibid. c. xi.; see also c. xii.). St. Jerome has an allusion to it when, writing to a monk (Ep. xiv. ad Rustic. Mon.), he reminds him of the obligation to rise before sleep would naturally leave him and "say a psalm in his turn."

VI. The Gradual and Tract were sung from the same step of the ambo from which the epistle was read. According to the second Ordo Romanus (§ 7), the Epistoler "went up on to the ambo to read, but not on to its upper step (or stage, graduum), which only he who read the gospel was wont to ascend. After he had read the cantor ascended with the cantorium (=cantatorium) . . . not to a higher place; but he stood in the same place as the reader." It was for this reason that the anthem was called Gradual: it was the chant from the step of the ambo. This explanation of the term is given by Rabanus Maurus, A.D. 847, and is accepted by Bona, Le Brun, Gerbert, Martene, and perhaps all the great writers on ritual.

VII. The fact that the Gradual and Tract were both sung from the lesson desk, and that by a single cantor, detached thither, like the readers, from the choir, seems to indicate their common origin in that extended use of the Book of Psalms with the rest of Holy Scripture which we know to have prevailed during the first ages. Both arrangements were appropriate and natural if the psalms were said in some sort as a lesson; but inappropriate as well as inconvenient for a mere anthem. The sense of this at length led to the Gradual being sung by the cantor in his usual place. Amalarius, indeed, exhibits the cantor as a teacher and preacher no less than those who read the other Scriptures. "By the office of the cantor we may understand that of a prophet . . . By the responsory we may understand the preaching of the New Testament . . . The cantor discharges the functions of a faithful preacher,"

&c. (De Eccl. Off. l. iii. cap. 11). This was, we presume, the traditional view. It is suggested by St. Augustine's manner of referring (see above) to the psalms which in his day formed part of the eucharistic service in Roman Africa, as well as to the epistles and gospels. The same thought underlies the mystical comment of Pseudo-Dionysius. The psalms sung, according to him, put the soul into harmony with things divine, and then those things which have been mystically shadowed forth in them are plainly and fully taught in the lessons from the other parts of Holy writ (De Eccl. Hier. c. iii. n. iii. § 5). Psalms are to this day sung before the gospel in the Coptic rite (Renaud. tom. i. pp. 7, 210). In the Armenian "a suitable psalm is recited" immediately before the first eucharistic lesson (the prophecy) is read (Le Brun, Diss. x. art. xiv.). In the Milanese a Psalmellus (Pamellii Liturgicon, tom. i. p. 295), and in the Mozarabic an anthem headed Psallendo (Leslie, Miss. Moz. pp. 1, 222), in Lent a Tractus (ibid. pp. 98, 101, &c.) is sung between the prophecy and the epistle. In these psalms or anthems we find the evident remains, akin to the Roman Gradual and Tract, of the psalmody which accompanied the reading of the other Scriptures in the primitive church. There was also, we may mention in conclusion, a substitute for it left in the Old Gallican liturgy in the Hymn of Zacharias, often called the prophecy, which was sung before the Old Testament Lesson (S. Germani Expos. Brev. in Martene De Ant. Eccl. Rit. l. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. i.; Mabill. Liturg. Gall. l. ii. pp. 251, 322, &c.), and in the Song of the Three Children (Germanus, u. s.; Mabill. ibid. p. 107) which was sung between the epistle and gospel. [W. E. S.]

GRANATARIUS, in a monastery, one of the four deputies or assistants of the house-steward ("suffraganei cellerario," quaintly styled "solatium cellerarii" in the old Benedictine rule), the receiver of the yearly corn-harvest of the monastery, and keeper of the granary (Mart. Reg. Bened. Comm. c. 31) and of the farm stock (Isidor. Reg. c. 19). In some monasteries his office was to provide all household necessities (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v.). The word is also spelt "granarius" or "granetarius." [I. G. S.]

GREETING-HOUSE, a reception-room (ἀσπαστικός οἶκος, receptorium, saluatorium, salle d'entrée, parloir) next to the proaula or proaulium (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v. saluatorium). In the narrative of the famous interview between Ambrose and Theodosius, the bishop is described as sitting in his reception-room before going to the church (Theodoret, Ecc. Hist. v. 18), and Gregory the Great speaks of a bishop as proceeding from his reception-room to church (Greg. M. Ep. iv. 54). Bingham corrects the opinion of Scaliger that the place spoken of by Theodoret was a part of the bishop's palace used for entertaining strangers, and pronounces it "a place adjoining the church" ("exedra ecclesiae adjuncta," Ducange, v. s.) for the bishop "to receive the salutations of the people" coming for his "blessing," or on "business" (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. viii. vii. 8; cf. Vales. Annotat. in Theodoret. l. c.). It is recorded of St. Martin of Tours that he sat on a three-legged stool in a room of this kind, in preference to using the bishop's throne which was there (Sulp. Sev. Vit. S. Mart.); and that on his visitations he spent night and day in this room (Sulp. Sev. Ep. 1). In this "salutatorium" the rule of the convent was read over to candidates for admission (Reg. Aurel. ad Virgines, c. 1). The nuns, and even the abbess, were forbidden to see any stranger here alone (Reg. Donat. ad Virg. c. 57; Reg. Caesarii ad Virg. c. 35); and by the council of Macon, A.D. 581, bishops, priests, and deacons, as well as laymen, were prohibited from entering the reception-room of a nunnery, Jews especially being excluded (Conc. Matiscon. c. 2).^a On the same principle, women, even nuns, were excluded from the bishop's "salutatorium" (Ducange, s. v.). In a Benedictine monastery this chamber was usually on the east side of the quadrangle, between the chapter-house and the south transept of the church (Whitaker's Hist. of Whalley, p. 124, 4th ed. 1874).

A room of this kind was used, according to Mabillon, for robing, for hearing causes, for synods, for keeping relics in, and sometimes for temporary residence (Mabill. Ann. Bened. Saec. iv. i. p. 370, cited by Ducange Gloss. Lat. v. s.; cf. Sulp. Sev. Ep. i.). According to Menard, there was a similar room for the use of the priests (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. v. 25; cf. Sulp. Sev. Dial. II. i.).

This receiving-room, or audience-chamber, seems identical with the "sacrarium," or vestry, where the vessels for use in church were kept (Ducange Gloss. Lat. s. v.) See DIACONICUM, GAZOPHYLACIUM. [I. G. S.]

GRIFFIN. See "Cherub" in DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, vol. i. pp. 300 sqq.; and Ruskin's Modern Painters, vol. iii. p. 112.

The connexion between the various symbolisms of Cherub and Griffin in Biblical and Northern tradition is strengthened by the etymological resemblance of the words. There is certainly a great likeness between the names grûn (with s affirmative) and גריף. Both are titles of the most ancient existing symbols of Divine omnipotence and omniscience; as it cannot be doubted that the sphinxes of Egypt and winged bulls or lions of Assyria conveyed kindred ideas to the hieratic, or indeed the popular mind. It would seem that all the chief races of men have been taught to set forth such mysterious forms; as this composite idea is so nearly universal. Some figure of this kind must have been the popular shape of the cherub or gryps known to the children of Israel; and the fact that it was a permitted and prescribed image, taken together with the command to make the brazen serpent, forms a very large portion of the substructure of iconodulist arguments. See Johannes Damascenus De Imaginibus, Orat. ii. Such instances of griffin forms as appear in the earliest Christian decoration seem to the writer to be in all probability merely ornamental; as, in fact, unmeaning adaptations of Gentile patterns. See, however, Guénébault, Dictionnaire Iconographique, s. v. "Griffon." The use of the symbolic griffin by the Lombard race, however, dates from well within our period; though the great Veronese works so frequently mentioned by Professor Ruskin are probably as late as the 11th century. Those of the duomo of Verona and the church of San Zenone deserve especial mention.

That the griffin is the Gothic-Christian representation of the cherub, the "Mighty one," or the "Carved Image" of Hebrew sculpture, seems highly probable, further, from the following connexion of ideas in different ages.

The glorified forms of living creatures and of wheels in the great opening vision of Ezekiel have necessarily been always connected with those of the Zōa, the Beasts of the Apocalypse [See EVANGELISTS, p. 633]. The latter, as representing the writers of the four gospels, are an universal symbol after the 5th century. It did not escape the eye of Professor Ruskin that the marble wheel by the side of his Veronese griffin is an indisputable reference on the part of the unknown Lombard artist to the first chapter of Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 21): "When those (Living Creatures) went, these went: and when those stood, these stood, and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the Living Creatures was in the wheels." And this is fully confirmed (were that necessary) by Dr. Hayman's researches in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. But the wheels appear in a more ancient work by a great and mystical genius whose name and date alone remain to us, the monk Rabula, scribe and illustrator of the great Florentine MS., A.D. 586 (See Assemani's Catalogue of the Laurentian Library). A woodcut of this is given in this work, p. 85. It represents the Ascension; our Lord is borne up by two ministering angels on a chariot of cloud, under which appear the heads of the Four Creatures; the flaming wheels are on each side, with two other angels, who are apparently receiving His garments, the vesture of His flesh. The sun and moon are in the upper corners of the picture; which is one of the most important works in Christian art as a specimen of imaginative symbolism of the highest character, and also as a graphic illustration of the connexion between Hebrew and Christian vision, or Apocalypse of the Unseen. And to this the Veronese griffin and its wheel, and the whole Christian usage of that composite form as a symbol, really refers. "The winged shape becomes one of the acknowledged symbols of Divine power: and in its unity of lion and eagle, the workman of the middle ages always meant to set forth the unity of the human and Divine natures. In this unity it bears up the pillars of the church, set for ever as the corner stone."

In its merely ornamental use it is derived simply from Heathen or Gentile art and literature. [R. St. J. T.]

GROTESQUE. We have the authority of Prof. Mommsen for assigning the word κρύπτω as the original derivation of this adjective, formed, probably, immediately from grot or grotto, a cavern or subterranean recess, and therefore connected in its use, as a word of Renaissance origin, with ideas of Pan, the Satyrs, and other cavern-haunting figures, combining noble with ignoble form. The very numerous and various meanings of the word all point to the idea of novel contrast; either between the noble and ignoble, or less noble, or of the beautiful with the less beautiful. In Christian art, moreover, both of earlier and later date, a large number of works may be called grotesque in the general or popular sense of the word, because they are very singular in their appearance. This may arise in one or in two ways, or be caused by one or both of two conditions: either by the difficulty of the subject, or the archaic style of the workmen, or by a mixture of originality of mind and imperfect skill in craft. Many heathen grotesques of the earlier empire, as those of Pompeii, the Baths of Hadrian, and the newly-discovered frescoes of the Doria Pamphili Villa (see Parker, Antiquities of Rome, and appendix by the present writer) are extremely beautiful and perfect in workmanship, and come under the first or second classes mentioned, where the less pleasing form is contrasted with the more beautiful; this is the principle also of much cinque-cento grotesque. Early Christian work of this kind is not unfrequent in the catacombs, as in the "Seasons" of the catacombs of SS. Domitilla and Nereus, in many of the mosaic ornaments of St. Constantia and the other Græco-Roman churches. The employment of actual ugliness for surprise or contrast seems to be a characteristic of the art of the Northern races, found in Italy only in the earlier work of the Lombard race, and then always distinguishable in its manner from that of the French or Germans. Excepting the carvings of St. Ambrogio at Milan, and the churches of St. Michele at Pavia and Lucca, this species of grotesque is not part of our period; but the most characteristic and important of all these buildings, St. Zenone at Verona, cannot be altogether omitted. It seems as well to classify the various meanings of the Grotesque as follows, according to the examples found in various places and periods.

1. Grotesque, where more elaborate or serious representations are contrasted with easier and less important work by the same hand, as in ornamental borders round pictures, fillings-up of vaultings or surfaces round figures, &c. This embraces all the earlier grotesque of ornament, as in the frescoes of Hadrian's villa, or the Doria Pamphili columbarium.

2. Grotesque where the importance of the subject, and the workman's real interest in it, are for a time played with; he being led to do so by the natural exuberance of his fancy, by temporary fatigue of mind, or other causes—this includes the Lombard work.

3. Grotesque where either the imperfection of the workman's hand, or the inexpressible nature of his subject, render his work extraordinary in appearance, and obviously imperfect and unequal. This applies to the productions of all times and places where thoughtful and energetic men have laboured. Among its greatest and most characteristic examples are the Triumph of Death by Orgagna at Pisa, and the Last Judgment of Torcello; its most quaint and absurd appearance may be in the strange Ostrogothic mosaic in the sacristy of St. Giovanni Evangelista at Ravenna; or see Count Bastard's Peintures des MSS. passim; but this description of grotesqueness applies to almost all the Byzantine apses and arches of triumph where the spiritual world is depicted, and indeed to all Byzantine work in as far as it attempts naturalist representation, unless it be in the single pictures of birds, found in MSS., and occasionally in mosaic, as at St. Vitale at Ravenna.

Few of the works of the catacombs have any pretence to beauty. The birds and vine ornament of the tomb of Domitilla (perhaps the earliest Christian sepulchre, which is known by dated bricks to be certainly not later than Hadrian, and is very probably the actual grave of a granddaughter of Vespasian) are of the same date as the tomb, which is anterior to the catacomb. These, with some remains of the paintings in the catacomb, and the 2nd century paintings of the catacomb of St. Prætextatus, are beautiful examples of playful naturalistic ornament, probably the work of heathen hands, under Christian direction, and taken in the Christian sense. They are mentioned here, rather as parallel works to the beautiful secular-Roman grotesques, than as true grotesques themselves. They are symbolic in the strict sense (see J. H. Parker's Photographs and Antiquities of Rome, and art. 'SYMBOLISM' in this Dictionary).

The grotesqueness of the early mosaics is of the same nature as that of the forms and figures in the best glass-painting. In both, the advantages of light and shade, correct drawing and perspective, are sacrificed entirely to colour and graphic force of impression. To express the plainest meaning in the brightest and most gem-like colour is the whole object of the artist. Of course in the works from the 5th to the 8th century, down to the bathos of Graeco-Roman art, the rigid strangeness of the mosaics may have much to do with the incapacity of the workmen. Nevertheless the gift of colour is seldom wanting; and this, together with the painful asceticism of faces and forms in these works, points to an Eastern element in the minds and education of these artists. The great Medici MS. of Rabula is perhaps the central example of the genius and originality of design and graphic power, possessed by some of the unknown ascetics of Syria and the East. The mosaic of the Transfiguration at Mount Sinai, of the age of Justinian and many of those in Rome, as the apses of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, of St. Venantius, and above all St. Prassede, are instances giving evidence of necessarily imperfect treatment of a transcendent subject. Those of Ravenna have been already mentioned; but their workmanship greatly excels that of the Roman mosaics, and their quaintness strikes one less than their beauty.

The Lombard invasion of Italy dates 568 A.D., and it is in the earliest work of this extraordinary race that the Christian grotesque, properly speaking, may be said to arise. The best account of some of its examples, in Pavia, Lucca and Verona, is to be found in Appendix 8 of Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. i. p. 360-65, accompanied by excellent descriptive plates, and comparisons between the Lombard subjects and workmanship in St. Michele and St. Zenone, and the Byzantine masonry and carvings of St. Mark's at Venice. Invention and restless energy are the characteristics of the new and strong barbarian race; graceful conventionalism and exact workmanship, with innate but somewhat languid sense of beauty, belong to the Greek workmen. Neither of them can ever be undervalued by any one who is interested in the bearings of art on history; for there can be no doubt, that as the Lombard churches are the first outbreak of the inventive and graphic spirit which grew into the great Pisan and Florentine schools of painting and sculpture, so the Romano-Greek or Eastern influence, generally called Byzantine, extended over all the Christian world of the early mediæval ages. To trace the Christian grotesque northward and westward through early MSS., bas-reliefs, and church decoration would be to write a history of Christian art in the dark ages. One of the first accomplishments of the denizens of a convent would of course be calligraphy, and to multiply Evangelia and missals was a part even of the earliest missionary work.

On the edge of every wave of progress made by the Faith, the convents arose first of all things, and the monks at once employed themselves on copies of the Holy Scriptures. Now it cannot be doubted, that a Schola Graeca, a regular set of artists working according to Greek traditions of subject and treatment in art, existed in Rome from the 6th century, if not before, and received a great accession of strength in the 8th during the Iconoclastic struggle in Constantinople, when many ecclesiastical artists must have withdrawn thence to Rome. There in fact, as elsewhere, the first faint revival of Christian art took place entirely in churches and convents, and under what are called Byzantine forms. Whether Byzantinism be considered as the last embers of Graeco-Roman art, kept alive by Christianity for the Northern races, or as the first sparks of a new light feebly struggling for existence through all the centuries from the 6th to the 11th, there is no doubt that the characteristics of Byzantinism

—many of them characteristics of weakness, no doubt—prevailed in Christian ornamental work of all kinds, and were grotesque in all the senses of the word. The beautifully illustrated works of Prof. Westwood on Saxon, Irish and Northern MSS. in particular, are of the highest value in this connection, and are in fact almost the only works generally accessible in this country, which illustrate the connection between the Eastern and English churches through the Irish, by way of Iona and Lindisfarne (see MINIATURE).

ture carving within the limits of our period, and the art of photography is now bringing the remains of the ancient Lombard churches within reach of most persons interested in them. Descriptions fail in great measure without illustration, and few pictures or drawings are really trustworthy for details of ornamental work (see Stones of Venice, App. vol. i. ubi sup.). Mr. Ruskin has secured many valuable records by his own pencil and those of his trusted workmen. Didron's Annales Archéologiques contain much excellent illustration; and a parallel work of equal value is still, we believe, carried on in Germany, called the Jahrbuch des Vereins von Alterthums-freunden in Rheinlande. tioned, are of great value to the historical student of art or of archaeology. The Northern Teutonic grotesque of actual sport of mind, ultra-naturalism, and caricature extends far beyond the limits of our period. But the term grotesque is generally applied to so many things within it, that some early specimens of Gothic humour seem necessary for the purposes of this Dictionary; and three selections from Count Bastard's work are accordingly given. No. 1 is a Merovingian initial letter; No. 2 Carolingian of the 8th century; and No. 3 is the initial portrait of a monk-physician in a lettres-à-jour MS. of the 8th century of the medical works of Orbases, Alexander of Tralles, and Dioscorides. All will be found in colour in Count Bastard's first volume, with innumerable others. [R. St. J. T.]

GUARDIANS. The duties and liabilities of guardians as defined by the old Roman laws, were but slightly affected by the Christian religion [See Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq. s. v. Tutor].

The principal church regulation, which concerned them, arose from the generally admitted maxim, that the clergy ought not to be entangled in secular affairs. Hence a guardian was not allowed to be ordained to any ecclesiastical function, until after the expiration of his guardianship. (Concil. Carthag. I. c. 9, A.D. 348.) For the same reason none of the clergy were allowed to be appointed guardians; and those who nominated any of them to such an office were liable to church censures. Thus Cyprian mentions the case of a person named Geminus Victor, who having by his will appointed a presbyter as guardian to his children, had his name struck out of the DIPTYCHS, so that no prayer or oblation should be offered for him. (Cyprian Ep. 66, ad Clerum Furnit.)

Under the old Roman law a guardian was forbidden to marry his ward, or to give her in marriage to his son, except by special license from the emperor (Cod. Justin. v. 6).

But Constantine altered this restriction, so far as to allow such marriages, provided that the ward was of age, and that her guardian had offered her no injury in her minority, in which case he was to be banished and his goods confiscated. (Cod. Theod. ix. 8). [G. A. J.]

GYNAECONITIS. [GALLERIES.]

GYROVAGI, vagabond monks, reprobated by monastic writers. Benedict, in the very commencement of his rule, excludes them from consideration, as unworthy of the name of monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1). He pronounces them worse even than the "sarabaitae," or "remoboth" (Hieron. Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 34), who, though living together by twos and threes, without rule or discipline, at any rate were stationary, and built themselves cells; whereas the "gyrovagi" were always roving from one monastery to another. After staying three or four days in one monastery, they would start again for another; for after a few days' rest it was usual for strangers to be subjected to the discipline of the monastery, to the same fare, labour, &c., as the inmates (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc. cit.); always endeavouring to ascertain where in the neighbourhood they would be most likely to find comfortable quarters (Reg. Magist. c. 2; cf. Isidor. Pelus. I. Ep. 41, Joann. Climac. Scal. Grad. 27). Martene (v. s.) and Ménard (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. iii. ii.) identify these "gyrovagi" with the "circumcelliones," or "circelliones." [V. CIRCUMCELLIONES.] They were of importance enough to be condemned in one of the canons of the Trullan council, A.D. 691, and are there described as wandering about in black robes and with unshorn hair: they are to be chased away into the desert, unless they will consent to enter a monastery, to have their hair trimmed, and in other ways to submit to discipline (Conc. Quinisextum c. 42). Bingham (Origin. Eccles. vii. ii. 12) and Hospinian (de Orig. Monach. ii. i.) merely repeat what is contained in the rule of Benedict. [I. G. S.]

HABIT, THE MONASTIC. (Habitus monasticus, σχῆμα μοναδικόν or μοναχικόν). A distinctive uniform was no part of monachism originally. Only it was required of monks that their dress and general appearance should indicate "gravity and a contempt of the world" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. vii. iii. 6). Hair worn long was an effeminacy (August. de Op. Mon. c. 31. Hieron. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Epiph. adv. Haeres. lxxx. 7), the head shaven all over was too like the priests of Isis (Hieron. Comm. in Ezek. c. 44. Ambros. Ep. 58 ad Sabin.). In popular estimation persons abstaining from the use of silken apparel were often called monks (Hieron. Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). The same writer defines the dress of a monk merely as "cheap and shabby" (Ep. 4 ad Rustic., Ep. 13 ad Paulin.). And the dress of a nun as "sombre" in tint, and "coarse" in texture (Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). He warns the enthusiasts of asceticism against the eccentricity in dress, which was sometimes a mere pretence of austerity, a long untrimmed beard, bare feet, a black cloak, chains on the wrists (Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Pallad. Hist. Lavs. c. 52). So Cassian protests against monks wearing wooden crosses on their shoulders (Coll. viii. 3). Hair closely cut, and the cloak (pallium), usually worn by Greek philosophers and lecturers, were at first badges of a monk in Western Christendom; but even these were not peculiar to him. The cloak was often worn by other Christians, exposing them to the vulgar reproach of being "Greeks" and "impostors" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. i. ii. 4), and any one appearing in public with pale face, short hair, and a cloak, was liable to be hooted and jeered at by the unbelieving populace as a monk (Salv. de Gubernat. viii. 4).

Cassian is more precise on a monk's costume, and devotes to it the first book of his Institutes. But he allows that the sort of dress suitable for a monk in Egypt or Ethiopia may be very unsuitable elsewhere, and he condemns sack-cloth, or rather, a stuff made of goats' hair or camels' hair (cilicina vestis) worn outside as too conspicuous. He speaks in detail of the various parts of a monk's dress; the HOOD (cucullus), which is to remind the monk to be as a little child in simplicity; the sleeveless tunic (COLOBIUM), in Egypt made of linen, which reminds him of self-mortification; the GIRDLE or waist-band (cingulum), to remind him to have his "loins girded" as a "good soldier of Christ;" the cape over the shoulders (mafors, palliolum); the sheepskin or goatskin round the waist and thighs (melotes, pera, penula); and for the feet the sandals (CALIGAE), only to be worn as an occasional luxury, never during the divine service (Cassian Instit. i. cc. 1-10 cf. Rudin. Hist. Mon. c. 3).

questions of colour and material, as indifferent, to be decided by climate and other circumstances. He lays down the general principle, that there are to be no superfluities, adding, that a tunic and hood, or, for outdoor work, a sort of cape to protect the shoulders (scapulare), instead of the hood, ought to suffice generally; two suits of each being allowed for each monk, and some suits of rather better quality being kept for monks on their peregrinations. The worn out articles of dress are to be restored to the keeper of the wardrobe, for the poor. Benedict, however, "to avoid disputes" appends a short list, corresponding very nearly to Cassian's, of things necessary for a monk, all which are to be supplied to the brethren, at the discretion of the abbat, and none of them to be the property or "peculiare" of any one. The only addition to the Egyptian costume is that of socks (pedules) for the winter; the Benedictine "bracile" apparently corresponding with "cingulum," and the "scapulare" with "palliolum." Benedict allows trowsers [FEMORALIA] on a journey, and on some other occasions; underclothing he is silent about; consequently commentators and the usages of particular monasteries differ on this point. To the list of clothing Benedict adds, as part of a monk's equipment, a knife (cultellus) a pen (graphium), a needle (acus) a handkerchief or handcloth (mappula), and tablets for writing on (tabulae). He specifies also as necessities for the night, a mattress (matta), a coverlet (sagum), a blanket (laena), and a pillow (capitale) (Bened. Reg. c. 55). Martene quotes Hildemar for the traditional custom, by which each monk was provided with a small jar of soap for himself and of grease for his shoes (Reg. Bened. Comment. ad loc.).

Laxity of monastic discipline soon began to provoke fresh enactments about dress, sometimes more stringent and more minute than at first (e.g. Reg. Isidor. c. 14, Reg. Moy. c. 81). Councils re-enact, and reformers protest. The council of Agde, A.D. 506, and the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, repeat the canon of the 4th council of Carthage A.D. 398, "ne clerici coman nutrant" (Conc. Agath. c. 20; Conc. iv. Toletan. c. 40; Conc. iv. Carthag. c. 44). Ferreolus, in southern Gaul, A.D. 558, repeats the old edict against superfluities, and forbids his monks to use perfumes, or wear linen next the skin (Ferreol. Reg. cc. 14, 31, 32). In Spain, Fructuosus of Braga, A.D. 656, insists on uniformity of apparel. Irregularity about dress seems with monks, as in a regiment, to have been an accompaniment of demoralisation. (See, further, Menard Conc. Rept. lxii.; Altesserr. Ascetism. v.; Middendorp. Origin. Ascet. Sylva. xiii.)

The Greek Euchologion gives an office for the assumption of the ordinary habit of a monk (ἀκολουθία τοῦ μικροῦ σχήματος), and another for assuming the greater or "angelic" habit distinctive of those ascetics who were thought to have attained the perfection of monastic life (ἀκ. τοῦ μεγάλου καὶ ἀγγελικοῦ σχήματος). HAGIOSIDERON. One of the substitutes for BELLS still used in the East is the Hagiosideron (ἁγίοςιδερον, κρούσμα) [see SEMANTRON]. These usually consist of an iron plate, curved like the tire of a wheel, which is struck with a hammer, and produces a sound not unlike that of a gong. They are occasionally made of brass. The illustration is taken from Dr. Neale's work (Neale's Eastern Church, Int. 217, 225; Daniel's Code Lit. iv. 199). [C.]

HAIL MARY or AVE MARIA. An address and prayer commonly made to St. Mary the Virgin in the unreformed Western churches.

What it is, and when used.—It consists of two parts: 1. The words used by the angel Gabriel in saluting St. Mary, as rendered by the Vulgate, slightly altered by the addition of St. Mary's name, "Hail Mary, full of grace; the Lord is with thee;" followed by the words of Elizabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." 2. A prayer, subsequently added to the salutation, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and at the hour of our death."

This formula is ordered by the breviary of pope Pius V. to be used daily, after the recitation of compline, and before the recitation of each of the other canonical hours, i.e., matins, prime, terce, sext, nones, and vespers. It is also commanded, on the same authority, to be used before the recitation of the "Office of the Blessed Virgin," and before each of the hours in the "Little Office." It is also used nine times every day in what is called the "Angelus." It is also used sixty-three times in the devotion called the "Crown of the Virgin," and one hundred and fifty times in the "Rosary of the Virgin." It also occurs in many of the public offices, and is used before sermons, and it most commonly forms a part of the special devotions appointed by bishops for obtaining indulgences.

Its date.—Cardinal Baronius and Cardinal Bona have used an expression which, while not committing them to a declaration of fact, or a statement of their own belief, has yet led subsequent writers (see Gaume, loc. inf. cit.) to claim their authority for the assertion, that the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria was adopted in, or immediately after, the council of Ephesus, at the beginning of the 5th century. "At that time," says Baronius (loc. inf. cit.), "the angelical salutation is believed to have received that addition, 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' which came to be constantly repeated by the faithful." "The angelical salutation," says Bona (loc. inf. cit.), "is believed to have received this addition in the great council of Ephesus." It is quite certain that the two cardinals and their followers have ante-dated this part of the Ave Maria by more than a thousand years. The first, or Scriptural, part, consisting of the words of the angel and of Elizabeth, is older by some five hundred years than the second, or precatory, part, which has been attached to it, and the first part did not become used as a formula until the end of the 11th century. The earliest injunction authorising its being taught together with the previously existing formulas of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, is found in the Constitutions of Odo, who became bishop of Paris in the year 1196. The Benedictines of St. Stephen of Caer, in 1706, maintained the following thesis: "The angelical salutation began to be in use in the 12th century, but these words 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' seem to have been added a long time afterwards, in the 16th century:" a thesis which was denounced by the then bishop of Bayeux as scandalous, but was defended and maintained against him by Père Massuet. The earliest known use of the first, or scriptural, part, is in the Liber Antiphoniarum, attributed by John the Deacon to St. Gregory the Great, and generally published with his works. If St. Gregory is the author of the Liber Antiphoniarum, and if the antiphon in which these words occur (p. 657, Ed. inf. cit.) is not a later insertion (the same words in the previous page are undoubtedly a modern insertion), the angelical salutation, as found in the Bible, was used as early as the beginning of the 7th century; not, however, as a formula of devotion, but as we might use an anthem on one day of the year. This passage from St. Gregory is the only thing which brings the Ave Maria within the chronological limits assigned to this Dictionary, for it is allowed (see Mabillon, loc. inf. cit.) that similar words in the so-called liturgy of St. James the Less are of late introduction there.

The addition of the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria, is stated by Pelbertus to have been made in consequence of a direct injunction of St. Mary, who appeared to a pious woman, and gave her instructions to that effect. The use of it sprang up in the 15th century, and is first authorised in pope Pius Vth's breviary, in the year 1568.

The "Crown of the Virgin" consists of sixty-three recitations of the Ave Maria, one for each year that St. Mary was supposed to have lived, with the recitation of the Lord's Prayer after every tenth Ave Maria. Its institution is attributed by some to Peter the Hermit. It appears to have sprung up and spread in the 12th and 13th centuries.

The "Rosary, or Psalter of the Blessed Virgin" consists of one hundred and fifty Ave Marias, after the number of the Psalms of David, together with fifteen Pater Nosters, distributed at equal intervals among the Ave Marias. Its institution is attributed by some to St. Dominic, and to the year 1210.

The "Angelus" consists of three recitations of the Ave Maria at the sound of the Angelus bell in the morning, three at midday, and three at night. On each occasion the first Ave Maria is to be preceded by the sentence, "The angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Ghost;" the second, by "Behold the handmaid of the Lord. Be it unto me according unto thy word;" the third, by "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." The Angelus appears to have been originated in the year 1287, by Buonvicino da Riva, of Milan, of the order of the Humiliati, who began the practice of ringing a bell at the recitation of the Ave Maria. In 1318 John XXII. gave an indulgence of ten days for saying an Ave Maria to the sound of a bell rung at night. In 1458, Calixtus III. gave three years and one hundred and twenty days' indulgence for reciting the Ave Maria and the Pater Noster three times a day. In 1518, Leo X. ordered that the Angelus bell should be rung three times a day, and he gave 500 days' indulgence for saying the Angelus morning, mid-day, and evening. Finally, Benedict XIII. and Benedict XIV. gave a plenary indulgence, to be obtained once a month, to all who recited it three times daily.

The dates, therefore, are as follow:—

The earliest known use (in the form of an antiphon, or anthem) of the Scriptural words, afterwards adopted as the first part of the Ave Maria—the 7th century.

The earliest known use of the same part as a formula—the 11th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation of the said formula—the 12th century.

The Crown of the Virgin—the 12th century.

The Rosary or Psalter of the Virgin—the 13th century.

The Angelus—the 14th century.

The earliest known use of the prayer which forms the second part of the Ave Maria—the 15th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation and injunction of the same—the 16th century.

HAIR, WEARING OF. The regulations of the ancient church on this subject may be divided into three distinct classes, as relating—i. to the clergy; ii. to penitents; iii. to believers in general.

i. The hair in ancient times appears to have been sometimes worn at great length. Thus Eusebius (H. E. ii. 23), speaking of James the Apostle, notes that a razor never came upon his head. But shortened hair appears to have been considered a mark of distinction between the heathen philosopher and the Christian teacher. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 28) says of Maximus, that he brought no qualification to the pastoral office except that of shortening his hair, which, before that time, he had worn disgracefully long. It is also recorded of one Theotimus, bishop of Scythia, that he still retained the long hair which he had worn when a student, in token that, in becoming a bishop, he had not abandoned philosophy (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). But this liberty was restricted by various decrees of councils. The fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 44), provides that the clergy shall neither permit their hair nor beards to grow. Another reading of this decree is, that they were neither to let their hair grow nor shave their beards. The first synod of St. Patrick, A.D. 456 (c. 6), provides that the hair of the clergy should be shorn according to the Roman fashion, and (c. 10) that any who allow their hair to grow, should be excluded from the church. The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 20), ordains that clergy who retain long hair, shall have it shortened, even against their will, by the archdeacon. The first council of Barcelona, A.D. 540 (c. 3), provides that no clergyman shall let his hair grow nor shave his beard. The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 11), provides that lectors shall not have love-locks (granos), hanging down, after the heathen fashion. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572 (c. 66), decrees that the clergy ought not to discharge their sacred functions with long hair, but with closely-cut hair and open ears. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 41), denounces certain lectors in Galicia, who, while retaining a small tonsure, allowed the lower portion of the hair to grow. The council in Trullo, A.D. 692 (Conc. Quinissex. c. 21), ordains that clergy who have been deprived of their office, should, on their repentance, be shorn after the fashion of the clergy; if they refused this, their hair was to be left long, in token of their preference of a worldly life. At a council held at Rome, A.D. 721 (c. 17), anathema was pronounced against any of the clergy who should allow his hair to grow. The same was repeated at another Roman council, held A.D. 743 (c. 8).

These decrees, however, appear to have been difficult of enforcement. Heretical sects especially appear to have been fond of adopting eccentric fashions of wearing the hair and beard as badges and tokens of their opinions. Epiphanius (Hæres. in Massil. n. 6, 7) denounces certain heretical monks, dwelling in Mesopotamia, in monasteries which he calls "Mandras," who were in the habit of shaving the beard and letting the hair grow, and contends that such practices are contrary to the apostolic injunctions. Jerome (Comm. in Ezek. c. 44) says that the clergy should neither have their heads closely shaven, like the priests of Isis and Serapis, nor let their hair grow to an extravagant length, like barbarians and soldiers, but that the hair should be worn just so long as to cover the head. In another place (Epist. 18, al. 22, ad Eustoch.), he denounces certain monks who indulged in beards like goats and ringlets like women. In his 'Life of Hilarion,' he commends the saint for cutting his hair once a year, at Easter. Augustine (De Op. Mon. c. 31) speaks of certain monks who, fearing lest they might lose reverence by their shorn heads, "ne vilior habeatur tonsa sanctitas," allowed their hair to grow, in order to suggest to those who saw them a resemblance to Samuel and the elder prophets. Against these he quotes the saying of the apostle, that in Christ the veil shall be taken away (2 Cor. iii. 14). Gregory the Great (Pastoral. p. 2, c. 7) says that priests are rightly forbidden either to shave their heads, or to let their hair grow long. The hair on the head of a priest, is to be kept so long that it may cover the skin, and cut so close that it may not interfere with the eyes. The practice seems to have been, to wear the hair short and the beard long. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 24) speaks of one Maximus Palatinus, a clergyman, as wearing his hair short and his beard long. Gregory the Great is described as wearing a beard of the old fashion and of moderate size, a large round tonsure, and his hair neatly curled, "intorto," and hanging to the middle of his ears (Joann. Diac. Vita Greg. Max. c. 4, c. 83). Bede (Ecol. Hist. i. 4, c. 14), describing a vision of SS. Peter and Paul, says that the one was shaven (at-tonsus), as a clergyman, the other wore his beard long. For other particulars regarding the hair of the clergy, see TONSURE.

ii. Closely-cut hair was always enjoined on penitents, as a condition of their reception into the church. The council of Agde (c. 15) provides that no penitents shall be received unless they have parted with their hair, "comas deposuerint." The first council of Barcelona (c. 6) speaks of the shaven heads of male penitents. The third council of Toledo (c. 12) provides that the first step to the admission of a male penitent, shall be to shave his head. So Optatus (Contra Donatist. l. 23) finds fault with the Donatists for having shaven the heads of certain priests whom they had admitted to penance. With regard to women, Ambrose (Ad Virg. Laps. c. 8) speaks of cutting off the hair, which by vain glory had tempted to the sin of luxury; but Jerome, in describing the repentance of Fabiola (Ep. 30, al. 84, ad Ocean.), speaks of her dishevelled hair. But before their restoration, penitents and excommunicated persons were obliged to let the hair and beard grow. Thus a certain Ursicinus, bishop of Cahors, being excommunicated, was forbidden to cut either his hair or his beard (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. l. 8, n. 20). In general, neglected hair appears to have been a sign of mourning. Chrysostom (Serm. 3, on Job) says that many in time of mourning let the hair grow, whereas Job shore his. The reason being, that where the hair is honoured, it is a sign of mourning to cut it short, but where it is worn short, it is a sign of mourning to let it grow. Baronius (Annales, A.D. 631, n. 4) speaks of a certain bishop, named Lupus, exiled by Clothaire, who came mourning to the king with long dishevelled locks, and the king, in token of forgiveness, commanded his hair to be shorn.

iii. The laity were sometimes recognised as usually wearing their hair long. The council in Trullo (Conc. Quinisext. c. 21) ordains that delinquent and impenitent clergy should wear their hair long, as the laity. Yet immoderately lengthened hair appears to have been considered a token of effeminacy and luxuriousness. When the emperor Heraclius succeeded to the throne, his hair was immediately cut short (Baronius, Annal. A.D. 610, n. 5). Many attempts were therefore made to restrain the liberty of the laity, in this respect, within due bounds, founded partly on a sense of what was decent and becoming, partly on the principle that it is not right either for men or women to obliterate the characteristics of their sex. The council in Trullo (c. 96) asserts that it is inconsistent with the baptismal profession, that baptised men should wear their hair in cunningly woven plaits or tresses, and orders that such as would not obey this admonition, should be excommunicated. The council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes any women who, through pretended asceticism, should cut close the hair which was given to them as a token of subjection. The decree was confirmed by the emperor Theodosius, with the addition that any bishop who should admit such women into the church, should be deprived of his office (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). In the Apostolic Constitutions (i. 3), the followers of Christ are ordered not to promote the growth of their hair, but rather to restrain and shorten it. Men are forbidden to wear ringlets, or to use ointments, or in any way to imitate the adornments in use among women. They are also forbidden to collect their hair into a knot or crown, ποιεῖν εἰς ἐν ὃ ἐστι σπατάλιον, or to indulge in tresses, either artfully dishevelled or carefully arranged, ἢ ἀποχύμα ἢ μεμερσμένην, or to curl and crisp it, or dye it yellow. They are also forbidden to shave the beard, as if thereby obliterating the peculiar distinction, τὴν μορφήν, of manhood. Clemens Alexandrinus (Pædagog. ii. c. 8) speaks of the folly committed by aged women in dyeing their hair; and (Ib. iii. 3) reprehends the folly of which some men were guilty, in eradicating the hair, apparently not only from their beards, but from all parts of their bodies, with pitch plaisters. He also (Ib. iii. 11) gives full directions for the arrangement of the hair. The hair of men is to be cut close, unless it is crisp and curly, ὀδῶς. Long curls and love-locks are strictly forbidden, as effeminate and unseemly. The hair is not to be allowed to grow over the eyes, and a closely-cropped head is alleged not only to be becoming a grave man, but to render the brain less liable to injury, by accustoming it to endure heat and cold. The beard is to be allowed to grow, since an ample beard becomes the male sex; if cut at all, the chin must not be left quite bare. The moustache may be clipped with scissors, so that it may not be dirtied in eating, but not shorn with a razor. Women are to wear the hair modestly arranged upon the neck, and fastened with a hair pin. The habit of wearing false hair is strongly denounced, since, it is said, in such cases, when the priest, in bestowing his benediction, lays his hand upon the head, the blessing does not reach the wearer of the hair, but rests upon the person to whom the hair belongs. [P. O.]

HAIR-CLOTH (Cilicium). The rough hair-cloth for which Cilicia was anciently famous was used in several ways, both as an actual instrument, and as a symbol, of mortification.

1. The hair-shirt has frequently been worn, as is well known, as a means of mortifying the flesh without ostentation. Thus Jerome (Epitaph. Nepot. c. 9) says that some other may narrate how the young Nepotianus, when in the imperial service, wore hair-cloth under his chlamys and fine linen. And Paulinus Petricordiensis (Vita S. Martini, ii. p. 1019 D, Migne) says of the monks of St. Martin:

"Multis vestis erat setis contexta camelii."

So in Hucbald's Life of St. Rictrudis, who died about A.D. 688 (c. 9, in Mabillon's Acta SS. Bened. Saec. ii.), we read that the saint wore an inner garment of hair-cloth (esophorio amictur cilicino). One of the saints who bore the name of Theodore was distinguished as trichyas from his constant habit of wearing a hair-shirt (Macri Hierolec. s. v. Trichinas).

Monks frequently used the hair-shirt. Cassian, however (Instit. i. 1) does not consider it suitable for their ordinary garb, both as savouring of over-righteousness and as hindering labour [HABIT, THE MONASTIC]. In his time—Cassian died about A.D. 430—few monks seem to have used it; in after times we find it constantly used, at any rate by those who claimed superior sanctity. On the whole subject, see O. Zöckler, Krit. Geschichte der Askese, p. 82 [Frankf.-a.-M. 1863].

2. Of the symbolic uses of hair-cloth the following are the principal:—The candidates for baptism anciently came to the preliminary examination [SCRUTINIUM] with bare feet, and standing on hair-cloth (Augustine, De Symb. ad Catech. ii. 1; compare iv. 1). Penitents in the ceremonies of Ash Wednesday were clothed with a hair-cloth, as well as sprinkled with ashes (Martene, Rit. Ant. IV. c. xvii.; Ordd. 7, 16, etc.). The altar was sometimes covered with hair-cloth in times of affliction (Ib. III. iii. 2). The dying were covered with a hair-cloth blessed by the priest (Ib. I. vii. 4, Ordo 19). The bodies of the dead were sometimes wrapped in hair-cloth; as, for instance, that of Bernard of Hildesheim (Life, c. 43; in Surius, Nov. 20). Charles the Great was buried in the hair-shirt which he had worn in life (Life by the monk of Angoulême, c. 24; quoted by Martene, III. xii. 13). In an ancient form for the reception of penitents on Maundy Thursday, given by Martene (IV. xxii. § ii. Ordo 6) from a Sarum missal, a banner of hair-cloth (vexillum cilicinum) is directed to be borne in the procession to the church. HALLELUJAH. [ALLELUIA.]

HAND, THE, is used as symbolic of the manifested presence of the First Person of the Holy Trinity, GOD THE FATHER.

The declining skill of the earliest Christian workmen, and their utter technical incapacity after the time of Constantine, appears in the strongest light in their attempts to delineate the extremities of the human figure. Martigny remarks that the hands of the martyrs presenting or receiving their crowns in heaven are covered or concealed in token of adoration; but this applies only to the left hand. The comparative skill, or want of skill, with which these parts of the body are treated, might possibly be a test of ancient work in the catacombs, could paintings be discovered of very ancient date, and thoroughly ascertained authenticity without modern retouch.

The hand representing God occurs in the great Transfiguration of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna (Martigny, p. 639, s. v. Transfiguration). Also in a carving of the same subject on the Ivory Casket of the Library at Brescia (Westwood, Fictile Ivory Cests. 94, p. 37, catalogue). [R. St. J. T.]

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS.]

HANDS, THE LIFTING OF IN PRAYER. I. The strict observance of this custom, and the importance attached to it among the early Christians, will hardly be understood, unless we take into consideration the habits and opinions of their Jewish and heathen forefathers. It was a rite that had descended to them from both. Among the children of Israel it accompanied acts of praise as well as prayer. Witness the Book of Psalms:—"Thus will I bless Thee while I live: I will lift up my hands in Thy name" (Ps. lxxiii. 4); "Lift up your hands in holiness, and bless the Lord" (Ps. cxxxiv. 2). Before Ezra read the law to the people after their return from Babylon, he "blessed the Lord, the great God, and all the people answered Amen, Amen, with lifting up of their hands" (Neh. viii. 6; compare 1 Esdr. ix. 47). In prayer the gesture was so universal that to pray and to lift up the hands were almost convertible terms. Thus in Lamentations, "Lift up thy hands towards Him for the life of thy young children" (Ch. ii. 19). Again in Psalm xxviii. 2: "Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto Thee; when I lift up my hands toward Thy holy oracle." When Heliodorus came to take away the treasures in the temple, the inhabitants of Jerusalem "all holding their hands toward heaven, made supplication" (2 Macc. iii. 20; comp. xiv. 34; Ps. cxli. 2; Is. i. 15; 1 Esdr. viii. 73; Ecclus. li. 19). This gesture in prayer was without doubt so highly valued among the Jews, partly in consequence of the victory obtained over the Amalekites, while the hands of Moses were held up (Exod. xvii. 11); but it was nevertheless "not of Moses, but of the fathers." We might infer this from the manner in which the story is related; but more conclusively from the fact that the same rite prevailed among the Gentiles. "All we of human kind," says Aristotle, "stretch forth our hands to heaven, when we pray" (De Mundo, c. vi. comp. Hom. Il. viii. 347; Virg. Aen. iii. 176; x. 667). Minutius Felix proves that it was still common among the heathen in the 3rd century, "I hear the common people, when they stretch their hands towards heaven, say nothing but God" (Octavius, c. 5).

II. A practice thus universal and of such antiquity, could not fail to have a place in the received ritual of the first Christians. It is more than once recognized in the New Testament itself; as when St. Paul says, "I will therefore that men pray everywhere lifting up holy hands" (1 Tim. ii. 8). Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, is an early witness to the continued observance of the rite. After defining prayer to be "converse with God," he proceeds to say that therefore, as if reaching up to Him, we "raise the head and lift the hands towards heaven" (Strom. vii. c. vii. § 40). Tertullian, his contemporary:—"Worshipping with modesty and humility we the more commend our prayers to God, not even lifting up our hands too high, but with self-restraint and becomingly" (De Orat. c. xiii.). Again: "We Christians, looking upwards, with hands outspread, because free from guilt; with head bare, because we are not ashamed; lastly, without a remembrancer [of the names of the gods], because we pray from the heart" (Apoc. c. xxx.). Origen, A.D. 230, says that among the many gestures of the body, we ought without doubt in prayer to prefer "the stretching forth of the hands and the lifting up of the eyes" (De Orat. c. 31); and that when the devout man prays he "stretches forth his soul towards God, beyond his hands, as it were, and his mind further than his eyes" (Ibid.). According to Eusebius, Constantine had himself represented on coins and in pictures "looking up to heaven, and stretching forth his hands like one praying" (Vita Constant. l. iv. c. xv.). See the epitaph of Petronia, under TOMB.

III. The hands when thus lifted up were often, and perhaps generally, so extended on either side as to make the figure of a cross with the body. See the boy in the group on p. 661. "We" (Christians), says Tertullian (in contrast with the Jews), "not only lift up our hands, but spread them out too, and disposing them after the mode of the Lord's Passion and praying, (so) confess Christ" (De Orat. c. xi.). In allusion to this he says elsewhere, "The very attitude of a Christian at prayer is prepared for every infliction" (Apol. c. xxx.). Asterius Amasenus, A. D. 401: "The erect attitude of prayer, in which one holds the hands outstretched, by its figure represents the passion of the cross" (Hom. de Pharis. et Publ. in Photii Biblioth. cod. 271). St. Maximus of Turin: "We are taught to pray with uplifted hands that by the very gesture of our members we may confess Christ" (De Cruce; Hom. de Pass. ii.). St. Ambrose, when dying, "prayed with hands spread in the form of a cross" (Vita, a Paulino conscr. § 47). Prudentius, describing the death by fire of certain martyrs, relates that, when their bonds were burnt, they lifted up the hands thus set free "to the Father in the form of a cross" (De Coron. Hymn vi. l. 107). Many Christian writers believed that this was the manner in which the hands of Moses were held up during the battle with the Amalekites, and that the victory was thus granted to the cross. See Ep. Barnab. c. xii.; Justin M. Dialog. cum Tryph. cc. 91, 111; Tertull. Adv. Jud. c. x.; Cyprian Adv. Jud. l. ii. c. xxi.; Maximus Taur. u. s. Gregory Nazianzen:—"They held up the hands of Moses that Amalek might be subdued by the cross so long before shadowed forth and figured" (Orat. xii. § 2; Sim. Carmina, lib. ii. § 1, c. 1).

IV. At baptism the early Christians lifted the hand as in defiance of Satan. Thus Cyril of Jerusalem, addressing the newly-baptized: "Standing with your face to the West, ye heard yourselves commanded to stretch forth the hand and renounce Satan as present" (Catech. Mystag. l. c. ii.). Pseudo-Dionysius describes the same thing; but from him we learn further that after the candidate had thrice renounced Satan, the priest "turned him towards the East, and commanded him to look up to heaven, and lifting up (ἀνατείναντα) his hand to enter into compact with Christ" (Eccl. Hierarch. cap. ii. § 6; comp. c. iii. § 5). St. Basil, when exhorting catechumens not to defer their baptism, appears to allude to this second lifting of the hands: "Why dost thou wait until baptism becomes the gift of a fever to thee, when thou wilt not be able to utter the salutary words . . . nor to lift up thy hands to heaven, nor to stand up on thy feet?" (Hom. xiii. Exhort. ad N. Baptism. § 3). The office of the modern Greek church (Euchol.

Goar, p. 338) still witnesses to the lifting up of the hands at the renunciation; but they are now held down when the desire to take service under Christ is professed. The reader will observe that the authorities now cited all belong to the East. There is no evidence so far as the present writer knows, to show that the custom before us prevailed in the West also. [W. E. S.]

HANDS, WASHING OF. I. In the law or Moses (Exod. xxx. 18-21) it was ordained that "between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar" there should stand a brazen laver full of water, at which the priests were to "wash their hands and their feet" before they entered. When the temple was built, this laver was replaced by the "molten sea," "for the priests to wash in" (2 Chron. iv. 2, 6). Again, when murder had been committed by an unknown person, the declaration of innocence made by the elders of the nearest city was associated with a ceremonial washing of the hands (Deut. xxi. 6). These two provisions of the law would, it is conceived, be quite sufficient of themselves to create among those subject to it a general custom of washing the hands before drawing near to God in the more solemn acts of worship and religion. That such a rite prevailed and was held to be of a highly sacred character may be inferred from more than one allusion in the Book of Psalms. "I will wash mine hands in innocency; so will I compass Thine altar" (Psal. xxvi. 6); "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency" (lxxiii. 13). The metaphor of "clean hands" to denote righteousness could not have come into such frequent use (Job ix. 30; xvii. 9; xxxi. 7; Ps. xviii. 20, 24; xxiv. 4), if there had been no familiar rite of washing the hands before entering into God's presence. To give an example of later usage, Josephus tells us that the seventy-two who translated the Old Testament into Greek at the instance of Ptolemy were wont each morning to "wash their hands and purify themselves," before they entered on their sacred task (Antiq. b. xii. ch. ii. § 13). It is most probable, however, that the custom before us was much older than the law of Moses, for it appears to have been general among the heathen at an early period. Thus Hesiod gives a warning "never with unwashed hands to pour out the black wine at morn to Zeus or the other immortals" (Opera et Dies, line 722). He also forbids the passage of a stream on foot before washing the hands in it with prayer (ibid. l. 735). According to some ancient authorities temples were called dehbra from dehuo, because they generally had fountains, or pools so called, attached to them for the use of those who entered (Servius ad Virg. Aen. ii. 225). Nor was the kindred rite before mentioned unknown to the heathen. Pilate "took water and washed his hands before the multitude," when he protested his innocence of the blood of Christ (St. Matt. xxvii. 24). Compare Virg. Aen. ii. 719. Generally, indeed, "it was a custom with the ancients, after the killing of a man or other slaughters, to wash the hands with water to remove the pollution" (Scholiast. in Sophocl. Ajac. l. 664, vol. i. p. 80; Lond. 1758).

II. A rite thus familiar to all classes of the early converts, and so patient of a Christian adaptation, was certain to be retained in some form or other. To facilitate its observance there was in the ATRIUM of many churches a FOUNTAIN or reservoir of water resembling those with which the temples had been furnished. Thus Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, at the beginning of the 4th century, in an open space before a church which he built in that city, caused to be made "fountains opposite the temple, which by their plentiful flow of water afforded the means of cleansing to those who passed out of the sacred precincts into the interior" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. l. x. c. 4). In the West, Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 393, gives a poetical description of a basin (cantharus) in the court of a church built by him. "With its ministering stream," he says, "it washes the hands of those who enter" (ad Sever. Ep. xxxii. § 15). From the same writer we learn that there was a cantharus in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome, which "spouted streams that ministered to the hands and faces" of the worshippers (ad Pammach. Ep. xiii. § 13). St. Chrysostom says, "It is the custom for fountains to be placed in the courts of houses of prayer, that they who are going to pray to God may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer" (Hom. de Div. N. T. loc. n. xxv. on 2 Cor. iv. 13). Socrates tells us that in a riot at Constantinople in the reign of Constantius "the court of the church (of Acacius the martyr) was filled with blood, and the well therein overflowed with blood" (Hist. Eccl. l. ii. c. 38).

III. Frequent allusions to the practice for which public provision was thus made occur in Christian writers. For example, Tertullian, A.D. 192: "What is the sense of entering on prayer with the hands, indeed, washed, but the spirit unclean?" (De Orat. c. xi.). This is said of all prayer, private as well as public. With regard to private prayer in the morning, the Apostolical Constitutions give the following direction: "Let every one of the faithful, man or woman, when they rise from sleep in the morning, before doing work, having washed [not bathed the whole body, but νιψάμενοι, having washed parts of it, especially the hands] pray" (lib. viii. c. 32). St. Chrysostom in the following passage is speaking of public worship in general: "I see a custom of this sort prevailing among the many, viz., that they study how they may come (into church) with clean clothes, and how they may wash their hands, but consider not how they may present a clean soul to God. And I do not say this to prevent your washing hands or face, but because I wish you to wash, as is befitting, not with water only, but with the virtues correlative to the water" (Hom. li. in St. Matth. Ev. c. xv. 17-20).

More frequently it is spoken of as part of the preparation for Holy Communion. For example, St. Chrysostom: "Tell me, wouldst thou choose to draw near to the sacrifice with unwashed hands? I think not; but thou wouldst rather not draw near at all than with filthy hands. Wouldst thou, then, while thus careful in the little matter, draw near having a filthy soul?" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. 20-23). Similarly in the West, Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502: "All the men, when they intend to approach the altar, wash their hands, and all the women use fair linen cloths on which to receive the body of Christ . . . As the men wash their hands with water, so let them wash their souls with alms," &c. (Serm. cccxix. § 5 in App. iv. ad Opp. S. August.). Again: "If we are ashamed and afraid to touch the eucharist with filthy hands, much more ought we to be afraid to receive the same eucharist in a polluted soul" (Serm. cccxii. § 6; ibid.).

IV. The celebrant and his assistants washed their hands between the dismissal of the catechumens and the offering of the gifts. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions: "Let one subdeacon give water to the priests for washing their hands, a symbol of the purity of souls consecrated to God" (lib. viii. c. 11). Cyril of Jerusalem: "Ye saw the deacon who gave to the priest and to the elders surrounding the altar of God (water) to wash (their hands, νιψάσθαι) . . . The washing of the hands is a symbol of guiltlessness of sins" (Catech. Mystiq. v. § 1). Pseudo-Dionysius: "Standing before the most holy symbols the high priest (i.e. the bishop) washes his hands with the venerable order of the priests" (De Eccl. Hierarch. cap. iii. sect. 3, § 10; sim. sect. ii.). We find the same rite in the West. Thus in one of the Questions out of the Old and New Testaments, probably compiled by Hilary the deacon, A.D. 354, it is implied that at Rome the deacons did not "pour water on the priest's hands, as" (adds the writer) "we see in all the churches" (Qu. ci. On the Arrogance of the Roman Levites in App. iii. ad Opp. Aug.). We may remark, in passing, that the Clementine liturgy, as above quoted, assigns the office to a subdeacon. In the earliest Ordo Romanus extant, probably of the 7th century, it is ordered that, after the reception of the gifts, the bishop "return to his seat and wash his hands," and that "the archdeacon standing before the altar wash his hands, when the receiving (of the oblations), is completed" (Ord. i. § 14; Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 11; compare Ord. ii. § 9, p. 47).

Since the clergy, as well as the people, washed their hands before they entered the church, it may be asked, how they came to do so a second time? Ancient writers give only a symbolical reason, but it is not probable that the custom originated in that. The words of the Ordo Romanus suggest that the hands might be soiled by the oblations, which at that time were large and various in kind. They certainly were washed immediately after these were taken from the offerers, and before the celebrant proceeded to offer the elements selected out of them for consecration. Another reason which might make it necessary is suggested by Sala (Not. (1) in Bona, Rer. Lit. l. ii. c. ix. § 6), viz., that a little time before the bishop and priests had laid their hands on the heads of the catechumens and penitents. The washing of the hands, or rather fingers, by the celebrant after his communion, now ordered in the church of Rome, was not practised for more than a thousand years after Christ. [W. E. S.]

HANGINGS. Some few notices may be added to those already given under CURTAINS. The curtains which closed the doors of the chancel screen in later times often bore the pictorial representation of some saint or angelic being. At the present day St. Michael is often represented upon them as prohibiting all access to the bema (Neale, Eastern Ch. i. 195). It was on the curtain of the bema of the church at Anablatha that St. Epiphanius saw the painted figure which gave him so much offence, and caused him to tear the curtain, and desire that it should be replaced by one of a single colour (Epiphan. Epist. ad Joann. p. 319). The censure passed by Asterius of Amasia on the excessive luxury displayed in the textile fabrics of his day proves that at the end of the fourth century representations of sacred facts were woven in the stuffs in ordinary use for hangings, and even for dresses. The same author also describes the painted hangings of the sepulchre of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon representing the martyrdom of that saint (Aster. Amas. Homil. de Divit. et Lazaro; Enarrat. in marty. Euphem.). Paulinus of Nola is another authority on the decoration of these vela with pictorial designs:—

A velum concealing the altar from the gaze of the laity is mentioned in the office for the dedication of a church in the Sacramentary of Gregory. When the bishop, having brought the relics which were to be deposited within it, had arrived at the altar, he was to be concealed from the sight of the people by a veil, before he proceeded to anoint the four corners with the chrism (extenso velo inter clerum et populum, Muratori, ii. 481). An offering of hangings vela was made to the church of St. Peter's by a lady of rank named Rusticiana, which were carried to their destination by the whole body of the clergy chanting a litany (Greg. Magn. Epist. ix. 38). The supposititious Second Epistle of Clement to James the Lord's brother, “de sacratis vestibus et vasis,” gives minute directions for the washing of the altar cloths and other vestments of the church by the deacons and other ministers of the church, in vessels specially set apart for the purpose, near the sacristy. The door-keepers are also enjoined to take care that no one thoughtlessly wiped his hands on the curtain of the door, and to remind those who were guilty of such irreverence that “the veil of the Lord's Temple is holy” (Labbe, Concil. i. 99). Gregory of Tours informs us that on the conversion of Clovis, solemn processions were instituted in the streets, which were shaded with painted veils, while the churches were adorned with white curtains (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 31). According to Hefele (Beiträge zur Archäologie, ii. 252), tapestry curtains were employed to protect the apertures of windows in churches before the general introduction of glazing. [E. V.]

HARE. The boy who represents Spring among the Four Seasons frequently carries a hare in his hand. The idea of speed in the Christian course was associated with it. It is sometimes connected with the horse (Perret v. lvii.) or with the palm (Boldetti, 506). Its presence in Christian decoration seems to be connected with the Roman taste for ornamenting their rooms with domestic, agricultural, or hunting subjects. Many places of assembly, no doubt, contained pictures by Pagan hands in the earliest days; and the ingenuity of Christian preachers would in all probability make use of them for type and metaphor; and so the animal or other object would become a recognized and customary subject of Christian ornament, acquiring a symbolical meaning. In such examples as the vine or shepherd, that meaning of course existed before; and the distinction between scriptural and all other symbols is on the whole sufficiently well-marked in early work. [R. St. J. T.]

HARIOLL. [ASTROLOGY; DIVINATION.]

HARLOTS. Compare FORNICATION. The maintaining and harbouring of harlots was severely punished by the laws of the empire; a man who permitted his house to become a place of assignation for improper purposes was punished as an adulterer (Pandect. lib. xlviii. tit. 5, l. 8); if a man discovered his wife to be a procurer, it was a valid ground of divorce (Codex Theod. lib. iii. tit. 16, l. 1); careful provision was made against fathers or masters prostituting their children or slaves (Codex Just. lib. xi. tit. 40, l. 6). Socrates (H. E. v. 18) commends Theodosius the Great for demolishing the houses of ill fame in Rome. Theodosius the younger performed the same service for Constantinople, enacting that keepers of infamous houses should be publicly whipped and expelled the city, while their slaves were set at liberty (Theodos. Novel. 18, de Lenonibus). All these laws were confirmed by Justinian (Novel. 14) who also increased the severity of the punishments.

The church, as was natural, visited prostitution with the severest censure. Baptism was denied to harlots (πόρναις) and to those who maintained them (πορνοβοσκούς). (Constt. Apost. viii. 32). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, ordains that if a parent, or any Christian whatever, exercise the trade of a procurer, forasmuch as they set to sale the person of another, or rather their own, they shall not be admitted to communion, no, not at their last hour; and the same penalty is denounced (c. 70) by the same council against a wife who prostitutes herself with her husband's connivance. [C.]

HATFIELD, COUNCIL OF (Hæthfeld-thense, or Hæthfeldense, Concilium), 17 Sept. A.D. 680, at Bishop's Hatfield in Hertfordshire, attended by all the bishops of Britain, Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding, held for making a declaration against Eutychianism and Monothelism. Pope Agatho wished that Theodore should have attended his council of 125 bishops at Rome, March 27 of the same year, preliminarily to the 6th general council, and had sent John, precentor of his church of St. Peter, with the acts of the Lateran council under pope Martin I., A.D. 649, against Monothelism, to invite him thither. But Theodore, being either unable to leave for other reasons, or unwilling to come from knowing that Wilfrid, bishop of York, whose case had caused so much strife, was already there, collected this council instead, and despatched a copy of its synodical letter to Rome by John, where it was read with great satisfaction, and probably before the 6th council, which met Nov. 7, had commenced. Bede, who was about eight years old when this synod took place, gives three different extracts from its letter, in substance as follows:—

1. The bishops declare that “they have set forth the right and orthodox faith, as delivered by our Lord to His disciples, and handed down in the symbol of the holy fathers, and by all the sacred and universal synods, and by the whole body of approved doctors of the Catholic church. Following whom, they also confess the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the Holy Trinity in Unity, consubstantial, and the Unity in Trinity, one God in three consubstantial Persons of equal honour and glory."

2. They "receive the five general councils," mentioning each by name.

3. "Likewise the synod of Rome, A.D. 649, under Martin I.," after which they say: "We receive and glorify our Lord Jesus, as they glorified Him, neither adding nor subtracting anything. We anathematise from the heart all they anathematized, and receive all they received: glorifying God the Father without beginning, and His only begotten Son, born of the Father before all worlds, and the Holy Spirit proceeding ineffably from the Father and the Son, according to the preaching of the above-named holy apostles and prophets and doctors, to all which we have subscribed, who with archbishop Theodore have expounded the Catholic faith." This assertion of procession from the Son as well as the Father, which is not found in any document received by the 6th council, may seem to indicate that the interpolated form of the creed had got into Britain by then; but it may be explained in another way. We are told in another place by Bede, that when Theodore was consecrated at Rome by Vitalian, it was expressly stipulated that abbot Adrian should accompany him into England: "Et, ut ei doctrinae cooperatori existens, diligenter attenderet, nequid ille contrarium veritati fidei, Gregoriorum more, in ecclesiam cui praesset, introduceret" (E. II. iv. 1). Adrian remained in that capacity till his death, A.D. 710, and Theodore commenced work, "per omnia comitante et cooperante Adriano" (ib. c. 2). Now Adrian was a foreigner, as well as Theodore. He was a learned African, and Africa was the country that boasted of the clearest authorities as yet, for procession from the Son as well as the Father, in SS. Austin and Fulgentius. In conclusion, Bede tells us that John the precentor also took part in this synod, and was flocked to by the whole country for instruction in the Roman chant (Mansi, xi. 175-80; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141-51).

HAWKING. [HUNTING.]

HEAD, COVERING OF THE. Christian men in ancient days prayed with uncovered head, according to the apostolic injunction (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5). Chrysostom's comment on the passage shows clearly that this was the practice of his own time, as well as of the apostolic age. Tertullian (Apol. c. 30) says that Christian men prayed with bare head, as having no need to conceal a blush, insinuating that the heathen might well blush for some of the prayers which they uttered; and Cyprian may perhaps be alluding to the same custom, when he says (De lapsis, c. 2) that the head of a Christian was uncontaminated by the head-covering of the heathen sacrificer. On the other hand, as both the apostolic precept and the custom of the East made it indecent for women to be seen with uncovered head, the women of the Oriental and African churches covered their heads not only in the congregation, but generally when they appeared in public. The breaking in upon this custom led Tertullian to write his treatise De Virginibus Velandis, in which he contends that not only matrons, but maidens—who had been allowed a somewhat greater licence—should cover their heads effectually. He is especially severe (c. 17) on those who wore a simple band or fillet, which did not cover the top of the head; or laid a mere slip of linen on the top of the head, which did not reach even to the ears; he insists that the veil or head-covering should at any rate come down to meet the top of the dress; the whole space which would be covered by the hair if it were let down should be covered by the veil; and he holds up for admiration and imitation the Arab women, who so covered the head and face as to leave only one eye visible. Contrary to Roman practice, they preferred to see rather than to be seen. But most of all does he inveigh against those women who, even when psalms are said and the name of God named, continued uncovered, or with veils thrown back (retectae perseverant); who even in prayer fancied themselves covered with a strip of lace or fringe on the top of the head. But Tertullian's rigorous views were not those of the Church at large; as a general rule Christian women have worn the head-dresses of their country and station, and have covered their heads in the place of assembly. Men, to speak generally, have always prayed with uncovered head. Yet about the 8th century the Ordo Romanus II. (c. 8, p. 46) says that at the reading of the Gospel neither crown nor any other covering is kept on the head, an expression which seems to imply that during the saying of some portions of the office crowns or other coverings were retained.

2. With regard to the head-covering of clerics, the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 38) lays down the rule, that no cleric stands in the church at any time with covered head, unless he have an infirmity. In spite, however, of the generality of the expression "ullo tempore," the meaning of the sentence is probably limited by the words which stand at the head of the rubric, "per totam Quadragesimam." That some kind of ceremonial head-dress was worn by bishops and priests from the 4th century onward seems certain. See INFULA, MITRE.

3. For the head-covering of monks, see CUCULLA, HOOD. [C.]

HEAD OF ALL CHURCHES. The emperor Justinian in a rescript (Codex, lib. 1, tit. 2, l. 24) gives to the patriarchal church of Constantinople the title of "Head of all the Churches"—"Constantinopolitana ecclesia omnium aliarum est caput." See PATRIARCH; POPA. [C.]

HEARERS. [AUDIENTES; CATECHUMENS; DOCTOR.]

HEATHEN, THE, in relation to the Church.

1. The duty of praying for the heathen was amply recognized by the early Christians. Thus in the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 10) we find the exhortation, "pray also without ceasing for the rest of mankind; for there is in them a hope of repentance, that they may attain to God." St. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalem, c. 2) declares that one, who did not believe that the seed of faith was sown in the heart by God, must needs mock at the words of the priest at the altar exhorting the people to pray for unbelievers, that God may turn them to the faith. And again (De Dono Persev. c. 22, § 63) he asks, "When was not prayer made in the Church for unbelievers and for its enemies, that they might believe?" Prosper (De Vocat. Gentium, i. 12) tells us that "the Church prays to God everywhere, not only for the holy and those already regenerate in Christ, but also for all unbelievers and enemies of the cross of Christ, for all worshippers of idols. . . . And what does she ask for them, but that leaving their errors they may be converted to God?" Such prayers occur in the liturgies; in that of St. Mark, for instance, we have (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 153), "Turn back those who have gone astray, enlighten those who are in darkness." So the Clementine (Constt. Apost. viii. 15): "We beseech Thee on behalf of those who hate us and persecute us for Thy Name's sake, for those outside the Church and in error, that Thou mayest turn them to good and soften their hearts." In the West, the conversion of the heathen was an especial subject of prayer—as it is still in the English church—on Good Friday. Thus, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (i. 41; Migne's Patrol. lxxiv. 1105 B) the deacon, after bidding prayer for heretics, schismatics, and Jews, proceeds, "Let us pray also for the pagans, that Almighty God may take away the wickedness from their hearts, and that forsaking their idols they may turn to the true God and His only Son Jesus Christ." So in the Gregorian (p. 64), the prayers to be used on the Wednesday and Friday in Holy Week include one for the pagans.*

2. While it is clear that heathen were carefully excluded from the Christian mysteries, it is equally clear that from the earliest times they were admitted to that part of Christian worship which consisted mainly of instruction. St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 23) evidently contemplates the possibility of heathen entering the place where preaching took place, whether it were in the shape of an utterance in "tongues," or prophesying. At the end of the 2nd century, all portions of divine worship were not open to all alike; for Tertullian (De Praescript. c. 41) reproaches certain heretics with their want of order and discipline, in that not only catechumens were admitted to the same privileges as the faithful, but even heathen, if they chanced to enter the place, had equal access; so did the heretics cast their mock-pearls before swine. In this it is implied that the orthodox were more careful of their treasure. [DISCIPLINA ARCANI.] The words of Origen (c. Celsum, iii. p. 142, Spencer), where, speaking of the care bestowed upon catechumens, he says that Christians had in view to prevent persons of evil life from coming to their common assembly (ἐπὶ τὸν κοινὸν αὐτῶν σύλλογον), seem to imply that some kind of scrutiny took place before men were admitted to any Christian assembly whatever; for he contrasts the Cynic practice of receiving all comers to their harangues with that of the Christians, and the word σύλλογος does not appear to be taken (like συναγῆς) in the limited sense of "the Eucharistic mystery." However this may be, it is certain that at the end of the 4th century the African canons (IV. Conc. Carth. c. 84) specially provide that the bishop is not to hinder any one, whether heathen, heretic, or Jew, from entering the church and hearing the word of God, as far as the dismissal of the catechumens (usque ad missam catech.); and a later Council (Conc. Valletanum, c. 1; A.D. 524) orders the Gospel to be read after the Epistle, before the bringing in of the gifts [ENTRANCE, § 2] or the dismissal of catechumens,^b in order that not only catechumens and penitents, but all who belong to the contrary part (e diverso sunt) may hear the wholesome precepts of the Lord Jesus or the sermon of the bishop (sacerdotis); for many had been drawn to the faith by the preaching of the prelates (pontificum). The liberty which was granted to heathen does not seem in all cases to have been allowed to heretics (Conc. Laod. c. 6). The liturgies themselves contain evidence that heathen were permitted to be present during the introductory portion of the Eucharistic office. In the Clementine, for instance (Constt. Apostt. viii. 12), the deacon proclaims before the offertory, "Let no one of the catechumens, no one of the hearers, no one of the unbelievers (τῶν ἀπίστων), no one of the heterodox [be present];" from which it appears that heathens had not been excluded during the whole of the previous service.

3. It does not appear that the infant children of heathen parents, remaining in the heathen family, were in ancient times ever baptized. It would have been held a profanation of the sacrament to baptize those who were likely to be brought up as pagans. But baptism was not refused to children of heathen slaves brought to baptism by their owners, who could of course ensure them Christian nurture; and orphans and foundlings—the latter at any rate almost always the offspring of heathen—were frequently presented for baptism by the virgins or others who had taken charge of them (Augustine, Epist. 23, ad Bonifac.; compare Pseudo-Ambros. de Vocat. Gent. ii. 18). We may probably discover in this presentation of infants for baptism by persons other than their parents the origin of SPONSORS.

When the time came that Paganism was proscribed and Christianity enjoined, special care was taken that whole families should be brought within the pale of Christianity, and that the head of a household should not undergo baptism pro forma, while the household remained heathen. "As for those who are not yet baptized," says the Code of Justinian (lib. i. tit. ii. de Paganis, l. 10), "let them, with wives and children and all their households, betake themselves to the holy churches; and let them provide that their infants (parvuli) be baptized without delay; but let the older children (maiores) before baptism be instructed in the Scriptures according to the canons. But if any, with a view to entering the public service, or to acquiring an office or a property, go through a form of baptism (ingant baptizari) and leave in their error their children, wives, and others who belong to and depend upon them; they are to be punished by confiscation of goods and other penalties, and excluded from the public service." The special case of the Samaritans is provided for by another law (Novel. 144, c. 2); adults were to pass through two years' instruction and probation, while children not capable of instruction in the doctrines of the faith were to be admitted to baptism at once. Both these laws were included by Photius in his Nomocanon (tit. iv. c. 4, p. 907) [CODEX CANONUM, p. 400].

4. It does not appear that the Church in the earliest times had special organizations for the conversion of the heathen. It was of course the duty of the bishops and clergy of any church to endeavour to bring over to the faith those pagans who dwelt about them, and men were raised up from time to time who went forth into lands entirely heathen. The monastic orders, in particular, especially that of St. Columba, were constantly active in propagating the faith of Christ [MONASTICISM]. The lives of the great missionaries will be found in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.

It is worth observing, that in the Coronation-office given by Ménard with the Gregorian Sacramentary (Ad Regium benedictionem, pp. 263, 264) the conversion of heathen nations is regarded as especially the work of a queen. After putting on the ring, the consecrating bishop prays that the queen on the point of being crowned "may be enabled to call barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth."

5. The social intercourse of heathen and Christian, while paganism was still a flourishing system, was rendered difficult by two circumstances; the prevalence of more or less idolatrous practices in the family life of heathens—libations, feasts on sacrificial meats, songs implying the recognition of pagan deities, and the like; and afterwards by the horror and hatred with which the heathen came to regard the votaries of what they thought an "ill-omened superstition," destructive of the greatness of the empire. [FAMILY; IDOLATRY.]

Christians who feasted with the heathen in a spot appropriated to heathen festivities, even if for fear of defilement they took with them their own food and ate no other, were sentenced to a two years' penance among the Substrati [PENITENCE]. (Conc. Ancyra, c. 7; A.D. 314.)

6. Until Christianity had developed a literature of its own, those Christians who studied literature at all, beyond the limits of Scripture, of course studied pagan literature; but at the end of the 4th century we find the peremptory prohibition (IV. Conc. Carth. c. 16), "that the bishop should not read the books of the gentiles." It is not to be supposed however that this precept was literally and universally observed; the vast pagan learning (for instance) of Jerome and Augustine is matter of notoriety, and it is not to be supposed that it was wholly acquired before they entered the Christian ministry. Jerome, indeed (Epist. 10 [al. 70] ad Magnum), expressly defends Christian writers against the charge that they were ignorant of pagan writings, and points with pride to the long series of writers who had defended Christianity with weapons drawn from the pagan armoury. See further under PROHIBITED BOOKS. [C.]

as denoting the future spiritual state of happiness in the presence of God, we can hardly pass over the symbolic representations of the Lord in glory which seem from the 6th century to have been the accustomed decorations of Byzantine churches. The choir and apse of a church from that date were constantly made to symbolize heaven and earth: the churches triumphant and militant, the new heaven of glory, and the renewed earth of the soul regenerated in baptism. The churches of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, St. Venantius, and especially of St. Prassede, at Rome, may be taken as types of the Byzantine treatment of this great subject. In the former Our Lord stands on the firmament of clouds, a figure of indescribable grandeur. He is not only come to His sanctuary, and present with a congregation of the church, but he is also and at the same moment in heaven, apart from time, with the church triumphant. Accordingly, here, and in St. Prassede, the apse, and the upper part of the arch of triumph in advance of it, represent Him in glory with His own; saints and martyrs, in white robes on gold ground, casting their crowns before Him. But at their feet flows the mystic Jordan, the river of baptism into His death, and also the river of death, the Lethe of life and death. It separates the glorified church in heaven from the sheep of the fold below, who are yet militant on earth.

Parallel representations of the adoration of saints and martyrs in glory are, of course, universal from the 6th century; the great processions at St. Apollinare Nuova, in Ravenna, will be remembered as belonging to the time of Justinian. The Last Judgment of Torcello has its side of accepted souls (see s. v.). [R. St. J. T.]

HEBDOMADARIUS. The word signifies a weekly officer, and was applied in monasteries to those monks who served, a week in rotation, the office of cook or reader during refectory. In Egypt and the Thebaid it was customary in the 5th century for all the monks in turn to act as cooks, and Cassian traces the custom to the monasteries in the East (Cass. Instit. iv. 19, cf. Hieron. Reg. Pachom. Prol. Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 35). But see Cass. Instit. iv. 22. Similarly Benedict ordered that none should be excused from this duty except on the score of health or urgent occupations, intending thus to promote a fellowship of brotherly feeling; but with his usual consideration, he allowed those who might be unskilful in this sort of work to have assistants (Bened. Reg. c. 35).

By the rule called of Magister each "decad" or "decuria" (ten monks) under its two deans (praepositi), was to hold this office for five weeks together, two of the number in turn with one dean being told off each week for the kitchen, and the rest under the other dean working in the field (Reg. Mag. c. 17). Even abbats, though not unfrequently of illustrious birth, were not always exempt. By the rule of Ferreolus, written in the south of France during the 6th century, the abbat was to be cook on three great festivals in the year, at Christmas, at Pentecost, and on the Founder's Day (Reg. Ferreol. c. 38). It is recorded of Benedictus Anianis the compiler of the Concordia Regularum, that he would be intent on literary work while at work in the kitchen (Vita Bened. Anian.

c. 14). By the rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles in the 6th century, abbats and priors were excused altogether.

In some monasteries it was part of the duty of the hebdomadarii to prepare the dinner-table, and to act as waiters. Benedict indeed, distinguishes the "Septimanarii coquinae" from the "servitores" (Bened. Reg. cc. 35, 38); but the rule of Isidorus, bishop of Seville, in the 7th century, combines the offices (Isid. Reg. c. 11); and in the rule of "Magister" the cooks or their assistants are ordered not only to wait at table, but to carry water, chop wood, clean shoes, wash towels, dust the mats in the oratory, and perform various other menial tasks (Reg. Mag. c. 19). In the same rule it is provided, that if the weekly officers are negligent in having the table ready for the refection, the abbat himself is to put them to the blush by doing it himself publicly (Ib. c. 23). In the Cluniac and Cistercian monasteries the hebdomadarii were waiters as well as cooks (Marten. Reg. Bened. Comm. ad loc. cit.).

The week of the hebdomadarii commenced on Sunday by a solemn form of admission in the oratory after "matins" (Reg. Bened. c. 35), or after "prime" (Reg. Mag. c. 19); the monks going out of office, as well as those just coming in, entreating the prayers of their brethren, and the blessing of their abbat. On the Saturday those, whose term of office was over, were to deliver up to the "cellarer" for the use of their successors all the utensils &c. under their charge in perfect order (Reg. Bened. v. s. Reg. Mag. v. s.). It was an old custom, symbolic of humility and brotherly love, for the hebdomadarii, closing and commencing their week, to wash the feet of their brethren, during which operation silence was to be kept, or psalms chanted (Cassian. Instit. iv. 19. Bened. Reg. v. s.). By the rule of "Magister," they were to set about preparing the refection three hours before the hour fixed for it; immediately after "nones" if, as was usual, the dinner was at midday, immediately after "sext" for a dinner at three in the afternoon (Reg. Mag. v. s.). The refection was to be served on the stroke (Reg. Bened. v. s.); for any unpunctuality they were to be mulcted of the ration of bread or a part of it for certain days (Icy. Mag. c. 19); the Concordia Regularum quotes an anonymous rule (not the "Regula Cujusdam," usually ascribed to Columbanus) sentencing hebdomadarii guilty of any trivial irregularity to twenty-five strokes of the open hand (Reg. Cujusd. c. 12), just as Cassian cautions them against losing even a pea (Cass. Instit. iv. 20). Benedict wisely arranged that the cooks should have some refreshment, a piece of bread and a small cup of beer, (panem ac singulos biberes) an hour before the refection, on ordinary days; on festivals they were to wait till after the midday mass (Bened. Reg. v. s.). Various reasons are supposed by commentators for the latter part of this injunction (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc.).

The "lector hebdomadarius" or reader aloud during refection held office, like the "coqui," for a week; but Benedict ordered that only those brethren should be readers, whose reading was likely to edify (Bened. Reg. c. 38). On the Sunday commencing his week of office the reader was thrice to repeat in the oratory the

"Domine, aperi os meum," and before beginning to read was to ask the prayers of his hearers, lest he should be elated with pride (Ib.). Not a word was to be spoken during the lecture even by way of asking a question on what was being read; unless the prior (or abbat), should think right to interpose an explanation or exhortation; the monks were to help another to anything wanted without a word (Ib.). The reader was to have a little bread and wine (for so "mixtum" is to be understood, according to Martene, and not as wine and water), just before reading, for fear of faintness or exhaustion; he was to dine with the other hebdomadarii after the public meal (Ib.). The passages for reading were chosen by the abbat either from the Holy Scriptures or from lives of saints. Cassian derives the custom of reading aloud at refection from Cappadocia (Cass. Instit. iv. 19). [See also, Alteser. Asceicon ix. 10]. [I. G. S.]

HECATONTARCHAE. The council in Trullo (c. 61) condemns to six years' excommunication those who resort to "the so-called hecatontarchae, or such-like persons" (τοῖς λεγομένοις ἑκατοντάρχαις ἢ τισι τοιοῦτοις) with the view of learning from them what they may choose to reveal. The title of "hecatontarches," is said by Balsamon (quoted by Van Espen, iii. 415) to be equivalent to "Primicerius;" and to have been conferred on certain old men who gave themselves out to be possessed of supernatural knowledge and deceived the simple. Gothofred (quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XVI. v. 6) thinks that these hecatontarchae are to be identified with the "centenarii" of the Theodosian Code (iik. xvi. tit. 10, l. 20), who were officers of certain corporations or companies for managing idolatrous pomps and ceremonies, and frequently claimed the power of divination. HEGIRA OR HIJRAH (الهجرة). The era commonly used by the Mohammedan historians is that of the Hijrah, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. The epoch is the first day of the first month, Moharrem, of the year in which this took place (not the day itself, which was about sixty-seven days later). The epoch fell, according to the best Arabian authors and astronomers, cited in Ideler (Handbuch, ii. 483), on Thursday, July 15, A.D. 622; but according to civil usage and the phase of the moon, a day later. This discrepancy has to be noted. We shall take as the epoch July 16, A.D. 622, or 5335 Julian Period, with interval days from Christian era [ERA], 227,014.

In Mohammedan authors the year is a lunar year of 30 and 29 days alternately, having 354 days. In intercalary years, of which there are 11 in every 30 years, viz., those marked * in Table I., the last month has one more day. In a complete cycle of 30 years there are 10,631 days.

To convert a Mohammedan Date into Old Style.—Find the number of cycles by dividing the Mohammedan year-date less 1 by 30. Let Q be the quotient, R the remainder. Multiply Q by 10,631, to which add the number of days corresponding to R in Table I. and the number of days corresponding to the months and days in Table II., and also 227,014, the interval days from the Christian era. The number of days divided by 1461 will give the number of quadriennia A.D., and table in ERA § 5, p. 623, will suffice to find the residual year and day of year.

Add 1 for the current year.

To convert an O. S. Date into Mohammedan.—Convert into days from Christian era, by same rule as in ERA, § 5. Subtract 227,014; divide remainder by 10,631. Let quotient be Q and remainder R. To $30 \times Q$ add the number of years corresponding to the number of days in Table I. next less than R, and with those over find the months and days in Table II.

Add 1 for the current year.

It may be worth noting that the Persian era of Yezdegird commenced June 16, 632, ten years later. [L. H.]

HEGUMENOS. (ἡγούμενος) The Hegumenos of a monastery in the Greek church corresponds to the Latin ABBAT (see that word). He was also termed archimandrite. But, according to Helyot (Hist. des Ordre. Monast. Diss. Prelim. c. 11), the term archimandrite passed in time from the superior of a monastery to the superior-general, originally called the exarch, whose office it was to "visit" all the monasteries in a province. Any monastery so desirous at its foundation was exempted from the bishop's jurisdiction and placed under the sole authority of the patriarch; and the superior-general of these monasteries was a grand archimandrite (cf. Thomass. Disc. Eccles. I. iii. 25). The words Hegumene (ἡγουμένη), Hegumenion (ἡγουμένιον), and Hegumeneia (ἡγουμενεία) (all from the classical term for the headship of a confederacy) signify abbess, monastery

(or abbat's rooms), and office of abbat. (Suic. Thes. Eccles. s. v.) [I. G. S.]

HELL. A frequent subject of mediaeval Christian art in the sense of the appointed place or state of future punishment; but the writer is not aware of any such representation of unquestionable date and authenticity within the first eight centuries, unless the judgment-mosaic of Torcello may be considered an exception, which is very doubtful. See LAST JUDGMENT. The Book of Kells, and Saxon and Irish MSS. contain numerous dragons, and even grotesque devils; but they certainly seem to have more to do with the prevailing taste for lacertine or serpentine ornament, and general melancholy or ferocity of mind, than with any doctrinal idea of evil spirits. The regular Inferno begins with the early Florentine revival, in the baptistry of St. Giovanni. [R. St. J. T.]

HEMIPHORION (ἡμιφόριον), seemingly some kind of upper garment, worn by men and women. Epiphanius (Haeresis 69, § 3) describes Arius as wearing a colobion (see the word) and a hemiphorion; the latter probably over the former, which was a close tunic. And Palladius (Hist. Lausiv. p. 148) says that the younger Melania gave her silken hemiphoria to make "καλύμματα τοῖς θουσιαστηρίοις," hangings for the sanctuary, or altar-cloths, whichever it may be.

Hesychius and Suidas write the word ἡμιφόριον, connecting it with φόρος (a shawl or wrapper), and translating it "dimidium vestis," "dimidiata vestis." It was probably therefore one of the many forms of the pallium, smaller than that commonly worn. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.) [C.]

HEOTHINA (τὰ ἑωθινά). The Heothinon is an anthem sung in the Greek office of lauds (τὸ ὄρθρον), and occurs after the αἶνοι: (i.e. on ordinary days, Pss. cxlviii., cxlix., cl., on Sundays and important festivals, a short equivalent); and certain versicles called Stichoi and short anthems called Stichera which follow them, and is placed between the clauses of the doxology, "glory, &c." (δόξα), and "both now, &c." (καὶ νῦν).^a The Heothinon varies with the musical tone of the week; there being one to each tone; and they are found in the Paracletice, or book containing the various antiphons or troparia, arranged according to the different tones. The form of the Heothinon is that of any other Greek antiphon.

HERESY, considered as a delictum, or offence against the law of the church.

The Greek word αἵρεσις imports (1) a choosing (Lev. xxii. 18, LXX.; 1 Maccab. viii. 30); (2) that which is chosen, especially an opinion which one chooses to hold, as αἵρέσεις ἀπωλείας (2 Pet. ii. 1); used by ecclesiastical writers for opinions deviating from the true Christian faith; (3) a body of men holding a particular opinion, as (e.g.) those holding particular opinions in philosophy (Diog. Laert. i. 13 etc.). In the New Testament it is used of the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), the Pharisees (Ib. xv. 5, and perhaps xxvi. 5), of the Christian community (Ib. xxiv. 5, 14; xxviii. 22). So Constantine (Euseb. H. E. x 5, §§ 21, 22) speaks of the church as ἡ αἵρεσις ἡ καθολικὴ, ἡ ἀγιοπάτη αἵρεσις. We are concerned with the term mainly in the second of these significations.

The word was used by the early fathers with a good deal of latitude to designate systems which adopted, or professed to adopt, any Christian element whatever (Burton, Bampton Lect. p. 12); so the Trullan council (c. 95) applies the word "heretic" alike to those who were, and to those who were not, reckoned Christians; but it is generally applied to those who, holding the leading truths of the faith, deviate in some point or points.

To define heresy is, as St. Augustine says (De Haeret. Praef.), "altogether impossible, or at any rate most difficult;" and when first asked to write a book on heresy himself, he illustrated the difficulty by pointing out (Ep. 222, ad Quodvult.) that Philastrius bishop of Brescia, in his book of heresies, enumerated 28, which had originated among the Jews before Christ, and 128 afterwards, but that Epiphanius of Cyprus discovered only 80 altogether. But he is careful to note (Epist. 43) that, whatever be the definition, it is not the mere falseness of an opinion, but the spirit in which it is held, that constitutes heresy; they who do not defend a wrong opinion in an obstinate temper (pertinaci animositate), especially they who are in error mainly by the accident of birth, are not to be reckoned heretics. With which accords the common definition, that heresy is "pertinax defensio dogmatis ecclesiae universalis iudicio condemnati." See Decretum Grat. Cau. xxiv. qu. iii. c. 29 ff. The law of the emperor Arcadius, dated A.D. 385, and given in the Codex Theod. (XVI. v. 28), is the first legislative definition. "Qui vel levi argumento a iudicio catholicae religionis et tramite detecti fuerint deviare," which is modified by another expression of the same Arcadius (Code, L. 13, De Paganis), "qui a Catholicae Religionis dogmate deviare contendunt," where the word "contentund" is held to refer to the same pertinacity in maintaining an opinion on which Augustine dwells (Van Espen, pt. iii. tit. iv. c. 22 ff.). Van Espen considers this, if not an absolutely accurate description, to be that which has governed the subsequent practice of the church. He maintains its soundness as a definition, because on the one hand it allows no deviation whatever from the Catholic creed, and on the other tolerates a reasonable latitude of speculation by taking no cognizance of constructive heresy. To constitute the canonical offence the heresy must consist—i., in a departure, not from the implied belief of Christianity, but from that which the church through her creeds and canons has declared to be a matter of faith; ii., the error must be persistent and wilful, and, as Augustine points out (De Civ. Dei, xviii. 51), after admonition; iii., it must not only be suspected but detected and adjudicated upon. (Van Espen, Jus Eccl. III. iv. 2; Field, Of the Church, iii. cc. 3, 4).

2. i. The cognizance of heresy was vested in the bishops separately, as well as collectively. It belongs exclusively to the spiritual office, says Ambrose (Ep. 21), addressing the emperor Valentinian, to decide on matters of doctrine.

^a The Greek form of doxology after the Psalms does not contain the clause "Sicut erat in principio" (Goar Euchol. notae in Laud. Off.).

The episcopate was held to be one, where the faith was concerned, and each bishop was charged with maintaining it, although for practical convenience his government extended only over a single diocese. This jurisdiction granted to the bishop in matters of faith appears from the power possessed by him in the ante-Nicene church of varying the expressions of the creed in use in his diocese, in order to meet prevailing heresies; provided, of course, that the fundamental unity of the faith was unimpaired; instances of such variations are given in Bingham, Antiq. II. vi. 3. The reference to the belief of individual bishops as a standard of doctrine is further evidence in the same direction. Thus Theodosius in a rescript quoted in Sozomen (H. E. vii. 4) exhorts his subjects to keep the faith delivered by St. Peter, and by Damasus of Rome, and Peter of Alexandria. Other references of the kind are collected in Gothofred's commentary on Codex Theod. xvi. 1, de fide Catholic. It was an exercise of this authority by Gelasius bishop of Rome, A.D. 492-6, condemning in a decretal epistle the writings of Faustus the Semi-pelagian archbishop of Riez, which gave rise to the first Roman catalogue of forbidden books. After the empire became Christian, attempts were made by some of the emperors to arrogate to themselves this spiritual jurisdiction of the bishops. The first instance of the kind, unless the laws of Theodosius on heretics are to be regarded as such, is that of the usurper Basiliscus, emperor of the East, 475-7, who issued an encyclic letter condemning the council of Chalcedon, and laying down definitions of faith. An example followed with more success by Justinian, whose edicts on doctrine as well as discipline obtained acceptance by being promulgated through the patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops. The ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne also trenched upon the same prerogative; discussion was permitted in the synods summoned by him, but the emperor reserved the decision to himself, and issued the decrees in his own name. But no ecclesiastical authority superseded that of the bishops till A.D. 1204, when two Cistercian abbots were sent by Innocent III. to the south of France to investigate the Albigensian heresy; and in 1231 Gregory IX. issued a commission to the Dominicans to constitute a special court of heresy; this was the beginning of the Inquisition. (Van Espen, Jus. Eccl. I. xxii. 3.)

ii. The general power of each bishop to defend the faith was restricted, in dealing with an individual heretic, to his own diocese. If the accused was one of the clergy, the bishop was required in the African church to take neighbouring bishops to sit with him (1 Conc. Carthag. c. 11; 2 Conc. Carthag. c. 10); but this rule was not confined to accusations of heresy. With the bishop in some instances sat the presbyters—whether or not this privilege was universally conceded to them. The synod of Antioch, A.D. 264, which condemned Paul of Samosata, contained presbyters (Euseb. H. E. vii. 28). So the first condemnation of Arius was not pronounced by Alexander bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 319, till he had summoned the presbytery and some other bishops to hear the charge (Epiph. Haer. 69, c. 3). And the accusation against Pelagius was first heard before John, bishop of Jerusalem, and a synod of his presbyters, A.D. 415. If objection was made to the decision of the bishop, an appeal lay to a larger council, either of the province, or finally of the whole church; instances of which are too notorious to need citing. A bishop charged with heresy could be tried only by a synod of bishops. The officer charged with the preliminary investigation is designated by one of the laws of Justinian (Novel. 137, c. 5). "If any clergyman is accused in point of faith, if he is a bishop he shall be examined before his metropolitan, but if he is a metropolitan then before the patriarch."

3. The penalties attached to heresy were both ecclesiastical and civil.

i. By ecclesiastical law an obstinate heretic was excommunicated, and if he continued contumacious, his exclusion from church-membership was made more rigorous. The 6th canon of the council of Laodicea forbids those who continue in their heresy to enter the house of God. But this exclusion could not have been universal, for the 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 84) distinctly prohibits the bishop from preventing Gentiles, Jews, or heretics from being present in church during the Missa Catechumenorum; and the council of Valencia, A.D. 524 (c. i.) orders the gospel to be read before the oblations, so that heretics, among others, may have an opportunity of hearing [cf. HEATHEN]. Another stigma affixed to heretics was the rejection of their evidence in any ecclesiastical court against a Catholic. The Apostolical Canons (c. 74) say expressly that the evidence of a heretic shall not be received against a bishop. The 129th canon of the African code also mentions heretics among other infamous persons whose testimony was inadmissible (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 96). The so-called 6th canon of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, guards this disability from abuse by confining it exclusively to ecclesiastical causes; if a heretic had a civil cause of complaint against a bishop, the council allowed him his remedy; but the Justinian code deprived him even of this. Another class of penal enactments was directed to the protection of the orthodox from the infection of heresy. One of the Apostolical Canons (c. 45) forbids, under pain of suspension, any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to pray with heretics, or permit them to officiate; another (c. 63) inhibits either clergy or laity from worshipping in a synagogue of heretics. The council of Laodicea (c. 9) would not permit Catholics to frequent the cemeteries or celebrations of so-called martyrdoms of heretics, nor (c. 33) tolerate any devotions with them. The 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 71), pronounces the assemblies of heretics to be not churches but conventicles; and (c. 72) prohibits both praying and singing psalms with them. The Spanish council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 13), rejects the oblation of any who has presented his children for baptism by a heretic; this must mean, not in a case of necessity, where it would be admitted, but deliberately. (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. i. 4). Social intercourse with heretics was also prohibited. "A clergyman must avoid both the entertainments and the society of heretics" (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 70; 1 Conc. Tol. c. 15; 1 Conc. Turon. c. 8; Conc. Venet. c. 3). Augustine relates (Confess. iii. 11) that while he was a Manichaean his mother would not sit at the same table with him. The council of Laodicea (c. 32) forbids Christians to receive the EULOGIAE of heretics, and also (cc. 10, 31) to intermarry with them. This last prohibition appears to have been universally enforced (Conc. Eliber. c. 16; Conc. in Trull. c. 72). The laws of the church are not so strict as the civil edicts afterwards became in prohibiting the study of heretical books; there is one canon (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 16) which forbids a bishop to read heathen authors under any circumstances, and heretical ones unless time or necessity require.

ii. The civil proceedings against heretics began with some edicts of Constantine against the Donatists, A.D. 316; but a much more extensive series of laws was enacted by Theodosius the Great with a view to put an end to the divisions of the church arising from the controversies of the 4th century, and to enforce uniformity of belief by legal penalties. The first of these was passed immediately after the general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and between that period and A.D. 394, fifteen other such edicts were published. A further law was enacted by Honorius, A.D. 408, and others in the East by Arcadius and the younger Theodosius, and others again by Justinian, A.D. 529. The laws are chiefly contained in book xvi. tit. v. de Haereticis of the Theodosian Code, although a few are to be found under other titles. Here it will be sufficient to give a bare abstract of the most severe of them. Heretics were deprived of all offices of profit or dignity in the state; they could neither receive nor bequeath property; no civil contract with them was binding; they were fined, banished, subjected to corporal punishments, and even sentenced to death. Other laws were designed to prevent the propagation of heresy. No heretical assemblies might be held, nor conventicles built, nor clergy ordained; their books were to be burnt and their children disinherited. These edicts were not directed against all heretics indiscriminately, but against various sects which were held to be most dangerous to faith or morals. From the account of Sozomen (H. E. vii. 12), they were intended to strike terror rather than to be executed; but heretics were always exposed to them, and, in one conspicuous instance, the most severe penalty, that of death, was inflicted on Priscillian and some of his adherents; the first example in the church of any one being put to death for his opinions.

4. i. The admission of heretics to the church is closely involved with the controversies of the 4th century on the validity of heretical baptism [BAPTISM, ITERATION OF, p. 172]. Their bearing on the reconciliation of heretics, and the further question of the relation in which the practice of anointing converts from heresy stands towards the rite of confirmation, are discussed in Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11). This article is concerned only with any rites or terms of admission which indicate the course of canonical discipline. The council of Eliberis (c. 22) appoints ten years' penance to those who had deserted the faith and afterwards returned, with a proviso that if they had lapsed in infancy they should be received back without delay. Later councils (Conc. Agath. c. 60; Conc. Epaoon. c. 29) deprecating this severity, reduce the term to two years, on condition that the penitent fasts three days a week and comes frequently to church. Longer penalties were exacted from those who had submitted to re-baptism among the heretics, the earlier practice in this too being more severe; the 1st council of Valence, A.D. 374 (c. 3), denies communion to them till the hour of death, that of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 9), only for nine years. In this, however, as in other points of discipline, much was left to the discretion of the bishop (Conc. Agath. c. 60; 4 Conc. Aurel. c. 8). In general the practice of the church, which is involved in some obscurity, appears to have been to admit converts without any actual penance, submitting them however to some outward form or ceremonial of penitence (sub imagine poenitentiae, Innocent: Ep. 18, ad Alexan. c. 3). A letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 61, ad Quirin.) directs that those who had once been baptized in the name of the Trinity should be received by imposition of hands, which was the Western use, or by unction, which was that of the East, or by a profession of faith.

Of these forms of reconciliation that by imposition of hands was the earliest. It is spoken of by Eusebius (H. E. vii. 2) as a practice which was ancient in the time of Stephen, bishop of Rome, A.D. 253-7; Cyprian also calls it the ancient custom in his time (Ep. 71 ad Quintum). It was prevailing in the time of Innocent (Epp. 2 ad Victoric. c. 8, 22 ad Epis. Macedon. cc. 4, 5); it was known to Augustine (de Bapt. c. Donat. iii. 11, ibid. vi. 15), and was the subject of the decrees of various councils (1 Conc. Arelat. c. 8; Conc. Nicaen. c. 8). By a canonical epistle of Siricius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 384-98, heretics were to be admitted by imposition, together with invocation of the Spirit. But the statement of Gregory that imposition of hands was the Western custom, and unction the Eastern, is only partially correct. Unction was in use in both the Spanish and the Gallic churches (1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epaoon. c. 16), and it is likely that when Gregory wrote he was referring only to the principal church of the West, that of Rome (Martene de Rit. iii. 6).

ii. In the 4th century, converts from some heresies were received into the church by unction, with formal renunciation of their errors (Conc. Laod. c. 7; 1 Conc. Constant. c. 7). The Trullan council, following the 1st of Constantinople, describes the manner of admission; "We receive Arians, Macedonians, Novatians, Quartodecimans, and Apollinarians, when they give in written forms of belief (ἁβέλλους; for instances of this practice see Soc. H. E. iv. 12, Soz. H. E. iii. 22), and anathematize every heresy not according with the mind of the holy and apostolic church; sealing (that is, anointing) them with the holy ointment on the forehead, and eyes, and nostrils, and mouth, and ears; and as we seal them, we say, 'The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost.'" The Arabic version of the Nicene canons (c. 31, Hardouin, vol. i. p. 468) has another form of admission. "If any one is converted to the orthodox faith he must be received into the church by the hands of the bishop or presbyter, who ought to instruct him to anathematize all who oppose the orthodox faith and contradict the apostolic church. He ought also to anathematize Arius and his heresy, and openly and sincerely profess the faith. After this the bishop or priest whose office it is, shall receive him and anoint him with the unction of Chrism, and sign ain three times while anointing him, and praying over him in the prayer of Dionysius the Areopagite, and prayer shall be made earnestly to God for him, and then he may be received." With regard to other heresies, the canon of the Trullan council already cited proceeds to make the following provisions. "About the Paulinists the Catholic church defines, that they are to be baptized anew; but as to the Eunomians, who baptize with one immersion, the Montanists . . . and the Sabellians . . . and all the other heresies . . .; all who will come over to orthodoxy from these we receive as converts from paganism (ὡς ἑαλληνας); and the first day we make them Christians, the second catechumens, and on the third day we exorcise them, after breathing thrice on the forehead and ears [EXORCISM]; and so we go on to catechise them, and cause them to tarry in the church and listen to the Scriptures; and then we baptize them. And the Manichaeans, and the Valentinians, and the Marcionites, and those who come from such-like heresies must give in libelli, and anathematize their own heresy, and Nestorius and Eutyches, and Dioscorus and Severus, and the other ringleaders of such-like heresies, and those who hold their own and the other aforementioned heresies; and so they may be admitted to Holy Communion."

iii. In the case of those who came into the orthodox faith from the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, the church appears to have been satisfied with a solemn profession of faith by the convert. This is frequently insisted upon by Leo (Epp. i. 6; vi. 2; xiv. xxvii. 4). The 2nd council of Seville, A.D. 618, received in this form at its twelfth sitting an heretical Syrian bishop. The bishop made a solemn statement of his errors and of the truth, and confirmed it with an oath. In later periods an oath became an indispensable part of the ceremonial. A Roman synod under Leo III., A.D. 799, required a certain bishop Felix not only to abjure his heresy and write out a form of faith, but also to swear over the holy mysteries to observe his orthodox profession; he was then required to place it over the body of St. Peter, and swear he would never dare repeat his heretical opinions. Cotelierus (Apost. Const., v. 13, note) prints part of an ancient Eastern ritual containing a form of renunciation of the Armenian heresy, which concludes with the following imprecation: "If I make this profession with hypocrisy, or return to my heresy openly or secretly, may all calamities overtake me, the dread of Cain and the leprosy of Gehazi, and in the world to come may I be anathema and catathema, and may my soul be sent to Satan and his devils."

iv. The form of admission in use in the East in the 8th century is given by Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 9) from a very ancient Greek Euchologion. Those to be received must fast ten or fifteen days, and prostrate themselves in prayer morning and evening like the Catechumens; they may then be thought worthy of the orthodox faith and be initiated. The priest is to bring each into the baptistery, and say to him, "Curse N. and his doctrines, and those who agree with him, for I renounce him and every heretical doctrine, and I believe in the holy and consubstantial Trinity." And the priest shall say to the convert three times, "Dost thou believe in the holy and con-substantial Trinity?" and the convert shall reply "I do." He shall then kneel, and the priest shall lay his hand upon his head and pray as follows . . . After which he shall anoint him with oil with the same form as if he were a neophyte, and say this prayer . . . The convert may then communicate, and he must be instructed not to eat flesh seven days, nor wash his face, but, as the baptized do, persevere for seven days, and on the 8th day wash and be dismissed.

The following example of a prayer used for those who were reconciled, after having been rebaptized by heretics, is from a ritual found at Toulouse, at Rheims, and in Sicily: "God who restorest man, made after thine own image, to that which Thou hast created, look down in mercy upon this Thy servant, and whatever ignorance and heretical perverseness has crept into him, do Thou in Thy pity and goodness pardon, so that any wickedness which he has committed through the fraud of the devil or the iniquity of the Arian falsehood, may not be laid to his charge, but that having been transformed by Thy mercy, and having received the communion of Thy truth at the sacred altars, he may be restored a member of the catholic church."

Heresy as a canonical offence is dealt with by Van Espen (Jus Eccl. Pars iii. tit. iv. c. 2). The admission of heretics to the church is a very complicated subject, owing to the endless varieties of heretical sects. See Martene (de Rit. iii. 6), Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11), Suicer (s. v. αἰρετικός), and Bingham (Antiq. XIX. ii.). A list of the early and mediæval writers on heresy is given in the preface to Burton's Bampton lectures on Heresies of the Apostolic Age. [G. M.]

HERMITS. Some mediaeval writers on monasticism define hermits (eremitae) as solitaries in cells, and anchorites (anachoretæ) as solitaries without any fixed dwelling place; more correctly anchorites are solitaries who have passed a time of probation as coenobites, and hermits those who enter on the solitary life without this preparation (Martene, Reg. Comm. Bened. c. 1; Isid. De Div. Off. ii. 15). Generally the word "eremite" includes all solitary ascetics of one sort or another; other designations of them in early ecclesiastical writers are ἀθληταί, ἀσκηταί, μονάζοντες, φιλόθεοι, φιλοσοφούντες, κατηγμένοι, viri Dei, renunciants, continentines, cellulani, inclusi, reclusi, monachi, &c.; and, later, religiosi. The words μοναχὸς and μοναστηρίον were soon transferred from the hermit in his solitary cell to the coenobite in his community.

The asceticism of the desert was among Christians the first step towards the asceticism of the cloister. It was prompted by a passionate longing to fly from the world to escape not merely the fury of the Decian or Diocletian persecutions, but the contaminations of surrounding heathenism. It commended itself to devout Christians by reasons, which, however specious, really contradict and cancel each other, for it seemed at once a refuge from spiritual dangers, and a bolder challenge to the powers of darkness to do their worst; at once a safer, quieter life than the perilous conflict day by day with an evil world, and, in another aspect, a life of sterner self-denial. In the pages of its panegyrists the solitary life presents itself now in one and now in the other of these irreconcilable phases, according to the mood or temperament of the writer. It may be replied, that, far from being either more heroic or more free from danger, it is neither.

Until about the middle of the 3rd century the more austere Christians were only distinguished by such epithets as οἱ σπουδαῖοι or οἱ ἐκλεκτότεροι, without withdrawing from the society of their fellows (e.g. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11; Clem. Alex. H. mil. "Quis Dives?" n. 36). About that time, Antony and Ammon in Egypt, and Paul in the Thebaid led the way to the desert; and their example soon found a crowd of imitators (Socr. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. i. 13, 14; Hier. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.). In Syria Hilarion, in Armenia Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, in Cappadocia Basil urged on the movement. It spread quickly through Pontus, Illyricum, and Thrace westwards; and the personal prestige of Athanasius, an exile from his see, helped to make it popular in Italy at Rome (Niceph. H. E. ix. 16; Aug. de Op. Mon. c. 23; Hier. Ep. 16; Epitaph. Marcel.). But the solitary life never found so many votaries in Europe, as in Egypt and in the East; partly because of the comparative inclemency of the climate, and the proportionate need of more appliances to support life, partly of the more practical character of the West.

The institution of Lauras was the connecting link between the hermitage and the monastery, in the later and more ordinary use of that word.

Pachomius at Tabenna in Upper Egypt had already begun to organise a community of hermits, by arranging that three should occupy one cell, and that all who were near enough should meet together for the daily meal (Soz. H. E. iii. 14; Pallad. Hist. Laus.). The monks of Mons Nitrius, too, near the Lake Mareotis, though many of them in separate cells (οἰκήματα μοναχικά σποραδῆν, τὰ Κελλία, Soz. H. E. vi. 31) had refectories for common use, chapels in their midst for common worship on Saturdays, Sundays and holy days, certain presbyters appointed to officiate in these, and certain lay officers, (oeconomi) elected* by the older hermits to provide for their temporal wants, such as they were, and to transmit their scanty alms (diaconia) derived chiefly from the sale of the rush mats which they wove (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. iii. 1; x. 2; xviii. 5; xxi. 9). In the Thebaid a hermit named Joannes presided over a large number of hermits (Soz. H. E. vi. 28, 29). One of the first "Lauras," or irregular clusters of hermits dwelling close together, was at Pharan near the Dead Sea in the 4th century; another was founded near Jerusalem in the next century by Sabas a hermit from Cappadocia, under the patronage of Euthymius.

The early ecclesiastical histories teem with the almost suicidal austerities of the more celebrated hermits. Not content with imposing on themselves the burden hard to be borne of a lifelong loneliness—for even without any vow of continuance it was very rarely that a hermit returned to the companionship of his fellows—and of a silence not to be broken even by prayer, they vied with one another in devising self-tortures; wandering about, almost naked, like wild beasts; barely supporting life by a little bread and water, or a few herbs; only allowing their macerated frames three or four hours sleep in the twenty-four, and those on the bare rock or in some narrow cell where it was impossible to straighten the limbs; counting cleanliness a luxury and a sin; maiming themselves, sometimes with their own hands, to escape being made bishops by force; and shunning a moment's intercourse even with those naturally dearest (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. ii. 6, 17; Socr. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. vi. 29, 34; cf. Rosweyde Vitæ Patr. pass.). It was only in the decline of this enthusiasm that hermits began to take up their abode near cities. The "father of hermits" used to compare a hermit near a town to a fish out of water (Soz. H. E. i. 13).

Usually the hermit's abode was in a cave, or in a small hut which his own hands had rudely put together (Evagr. H. E. i. 21); but some, like the "possessed with evil spirits" in Gadara mentioned in the New Testament, had their dwellings in tombs (Theodoret. Philoth. c. 12); hence they were called μεμορταί, and the keeper or superintendent of these tombs the μεμοροφύλαξ (Altes. Ascetic. i. 7). Others roved about incessantly, to avoid the visits of the curious, like the "gyrovagi" in having no fixed abode, but unlike them in keeping always alone (Sulp. Sev. Dial. de Mon. i. 9), and in feeding only on the wild herbs which they gathered [see BOSCH]. Others, the "Stylitæ," aspiring to yet more utter isolation, planted themselves on the summit of solitary columns. Of these the most famous were the Simeon, who in Syria during the 5th century is said to have lived forty-one years on a tall pillar the top of which was barely three feet in diameter (Evagr. H. E. i. 13; ii. 9; Theodoret, Philoth. c. 26); his namesake who followed his example in the 6th century (Evagr. H. E. vi. 22); and a Daniel, who chose for the scene of his austerities a less dreary neighbourhood, a suburb of Constantinople (Theodor. Lect. H. E. i. 32). Other "stylitæ" are mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Prat. cc. 27, 28, 57, 129). This peculiar form of eremitism was very unusual in Europe. A monk near Treves in the 6th century tried the experiment on the top of a column rising from the summit of a cliff; but by order of the bishop soon relinquished the attempt on account of the rigour of the climate (Greg. Turon. Hist. viii. 16).

The reverence with which hermits were popularly regarded led to their aid being frequently invoked when controversies were raging. Thus in the close of the 4th century Antony, who is also said to have more than once broken the spell of his seclusion in order to go and plead the cause of some poor client at Alexandria (Soz. H. E. i. 13), being appealed to in the Arian conflict not only addressed a letter to the emperor, but made a visit in person to Alexandria on behalf of Athanasius (Soz. H. E. ii. 31; Hieron. Ep. 33, ad Castruc.). The hermit Aphraates boldly confronted the emperor Valens, as did Daniel, the later of the two pillar-hermits of that name, the emperor Basiliscus (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 23; Theod. Lect. Collectan. i. 32, 33). The great Theodosius consulted the hermit Joannes (Soz. H. E. vii. 22). The hermits near Antioch interceded with good effect when the magistrates of that city were about to execute the cruel orders of the exasperated emperor (Chrys. Homil. ad Ant. xvii.). But not rarely the unreasoning zeal of the hermits provoked great tumults; and sometimes in a misguided impulse of indiscriminating pity they endeavoured by force to liberate criminals condemned by the law. Nor were their sympathies always on the side of the orthodox. When Theophilus of Alexandria denounced the error of the Anthropomorphitæ, almost all the Saitic monks were fiercely incensed against him as an atheist "in their simplicity" as Cassian adds, (Cass. Coll. x. 2).

On the comparative excellency of the eremitic or of the coenobitic life there has been much difference of opinion among writers who extol asceticism; the same writer inclining now to the solitary life, and now to the life in a community, as he views the question from one side or another. Sozomen calls the eremitic life the "peak of philosophy" (H. E. vi. 31). Chrysostom and Basil speak to the same effect (Chrys. Ep. 1; Bas. Ep. ad Chilon.). But Basil in the rule for monks ascribed to him commends the coenobitic life, as more truly unselfish, more rich in opportunities both for helping and for being helped (Reg. c. 7); and so speaks his friend, Gregory of Nazianza (Orat. 21). Jerome, with all his love of austerity, cautions his friend and pupil against the dangers of solitude (Ep. 4, ad Rustic.). Augustine praises hermits; and yet allows that coenobites have a more unquestionable title to revelation (De Mor. Eccl. c. 31). Cassian often speaks of hermits as having climbed to the summit of excellence (e.g. Inst. v. 36; Coll. xviii. 4); at other times he deprecates the solitary life as not good for all, and as beyond the reach of many; and he relates how a devout monk gave up the attempt in despair, and returned to his brother monks (Coll. xix. 2, 3; xxiv. 8).

It was from the first very earnestly enjoined by the leaders of asceticism, that none should venture on so great an enterprise as the solitary life, without undergoing probation as a coenobite (Hieron. Ep. 4 ad Rust.; Cass. Inst. v. 4. 36; Coll. xviii. 4; Joan. Clim. Scala, iv. 27). Benedict compares the hermit to a champion advancing in front of the army for single combat with the foe, and therefore insists on his proving himself and his armour beforehand (Reg. c. 1). Councils repeatedly enforce this probationary discipline (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 7; Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, c. 63; vii. A.D. 646, c. 5; Conc. Trull. A.D. 692, cc. 41, 42). The permission of the abbat was required (Sulp. Sev. Dial. i. 5), sometimes, also, the consent of the brethren (Martene, Comm. in Reg. Ben. c. 1) and, sometimes of the bishop (Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 12). The length of this period of probation varied (Mart. r. s. cf. Isid. De Div. Off. ii. 15). Even those who most admired the hermit-life fenced it round with prohibitions as a risk not lightly to be encountered.

The civil authorities were naturally jealous of this subtraction of so many citizens from the duties of public life. Theodosius ordered all those who evaded their public responsibilities on pretence of asceticism to be deprived of their civil rights unless they returned to claim them (Cod. Theodos. xii.; Tit. 1; Lex 63); and it was forbidden for slaves to be admitted into a monastery without their masters' leave (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, Act xv. c. 4). In Western Europe Charles the Great decreed that all hermits infesting towns and cities for alms should either return to their hermitages or be shut up in monasteries. By the law of the Eastern church a bishop who became a hermit was ipso facto deprived of his office.

It was not unusual, particularly in the monasteries of Provence and Languedoc, for one of the brethren most advanced in asceticism to be immured in a separate cell, sometimes underground, always within the precincts, as an intercessor for the monastery (Menard, Observ. Crit. in Bened. Anian. Cod. Regul. ii.). After a solemn religious ceremony the devotee, thus buried alive by his own consent, was left, with no other apparel than what he was wearing, to end his days alone. The doorway was walled up, or the door nailed to and sealed with the bishop's ring, whose consent, as well as that of the abbat and chapter, was requisite. Only a little aperture was left, not such as to allow the inmate to see or be seen, for letting down provisions to him (Menard, u. s.). These "includi" are not to be confounded with the aged or sickly monks, allowed separate cells because of their infirmities (Cass. Inst. ii. 12; Conc. Apath. c. 38). [See HESYCHASTÆ.] The rule "for solitaires" of Grimlaicus, probably a monk in or near Metz about the end of the 9th century, seems intended not for a separate order, but for these "includi" generally (Bened. Anian. u. s.). It is a characteristic difference between Asiatic and European asceticism, that the eremites, or desert monks of the east find their western counterpart in solitaries within the precincts of the community.

As might be expected for obvious reasons there have been few female hermits. Gregory of Tours mentions a nun of the convent of Ste. Croix, Poitiers, who retired to a hermitage by permission of the abbess Radegunda (Hist. vi. 29). Usually these female solitaries had their cells in close contiguity to the wall of a church or of a monastery (Martene, v. s.).

HERMOGRATES. [HERMOLAUS.]

HERMOLAUS, presbyter of Nicomedia, ἱερομάρτυς, A.D. 304; commemorated with the brothers HERNEMPUS and Hermogrates, July 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); and July 25 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

HERMYLUS, martyr with Stratonicius; (†315 A.D.) commemorated Jan. 13 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

HERNEMPUS. [HERMOLAUS.]

HERODION. [HERMES (3).]

HERON, or HEROS. (1) Bishop of Antioch, successor to Ignatius: "Natalis," Oct. 17 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) [DIOSCORUS (3).]

(3) [HERACLIDES.]

HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF (Herutfordiae concilium). Held at Hertford A.D. 673, Sept. 24; all the bishops of the Anglo-Saxon church then living, except Wini, the simoniacal bishop of London, being present in person or by deputy (Haddan and Stubbs' Councils and Documents, iii. 121, note). Archbishop Theodore, who had summoned them, recited ten canons from a book, in all probability the collection of Dionysius Exiguus from their being all found there, to which all subscribed (Ib.; comp. Mansi xi. 127). [E. S. Ff.]

HERUDFORDENSE CONCILIUM. [HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF.]

HESYCHASTAE (Ἡσυχασταί). Etymologically a term equivalent to "quietists." It was applied to those members of a monastery who were allowed to have separate cells within the precincts that their meditations might be uninterrupted. (Bing. Orig. Eccles. VII. ii. 14; Menard on Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 29; cf. Justinian Novell. 5, 33.) Riddle, however,

(Chr. Antiq. VII. vii.), takes it as a designation of monks bound to silence; and Suicer (Thes. Eccles.) as meaning anchorites, although the passage which he quotes from Balsamon (ad Conc. Nic. II. A.D. 787) distinguishes Hesy-chasteria from "monasteria" and the cells of "anachoretæ." In the 14th century it was applied to the mystics of Mount Athos (Herzog Real-Encyclop. s. v.). [I. G. S.]

HESYCHIUS, ESICHIUS or ESICIUS.

(1) Bishop and confessor at Circesium (sacæ. i.); commemorated with Euphrasius, Indalecius, Secundus, Tesiphon, and Torquatus, May 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Mesia; commemorated June 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HETAERIAE (ἑταιρίαι) were originally political clubs; but the word came to signify any association of men for objects not recognized by the law. Thus Trajan (Plinii Epist. x. 34 [al. 43]) was unwilling to sanction a company (collegium) of firemen at Nicomedia, because he had found that in that district such companies were liable to degenerate into hetaeriae; and it was as hetaeriae that the assemblies of the Christians became objects of suspicion to the state (Ib. x. 96 [al. 97], § 7), and so persecuted (Augusti, Handbuch, i. 40). [C.]

HETERODOXY. [HERESY.]

HEXAPSALMUS (ἑξάψαλμος). By this name are denoted six unvarying Psalms, which are said daily in the Greek office of lauds (τὰ ὕμνον). They are Pss. iii., xxxvii. (xxxviii.), lxii. (lxiii.), lxxxvii. (lxxxviii.), cii. (ciii.), cxlii. (cxliii.). They occur near the beginning of the office; and are introduced by the clause "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will among men," and by the verse "Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall show thy praise." After the first three Psalms are said the priest comes out from the bema, and while the last three are being said, recites the twelve morning prayers (τὰς ἑωθινὰς εὐχάς) secretly before the icon of our Lord. They are concluded with three Alleluïas; and three Reverences. [H. J. H.]

HEZEKIAH, the king of Judah; commemorated Nahasse 4=July 28 (Cal. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

HIBERNICA CONCILIA. [IRELAND, COUNCILS OF.]

HIEMANTES. The word χειμαῖζεσθαι means primarily "to be storm-tossed" (Acts xxvii. 18). Thence, by a natural metaphor, it passed on to the tempest of the soul. Thus Chrysostom (Hom. liii. in Matt.) says that the mind of a man who has many artificial wants is storm-tossed (χειμαῖζεσθαι). Compare James i. 6.

The seventeenth canon of the council of Antioch (A.D. 314) orders those who have committed unnatural crimes, or who are or have been lepers, to be placed at public prayer among the storm-tossed or storm-beaten (εἰς τοὺς χειμαζομένους εὐχεσθαι). This is rendered in the "Versio Prisca," "cum eis qui tempestatem patiuntur orare;" by Dionysius Exiguus, "inter eos orare qui spiritu periclitantur immundo;"

ly Isidorus Mercator, "qui tempestate jactantur, qui a nobis energumeni appellantur [al. furiosi sive energumeni intelliguntur]." To the same effect Martin of Braga (Collect. Can., c. 81), "inter daemones orare." The use of the word in the Clementine liturgy (Const. Apost. viii. 12, § 20)—παρακαλούμέν σε ὑπὲρ τῶν χειμαζομένων ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου—makes it almost certain that the χειμαζόμενοι or Hiemantes are identical with the Énergumēni or DEMONIACS, who had a special place assigned them outside the church proper, whether in the porch or in the open air. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Χειμάζουσαι; Van Espen, Jus Eccl. iii. 132; ed. Colon. 1777). [C.]

HIERAPOLIS, COUNCILS OF. (1) A.D. 173, of twenty-six bishops, under its bishop, Apollinarius, against the errors of Montanus, which gave rise to a sect called from the province in which it originated, and in which Hierapolis was situated, "Cataphryges" (Mansi, i. 691-4). Eusebius has preserved extracts from a work written by Apollinarius himself against them (v. 16).

(2) A.D. 445, under Stephen, its metropolitan, when Sabinianus was ordained Bishop of Perrhe instead of Athanasius, deposed at Antioch under Domnus the year before. Later, Athanasius was restored by Dioscorus of Alexandria. But the Council of Chalcedon, Oct. 31, A.D. 451, deciding for the moment in favour of Sabinianus, referred the final adjudication of the question to Maximus, bishop of Antioch, and a synod to be held by him within eight months to enquire into the charges brought against Athanasius. Should they not have been made good by then, he was to regain his see, and Sabinianus to be allowed a pension. (Mansi, vi. 465-6; and then vii. 313-58.) [E. S. Ff.]

HIERARCHY. 1. The word ἱεράρχης denotes properly a steward or president of sacred rites (Böckh, Inscrip. i. 749). By Christian writers it is occasionally used to designate a bishop (p. 210). Thus Maximus, commenting on the Eccelesiastical Hierarchy of the Pseudo-Dionysius, says, "καλεῖν εἰώθεν ἱεράρχας τοὺς ἐπισκόπους," he commonly calls the bishops hierarchs (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.). Hence the word ἱεραρχία came to designate the order of bishops. Bingham, however (Ant. III. i. 6), considers the hierarchy of Pseudo-Dionysius to include bishops, priests, and deacons, quoting Hallier's Defensio Hierarchy. Eccl. (lib. i. c. 3; lib. iii. sec. ii. cc. 1 and 2).

2. In a wider sense, the word Hierarchy is taken to include the whole series of the orders of ministry in the Christian church. See BISHOP, ORDERS. [C.]

HILARIA. (1) [EUMENIA.]

(2) Wife of Claudius, the tribune; martyr with Claudius and their two sons, Jason and Maurus, and seventy soldiers, under Numerian; commemorated Dec. 3 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HILARINUS, monk at Ostia, martyr under Julian: "Passio," July 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HILARION. (1) The younger (ὁ νεός), A.D. 845; commemorated March 28 and June 6 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) The Great (ὁ μέγας), Holy Father, A.D. 333; commemorated Oct. 21 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Byzant.).

(3) Commemorated Nov. 19 (Cal. Georg.).

HILARIUS, or HILARY. (1) Bishop of Poitiers and confessor (†369 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); deposition Jan. 13 (Mart. Bedae, Hieron.).

(2) Bishop of Aquileia (†285 A.D.); martyr with Tatian the deacon, Felix, Largus, and Dionysius; commemorated March 16 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) Bishop of Arles and confessor (†449 A.D.); commemorated May 5 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(4) Martyr with Proclus, A.D. 106; commemorated July 12 (Cal. Byzant.).

(5) The pope (†467 A.D.); commemorated Sept. 10 (Mart. Usuardi).

(6) Martyr with Florentinus at Semur; commemorated Sept. 27 (Mart. Usuardi).

(7) Bishop and confessor in Gavalis [Gevaudan in Languedoc]; commemorated Oct. 25 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HIPPOLYTUS, Romanus, martyr at Antioch, ἱερομάρτυς, A.D. 269: "Passio," Jan. 30 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Byzant.); Revelatio corporis, Jakabit 6 = Jan. 31 (Cal. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

HIRELING. The flight of the hireling from the wolf, as contrasted with the form of our Lord standing in the door of the sheepfold prepared to defend His flock, is beautifully carved on the Brescian casket, 5th or 6th century. (Westwood, Fictile Ivory Casts, p. 36, no. 93.) [R. St. J. T.]

HIRMOLOGION. An office book in the Greek church consisting mainly of a collection of the Hirmoi; but containing also a few other forms. [H. J. H.]

HIRMOS (εἰρμός). The Cantons, which form so important a part of the Greek offices, are divided into nine odes, or practically into eight, as the second is always omitted. Each ode consists of a varying number (three, four or five are the numbers most frequently found) of troparia, or short rhythmical strophes, each formed on the model of one which precedes the ode; and which is called the Hirmos. The Hirmos is usually independent of the ode, though containing a reference to the subject matter of it; sometimes however the first troparion of an Ode is called the Hirmos. It is distinguished by inverted commas (" ") in the office books. Sometimes the first words alone of a Hirmos are given, and it is not unfrequently placed at the end of the ode to which it belongs. The name is considered to be derived from the Hirmos drawing the Troparion after its model; i.e. into the same rhythmical arrangement. [H. J. H.]

HISPALENSIA CONCILIA. [SEVILLE, COUNCILS OF.]

HISPANUM CONCILIUM. Held, A.D. 793, at some place in Spain, under Elipand, archbishop of Toledo; from whom the document criticised in the letters despatched to Spain from Frankfort emanated (Mansi, xiii. 857; comp. 865 and sqq.). [E. S. Ff.]

HOLIDAYS. [FESTIVALS.]

HOLY! HOLY! HOLY! [SANCTUS.]

HOLY OF HOLIES. In instituting a parallel between the arrangements of the Jewish Temple and that of a Christian church, the BEMA or sanctuary of the church, containing the altar, was naturally held to correspond with the Holy of Holies of the Temple (τὸ ἅγιον τῶν ἁγίων), and was frequently called by that name. But with the Nestorians the "Holy of Holies" is not the sanctuary, but a small recess at the east end, into which not even the priest enters, containing nothing but a cross (Neale, Eastern Church, pp. 177, 189, quoting Etherege, Syrian Churches, p. 109). [C.]

HOLY BREAD. [EULOGIAE.]

HOLY OIL. [OIL, HOLY.]

HOLY PLACES. I. By this phrase were understood, in the first three or four centuries after Christ, chiefly, if not exclusively, the scenes of our Lord's nativity, death, resurrection, and ascension. Of these, therefore, we will speak first. In 212, Alexander, the friend of Origen, "made a journey to Jerusalem, for the sake of prayer and investigation of the places" (τῶν τόπων ἱστορίας, Euseb. Hist. Eccles. i. vi. c. 11). St. Jerome (De Vir. Illust. cap. lxiii.) says that he was drawn thither "desiderio sanctorum locorum." If this was the motive, and there is no good reason to doubt it, Alexander is the first on record whom religious feeling drew to those hallowed spots. Origen himself seems to have carried with him to the Holy Land more of the spirit of a learned and devout traveller of our own day. He was in Palestine in 216 on a rather short visit. In 231, he began a residence of some duration at Caesarea, in that country, and, after an absence of uncertain length, in 238 he opened a catechetical school there. He must, therefore, have known the Holy Land well, and his writings show it; but it is instructive to observe how he uses his knowledge. In one passage, as a critic, he expresses his conviction that "Bethabara," not "Bethany," ought to be the reading in St. John i. 28, "as he had been in the places, on a search after the footsteps of Jesus and his disciples, and the prophets" (Comment. in Ev. Joann. tom. vi. § 24). In another work, writing against an unbeliever, about 247, he alleges the cave of Bethlehem as a piece of evidence. If any one desire further proof than Scripture affords of our Lord's birth in that place, "the cave is shown where He was born, and the manger in which He was swaddled; and that which is shown is widely spoken of in those places, even among aliens from the faith, viz., that Jesus, who is worshipped and revered by the Christians, was born in that cave" (Contra Celsum, l. i. § 51). From the writings of Origen, we should not infer that either he himself had visited, or that it was the custom of his day to visit, the holy places for the express purpose of stimulating devotion, or under the notion that prayer in them was more acceptable to God than when made elsewhere. The spirit which animated the pilgrims of a later age, had not yet been awakened. Its awakening was probably much delayed by the attempts of the heathen to obscure the locality of events sacred to the Christian. Thus, in the time of Hadrian, a vast mound of earth was raised over the spot where our Lord was buried and rose again, and a temple dedicated to Venus was built on it (Euseb. Vita Constantini, l. iii. c. 26; Hieron. Ep. xlix. ad Paulin.).

The first great impulse given to the veneration of the holy places, came from Helena, the mother of Constantine, who, in the year 326, when nearly 80 years of age, travelled to Jerusalem, that she might so "pay the debt of pious feeling to God the king of all," for the elevation of her son, and the general prosperity of her family. After due reverence done to the footsteps of the Saviour, she "left a fruit of her piety to posterity" in two churches which she built, "one at the cave of the nativity, the other on the mount of the ascension" (Euseb. u. s. cc. 42, 43). On the site of the burial, Constantine, after his mother's visit, first caused an oratory to be built, and later sent directions to Macarius, the bishop, for the erection of a magnificent church (Ibid. cc. 25-40). To this period, and perhaps to Constantine and Helena, we may probably refer two "very small oratories," one built on Mount Calvary, the site of the passion, the other on the spot where our Lord's body was said to have been embalmed and the cross found, which the Latins, when they took Jerusalem, inclosed within the same wall with the Holy Sepulchre (Gulielmi Tyrii, Hist. Rerum Transmar. lib. viii. c. 3). They were only a stone's throw from each other (Tillemont, note iv. sur Ste. Hélène); and hence the church of the Resurrection, or Holy Sepulchre, was often spoken of as on Golgotha (Cyrill. Hieros. Cat. i. § 1; xiii. § 12; xvi. § 2). Very soon after the recovery of these important sites we find them noticed in the Itinerary of a Christian traveller from Bordeaux, who visited Jerusalem in 333. He saw the "crypt where His body was placed and rose again on the third day" (Vit. Rom. Itineraria, p. 594, Amstel. 1735), and "the little hill Golgotha where the Lord was crucified" (p. 593). He also went to "Bethlehem, where the Lord Jesus Christ was born. There," he adds, "a basilica was built by the command of Constantine" (p. 598).

II. From this time, the holy places were visited by believers of every rank and almost every age. Some of the more wealthy settled at Jerusalem, and by their alms assisted, and perhaps attracted, many of the poorer. The city grew rapidly in population and prosperity; and soon, as an almost necessary consequence, became as notorious for crime and profligacy, as it was famous for its religious monuments. About the year 380, Gregory of Nyssa was called thither by the affairs of the church, and received impressions which it will be well to put before the reader in his own words. In an epistle, written not long after, he tells his friend that he learned there what it was to keep holy day to God, "both in beholding the saving symbols of God the giver of our life, and in meeting with souls in which like signs of the grace of God are spiritually contemplated; so that he believes Bethlehem, Golgotha, the Mount of Olives, and the Resurrection to be verily in the heart of him who has God" (Ep. ad Eustathiam, &c., p. 16, ed. Casaub.). The latter thought in this sentence then carries him away, and he seems, probably out of tenderness to the devout women to whom he wrote, to avoid further reference to the holy places. Some years afterwards, however, he wrote a tract, in the form of a letter to some unknown friend, in which he earnestly dissuaded from visiting Jerusalem on religious grounds. He begins by denying that it is any part of a Christian's duty "to visit the places in Jerusalem in which the symbols of our Lord's sojourn in the flesh are to be seen," and then proceeds as follows: "Why, then, is there such zeal about that which neither makes a man blessed, nor fit for the kingdom? Let the man of sense consider. If it were a profitable thing to be done, not even so would it be a thing good to be zealously affected by the perfect. But since, when the thing is thoroughly looked into, it is found even to inflict injury on the souls of those who have entered on a strict course of life, it is not worthy of that great zeal, but rather to be greatly shunned." He next enlarges on the danger to the morals and reputation of all, but especially women, in their travels through the luxurious and profligate cities of the East; and then proceeds to ask, "What will one gain by being in those places?—As if the Lord were still in bodily presence in them, but departed from us, or as if the Holy Ghost were overflowing abundantly at Jerusalem, but were unable to come over to us." So far from this being the case, he declares that city to be in the lowest stage of moral degradation. "There is no species of impurity that is not dared therein. Flagitious actions and adulteries and thefts, idolatries and witchcrafts, and envyings and murders; and this last evil, above others, is common in that place, so that nowhere else is there such a readiness to commit murder as in those places" (De Euntibus Hierosolymam, pp. 6–13, ed. Petr. Molinaei). Speaking for himself, he adds, "We confessed that Christ who appeared (there) is true God, before we were at the place; nor afterwards was our faith either lessened or increased. And we knew the incarnation through the Virgin before we went to Bethlehem, and believed the resurrection from the dead before we saw the monument of it, and acknowledged the ascension into heaven to be true, apart from our seeing the mount of Olives. This is the only benefit from our journey, that we know, by comparison, our own parts to be much more holy than foreign. Wherefore, ye that fear the Lord, praise Him in those places in which ye are" (Ibid. p. 14). St. Jerome, who lived at Bethlehem, sometimes speaks very much in the same strain. At other times he encourages and praises those who visited the holy places, especially if their intention was to dwell in retirement near them. This is easily understood. The multitude would be injured by familiarity with the memorials of Christ's life on earth; while the few might through them be brought into closer spiritual communion with Him. It may well be doubted, too, whether he would have encouraged any one to stay at Jerusalem, except under the protection of the monastic life; and even that he was far from thinking altogether safe in such a city. Writing, in 393 or thereabouts, to Paulinus, afterwards bishop of Nola, St. Jerome says, "Not the having been at Jerusalem, but having lived well there is to be praised. . . . The court of heaven is equally open from Jerusalem and Britain. The kingdom of God is within you. Anthony, and all the swarms of monks of Egypt and Mesopotamia, of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia, saw not Jerusalem; and the gate of Paradise is open to them without (a knowledge of) this city. The blessed Hilarion, though he was a native of Palestine, and lived in Palestine, only saw Jerusalem on a single day; that he might not appear to despise the holy places on account of their nearness, nor, on the other hand, to confine God to place." He warns Paulinus not to "think anything wanting to his faith, because he had not seen Jerusalem" . . . "If the places of the cross and of the resurrection were not in a city of very great resort, in which there is a court, a military station, in which there are harlots, players, buffoons, and all things that are usual in other cities; or if it were frequented by crowds of monks alone, an abode of this kind would in truth be one that should be sought for by all monks; but as things are, it is the height of folly to renounce the world, to give up one's country, to forsake cities, to profess oneself a monk, and then to live among greater crowds, with greater danger than you would in your own country" (Epist. xlix.). Nevertheless, when Desiderius and his sister had resolved to visit Jerusalem, he wrote (about 396) to encourage them, begging them to visit him and Paula "on occasion of the holy places." "At least," he adds, "if our society shall be unpleasant, it is an act of faith (or perhaps, "a part of your vow," pars fidei est) to have worshipped where the feet of the Lord have stood, and to have seen, as it were, the recent traces of His nativity, and cross and passion" (Epist. xlviii.). In the same spirit he invites Marcella (about 389) to Bethlehem (Epist. xlv.); and bids Rusticus (A.D. 408) seek peace of mind at Jerusalem. "Thou art a wanderer in thy own country;—or rather not in thy country, for thou hast lost thy country. That is before thee in the venerable places of the resurrection, the cross, and the cradle of the Lord the Saviour" (Epist. xc.). In the famous epistle of Paula and Eustochium (about 389) to Marcella, every inducement is held out to her to join them at Bethlehem; the number, eminence, and holiness of those who visited the holy places from every part of the world, the psalms of praise in every tongue continually ascending from them, the high religious interest of the places themselves, and, in particular, the great piety of the inhabitants of Bethlehem and its neighbourhood; but the truth is not lost sight of, that men might be as holy and devout elsewhere: "We do not say this to deny that the kingdom of God is within us, and that there are holy men in other countries, too," &c. (Inter Epp. Hieron. ep. xlv.).

III. Before the middle of this century (about 347), it was reported throughout the Christian world (see Cyrill. Hier. Catech. iv. § 7; x. § 9; xiii. § 2) that the very cross on which our Saviour died had been discovered, and was exhibited at Jerusalem. According to Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from 350 to 386, the discovery took place in the time of Constantine (Epist. ad Constantium, § 2). As he died in 337, and not a word is said of the cross or its discovery by the traveller from Gaul, already cited, who was at Jerusalem in 333, the story must have arisen and the exhibition of the supposed relic must have begun some time between those years. Later writers (as Ambrose, de Obitu Theodosii, §§ 43-47; Paulinus, Ep. xxxi. § 5; Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. l. i. c. 7; Sulpicius, and later on Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, &c.) assert that it was found by Helena, the mother of Constantine; but that princess died five years before the anonymous Gaul visited Jerusalem; and even if we had not his negative testimony, the silence of Cyril with regard to Helena, and the silence on the whole subject of Eusebius, who, in his panegyric on Constantine, written in 337, has zealously heaped together whatever could tend to his honour, or his mother's, throw just doubt on her connection with the discovery, even if that be true [CROSS, FINDING OF, p. 593]. It is painful to suspect that the cross exhibited was not authentic, but when we find that by the middle of the 6th century (See Greg. Turon. Mirac. l. i. c. 7), if not long before, the lance, reed, sponge, crown of thorns, &c., used at the Passion were all exhibited, and revered with equal confidence, we surely have (not to mention certain difficulties in the story itself) some excuse for hesitating to affirm that the cross shown at Jerusalem in the 4th century and downward, was that upon which our Saviour died. It was believed, however, and our business is chiefly with the consequence of that belief. "Prostrate before the cross," says Jerome, speaking of Paula's first visit to Jerusalem, "she worshipped, as if she saw the Lord hanging thereon" (Ep. lxxvi. ad Eustoch.). Paula herself refers to it, when urging Marcella to join her in Palestine: "When will that day be on which it will be permitted us to enter the cave of the Saviour; to weep with sister, to weep with mother, in the sepulchre of the Lord; then to kiss (lambere) the wood of the cross; and on the Mount of Olives to be lifted up in desire and mind with the ascending Lord?" This will, perhaps, sufficiently illustrate the importance of the alleged discovery, as a means of attracting pilgrims to Jerusalem. From Paulinus we learn that the cross was only exhibited "to be adored by the people" on Good Friday; but that sometimes it was shown to "very religious" persons, who had travelled thither on purpose to see it (Ep. xxxii. § 6).

IV. From one cause or another, then, the resort to the holy places in Palestine continued and increased. E.g. Cassian, A.D. 424, speaks incidentally of some monks who, while he was at Bethlehem, had "come together at the holy places from parts of Egypt orationis causâ" (De Coenob. Instit. l. iv. c. 31). Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius, bound herself by a vow to visit Jerusalem, if she should live to see her daughter married, which, with the consent of her husband, she fulfilled in the year 438 (Socr. Hist. Eccl. l. vii. c. 47). Palladius, a Galatian by birth, who had spent many years in Palestine, writing in 421, tells us that Melania the elder showed hospitality to pious persons going to visit the holy places from Persia, Britain, and almost every part of the world (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 118). Gregory of Tours mentions a Briton who, in his time, came to Tours on his way to Jerusalem (Hist. Franc. l. v. c. 22). Towards the end of the 7th century, Arculfus, a bishop of Gaul, "went to Jerusalem for the sake of the holy places," and being afterwards a guest of Adamnan, abbot of Iona, gave him an account of them. The latter put it in writing, and his work is still extant (Acta Bened. sæc. iii. p. ii. See Bede, Hist. Eccl. Angl. l. v. cc. 15-17).

V. From the middle of the 4th century, or thereabouts, some other places had been acquiring such a character for holiness, as the scene of a martyr's triumph or the shrine of his relics, that they were visited by pilgrims from a distance, and even received the conventional title of Loca Sancta. Thus Rome was famous for the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Chrysostom, alluding to the chain with which St. Paul was bound, says, "I would be in those places, for the bonds are said to be there still. . . . I would see those bonds, at which devils are afraid and tremble, but which angels reverence" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. iv. 1). But with him such a pilgrimage would have been only γυμνασία πρὸς θεοσεβείαν; for he more than once tells his hearers that they need not cross the sea, for God will hear them equally where they are. "Let us each, man and woman [remaining here at Antioch], both when gathering in church and staying in our houses, call very earnestly on God, and He will certainly answer our prayers" (Hom. de Statuis, iii. § 5; cf. Hom. i. in Ep. ad Philem. c. i. 1-3). And he claims a similar sanctity for Antioch, in which city he then lived, A.D. 388, as having been the "tabernacle of the apostles, the dwelling-place of the righteous" (Ibid. § 3). St. Augustine, A.D. 404, sent two persons, who accused each other of crime to a "holy place," viz. the shrine of St. Felix, at Nola, in the hope that "the more terrible workings of God" there "might drive the guilty one to confession, by punishment (divinely inflicted) or by fear" (Ep. lxxviii. § 3). He asks, "Is not Africa full of the bodies of holy martyrs? And yet," he adds, "we do not know that such things are done anywhere here" (Ibid.). Nevertheless, in the last book of the City of God, which was written about the beginning of the year 427, he records many wonders as wrought in Africa, within the few years previous, at the Memoriam of St. Stephen and other martyrs (De Civ. Dei, l. xxii. c. 8). Prudentius, himself a native of Spain, A.D. 405, celebrating the praise of two martyrs, who suffered at Calahorra in that country, says that the dwellers in that city "frequented the sands stained with their sacred blood, beseeching with voice, vows, gift; that foreigners, too, and the inhabitants of the whole earth came thither," and that "no one there, in his supplication, multiplied pure prayers in vain." The poet affirms that many miracles were wrought there by the power of the martyrs, and that Christ conferred that blessing on the town, when He gave their bodies to its keeping (De Coronis, Hymn I.). We must remember that the writer is a poet, but hardly more could have been said of a popular shrine in the 9th century.

VI. Probably not very long after the time of these writers, a custom began of sending penitents to various shrines (ad limina sanctorum), partly as a penance, and partly that they might more effectually obtain the intercession of the martyr of the place. Most writers, following Morinus (De Sacram. Pœnit. l. vii. c. 15), have supposed that this form of penance was not in use till the 7th century; but a passage in one of the Homilies of Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502), first printed by Baluzius in 1669, implies that it was known in France, at least, before the close of the 5th:—"Frequenting the thresholds of the saints, they (penitents) would ask for aid against their own sins, and, persevering in fastings and prayers, or in almsgiving, would strive rather to punish than to nourish, or add to, those sins" (Hom. iii. p. 23). The great evils to which this practice would soon lead are obvious, and we need only, in conclusion, cite a canon of the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, A.D. 813, by which Charlemagne and his advisers sought to restrain them:—"A great mistake is made by some, who unadvisedly travel to Rome or Tours (to the shrine of St. Martin), and some other places, under pretext of prayer. There are presbyters, and deacons, and others of the clergy, who, living carelessly, think that they are purged from their sins and entitled to discharge their ministry, if they reach the aforesaid places. There are also laymen who think that they sin, or have sinned, with impunity, because they frequent these places for prayer." Some of the powerful, it adds, under pretext of a journey to Rome or Tours "for the sake of prayer or visiting the holy places," oppressed the poor by their exactions, while many of the poor made such pilgrimages an occasion of begging with more success: some falsely pretending to be on their way to the holy places, others going there in the belief that they would be "cleansed from sins by the mere sight" of them (can. xlv. Conc. Cabil. II.). [W. E. S.]

HOLY SPIRIT. The dove is the invariable and exclusive symbol which expresses special manifestation of the presence of the Third Person of the Trinity, and the article under that word will be found to contain some information as to the use of the symbol in this its highest sense. Luke iii. 22, Matt. iii. 16, Mark i. 10. The baptism of St. Pontianus, in the catacomb of that name (Aringhi ii. 275), contains one of the earliest of these paintings of the Holy Dove, referable to the early 7th century; but the Lateran cross is reputed to be of the period immediately succeeding Constantine, and is a yet more striking example. HOLY THURSDAY. [ASCENSION DAY.]

HOLY WATER. I. The use of lustral water in the Christian church appears to have had a manifold origin.

(1) At an early period we find FOUNTAINS, or basins, supplied with fresh water, near the principal doors of churches, especially in the East, that they who entered might wash their hands at least [see HANDS, WASHING OF], before they worshipped. There can be no doubt that the ritual use of water under the name of holy water (aqua benedicta, ἁγιασμὸς, ὕδατα εὐλογίας, &c.) arose in a great measure from the undue importance which naturally attached itself to this custom, as ignorance and superstition began to prevail amid the troubles of the Western empire.

(2) Again, under the Mosaic law a person legally unclean was not restored to social intercourse, and to communion in prayer and sacrifice, until he had been sprinkled with the water of separation, and had "washed his clothes and bathed himself in water" (Numb. xix.; compare Ezekiel xxxvi. 25).

(3) The courts of heathen temples were commonly provided with water for purification; but it is probable that as a belief in the gods declined through the influence of Christianity, many would neglect to use it as they entered. Hence, we may suppose, the custom for a priest to sprinkle them at the door, lest any should present themselves unpurified. An instance is mentioned by Sozomen. When Julian was about to enter a temple in Gaul, a "priest holding green boughs wet with water sprinkled those who went in after the Grecian manner" (Hist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 6). This bore such a resemblance to the later rite of Christians as to mislead one transcriber of the work of Sozomen, and induce him to substitute Ἐκκλησιαστικῶ, Ecclesiastical, for Ἑλληνικῶ, Grecian (Annot. Vales. in loco. p. 109).

(4) We may add that the notion of a lustration by water prevailed also among the earliest heretics. Some of the Gnostics threw oil and water on the head of the dying to make them invisible to the powers of darkness (Iren. Haeres. l. i. c. 2, § 5). The Ebionites immersed themselves in water daily (Epiphani. Haer. xxx. § 16). The founder of the sect is said by Epiphanius to have been wont to plunge into the nearest water, salt or fresh, if by chance he met one of the other sex (ibid. § 2).

II. Many miracles are said to have been wrought by means of water, and to this also we attribute a certain influence in giving both authority and shape to the superstitions which arose with regard to holy water. Count Joseph in the time of Constantine the Great, sprinkled an insane person with water over which he had made the sign of the cross, and his reason was restored (Epiphani. u. s. § 10). We are told that by the same means he dispersed the enchantments by which the Jews sought to hinder the erection of a church at Tiberias (ibid. § 12). An evil spirit who hindered the destruction of the temple of Jupiter at Apamea, A.D. 385, was, according to Theodoret, driven away by the use of water which the bishop had blessed with the sign of the cross (Hist. Eccl. l. v. c. 21; Cassiod.

Hist. Tripart. l. ix. c. 34). Gregory of Tours describes a certain recluse named Eusitius (A.D. 532), in the diocese of Limoges, as so gifted with power to cure those afflicted with quartan fever, that by "giving them water to drink merely blessed (by him), he restored them forthwith to health" (De Glor. Confess. c. 82). Water from a well dug by St. Martin "gave health to many sick," and in particular cured a brother of St. Yriez, who was dying of fever (De Mir. S. Martini, l. ii. c. 39); and many were in like manner said to have been healed by the waters of a spring at Brioude, in Auvergne, in which the head of the martyr Julian (A.D. 304) had been washed (Mirac. l. ii. c. 3; see also cc. 25, 26, and the Liber de Passione S. Juliani). The same author relates how a certain bishop "sent water that had been blessed to a house" in which many had died of fever, and how, "when it was sprinkled on the walls, all sickness was forthwith driven away" (Vitae Patrum, c. iv. § 3).

III. The tendency to ascribe virtue to water blessed by the priest, was without doubt greatly promoted by a superstition with regard to baptism, and by the use sometimes made of the water employed at it. St. Augustine, writing in 408, says that some persons in his day brought their children to be baptized not for the sake of any spiritual benefit, but "because they thought that they would by this remedy retain or recover their bodily health" (Ep. xcvi. § 5, ad Bonif. Com.). In the last book of the City of God, written about the year 427, the same father tells us of two persons who were at their baptism suddenly and entirely cured of very serious maladies of long continuance (lib. xxii. c. 8, §§ 4, 5). It was but a short step from belief in such miracles to suppose that the water used at a baptism might have virtue available for the benefit of others than those who were baptized in it. It would be often tested, and several alleged results of the trial are on record. At Osset, near Seville, was a font in the form of a cross, which, according to Gregory of Tours, was every year miraculously filled with water for the Easter baptisms. From this font, after it had been duly exorcised and sprinkled with chrism, every one "carried away a vessel full for the safety of his house, and with a view to protect his fields and vineyards by that most wholesome aspersion" (Mirac. l. i. c. 24; see also Hist. Franc. l. vi. c. 43). A mother put on the mouth of her daughter, who was dumb from birth, "water which she had sometime taken from the fons blessed" (by St. Martin), and she became capable of speech (De Mirac. S. Mart. l. ii. c. 38).

In the East, even in the time of St. Chrysostom, the water from the baptisms at the Epiphany was carefully kept throughout the year, and believed to remain without putrefaction. "This is the day on which Christ was baptized, and hallowed the element of water. Wherefore at midnight on this feast, all draw of the waters and store them up at home, because on this day the waters were consecrated. And a manifest miracle takes place, in that the nature of those waters is not corrupted by length of time" (De Bupt. Christi, § 2). In the West two centuries or so later we find a similar reservation, practised at Rome at least, but, as might be expected, with a more definite purpose. There, after the consecration of the water on Easter eve, "The whole people, whoever wished, took a blessing (benedictionem; compare the use of ἁγιασμός) in their vessels of the water itself, before the children were baptized in it, to sprinkle about their houses, and vineyards, and fields, and fruits" (Ordo Rom. i. § 42; Musae. Ital. tom. ii. p. 26). It will be observed that the water was now considered holy for this purpose after being blessed, and before any one had been baptized in that font. It was an easy transition from this stage of practice and belief to the benediction of water without any reference to baptism, which should nevertheless have the same power of protecting and benefitting house, field, and person, that was ascribed to water taken from the baptismal font.

IV. The earliest example of an independent benediction of water for the above-mentioned uses occurs in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions, but there can be no doubt of its being one of the corrupt additions made to the original recension probably in the 5th century. "Let the bishop bless water and oil. If he is not present let the presbyter bless it, in the presence of the deacon. But if the bishop be there, let the presbyter and deacon assist. And let him say thus: 'Lord of Sabaoth, God of hosts, creator of the waters and giver of the oil . . . who hast given water for drink and cleansing, and oil to cheer the face . . . Thyself now by Christ sanctify this water and the oil . . . and give it virtue imparting health, expelling diseases, putting to flight devils, scattering every evil design, through Christ,' &c. (lib. viii. c. 29). From Balsamon we learn that holy water was "made" in the Greek church at the beginning of every lunar month. The observance of any festival at the new moon was forbidden by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 691; and he regarded this rite as in some manner a substitute for that relic of heathenism. "Owing to this decree of the canon, the feast of the new moon has ceased from time beyond memory, and instead of it, by the grace of God, propitiatory prayers to God and benedictions (ἁγιασμοί) by the faithful people have place at the beginning of every month, and we are anointed with the waters of blessing, not of strife" (Comm. in Can. lxx.).

In the West the earliest mention of holy water not blessed for baptism, occurs in one of the Forged Decretals, ascribed to Alexander I., A.D. 109, but composed probably about 830. It is certain, however, that these fictitious orders, put forth in the names of early bishops of Rome, did not, except possibly in a very few cases, create the practices which they pretended to regulate. The rite existed before, at least in some locality familiar to the author of the fraud. The following decree, therefore, is witness, we may assume, to a custom already of some standing. "We bless water sprinkled with salt, that all being therewith besprinkled may be sanctified and purified. Which also we command to be done by all priests" (Gratian, p. iii. De Cons. d. iii. c. 20). In the same century Leo IV., A.D. 847, in a charge to his clergy, says, "Every Lord's day before mass bless water wherewith the people may be sprinkled, and for this have a proper vessel" (Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 37). The same order occurs in three similar "synodal charges" of about the same period, which have been printed by Baluze (App. ad lib. Reginonis de Eccl. Discipl. pp. 503, 6, 9). In a "visitation article" of the 9th century, it is asked whether the presbyter blesses water, as directed, every Sunday (Ibid. p. 10). Hincmar of Rheims, the contemporary of Leo, after directions similar to his, adds a permission that all who wish may carry some of the water home "in their own clean vessels, and sprinkle it over their dwellings, and fields, and vineyards, over their cattle also, and their provender, and likewise over their own meat and drink" (cap. v. Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 570).

We have argued in effect that the prevalence of a custom in the 9th century implies that it was, to say the least, not unknown in the 8th. In the present case we have a direct proof beside. In the Pontifical of Egbert (p. 34; Surtees Society, 1853), who was archbishop of York from 732 to 766, are forms of prayer for exorcising and blessing the water to be used in the consecration of a church. Referring to the Gelasian Sacramentary (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. col. 738), we find the same forms to be used over water for the purification of any house, the exorcism only being adapted by Egbert to the occasion. The same benediction occurs in the Gregorian Sacramentary, and an abbreviated form of the same previous exorcism (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 225). As it is almost certain that Egbert borrowed his formulæ from a Roman source, we infer that the office for making holy water was in the Roman Sacramentaries a century before the practice was enjoined, as we have seen, by Leo IV. It should be mentioned that the headings of these prayers speak only of water "to be sprinkled in a house," and they were obviously drawn up with reference to that only (Murat. tom. i. col. 738); but as they are followed closely (as in the modern Rituale) by benedictions of new fruits, &c. (Ibid. col. 742; tom. ii. col. 231), and no other express benediction of water is prescribed (except in the Gelasian, for the dispersion of thunder), we may perhaps infer that water once blessed for one purpose was considered available for general use. In all the offices to which reference has been made, the salt which is to be mixed with the water is itself previously exorcised and blessed. [W. E. S.]

HOLY WEEK [EASTER EVE, MAUNDY THURSDAY, GOOD FRIDAY]. The week immediately preceding the great festival of Easter, commencing with Palm Sunday, and including the anniversaries of the institution of the Lord's Supper, the Passion, and Resurrection of Christ was observed with peculiar solemnity from the early ages of the church (Chrysost. Hom. xxx. in Genes.; Hom. in Ps. cxlv.). It was designated by various names—ἑβδομὰς μεγάλη, ἁγία, or τῶν ἁγίων; Hebdomas major, sancta, the former being the earlier title in the Western church (Missal. Ambros. apud Pamel. p. 339) authentica (ibid.) ultima (i. e. of Lent) (Ambros. Epist. 33). From the restriction as to food then enjoined it was called ἑβδ. ξηροφάγιας (Epiph. Hæc. lxx. 12) Hebdomas Xerophagiæ: as commemorating our Lord's sufferings, ἑβδ. τῶν ἁγίων πάθων; ἡμέραι παθημάτων, σταυρώσιμαι; Hebdom. poenosa, luctuosa, nigra, lamentationum: from the cessation of business, ἑβδ. ἀπρακτος, Hebdom. mœta: and as ushering in the Paschal absolution, Hebdomas Indulgentiæ.

The observance of Holy Week belongs to very early, if not to primitive, antiquity. As the historian Socrates has justly remarked (H. E. v. 22), no commemorative seasons were appointed by the apostles, or found any place in the ritual of the apostolic church. But as Easter naturally succeeded to the commemoration of the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt, so the anniversary of the passion took the place of that of the slaying of the paschal lamb, while the sanctity of these holy days was gradually extended to the whole week preceding Easter, which therefore assumed a special character in the Christian year. The observance of Holy Week is accordingly closely connected with that of Easter, and is probably but little later in its origin. The earliest notice of Holy Week, which speaks of it as universally accepted, is in the Apostolical Constitutions, which represent the Eastern custom towards the end of the 3rd century. About the same time, c. 260, Dionysius of Alexandria also mentions it as of universal observance. If we may accept as genuine the ordinance of Constantine the Great given by Scaliger (de Emendat. Temp. p. 776) and Beveridge (Pandect. ii. 163) the sanctity of this week as well as of the succeeding one was consulted by enforced abstinence from public business at the beginning of the fourth century. The whole week was, as far as possible, kept as a strict fast, from midnight on Palm Sunday till cockcrow on Easter Day.

By the Apostolical Constitutions (v. 18, 19), abstinence from wine and flesh was commanded, and the diet restricted to bread, and salt, and vegetables, with water as a beverage. Total abstinence was enjoined on Friday and Saturday, or at least on Saturday "when the bridegroom shall have been taken from them," while on the other days of the week no food was to be eaten till 3 p.m. or the evening, according to ability. The fast was observed in this manner in the time of Dionysius of Alexandria (c. A.D. 260), who in his canonical epistle speaks of some who fasted through the whole six days (ἡμέρας πάσας ὑπερτιθέασιν ἑστίαι διατελοῦντες), others, two, three, or four days, according to power of physical endurance; while some kept no fast at all, and others faring delicately during the first four days sought to make up for their self-indulgence by excessive strictness on Friday and Saturday (Dionys. Alex. Ep. Canon., Routh. Reliq. Sacr. iii. 229). Epiphanius describes the practice in his days almost in the same words (ὑπερτιθέμενοι διατέλουν); some, he adds, ate every two days, others every evening (Epiph. Hæres. xxix. 5; Expos. Fid. 22). Tertullian speaks of the continuous fasts of this week in the phrases jejunia conjungere, Sabbatum continuare jejunis Parasceves. (Tertull. de Patient. 13; de Jejun. 14.) Epiphanius in another place describes the bodily mortifications practised this week, such as sleeping on the ground, strict continence, watchings, xerophagy, &c., and charges the Arians with passing the time in jollity and merriment (Epiph. Hæres. lxxv. 5). Sozomen (H. E. i. 11) relates an anecdote of Spyridon, bishop of Trimythus in Cyprus, illustrating the habit of continuous fasting, ἐπισυνάπτειν τὴν νηστείαν, at this season. All work was as far as possible laid aside, and business, private and public, suspended during the week. From the time of Theodosius (A.D. 389) actions at law ceased, and the doors of the courts were closed for seven days before and after Easter (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. viii.; De Fer. leg. ii. [see Gothofred's Commentary, vol. i. p. 124]; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. legg. vii. viii.; August. Serm. xix.; Ed. Bened. vol. i. p. 741). Those in prison for debt and other offences, with the exception of those guilty of more heinous crimes, were ordered to be released by a law of Valentinian's, A.D. 367, the earliest of the kind, according to Gothofred Comment. vol. ii. p. 273 (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. xxxviii.; de Indulg. Crim. legg. iii. iv.; Ambros. Epist. 33; Chrysost. u. s.). Slaves were manumitted, and there was a general cessation from labour during this and the following week, not only to afford the servants rest but also opportunity of instruction in the elements of the faith (Apost. Constit. viii. 33; Greg. Nyssen. Hom. III. de Resurr. tom. iii. p. 420; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. leg. viii.). The week was also distinguished by liberal almsgiving (Chrysost. u. s.).

The observance of the week may be said to have commenced with the preceding Saturday, when, with reference to John xii. 1-9, the church commemorated the raising of Lazarus—an event assigned erroneously by Epiphanius to that day (Epiphanius. Homil. eis ta báia tom. ii. pp. 152, 153; Neale Eastern Ch. ii. 747). The Gallican liturgies commemorated this miracle the next day (Palm Sunday), known therefore as Dominica Lazari, as appears from the collects of the Missale Gallicum Vetus, and the Sacram. Gallicanum (Muratori ii. 718, 834). On the Saturday the pope was accustomed to give special alms at St. Peter's, in allusion to Christ's words spoken that day (Mar. xiv. 7). (Comes Hieronymi apud Pamel. ii. 21; Sacram. Gregor. ib. 244.)

The Sunday next before Easter, the first day of Holy Week, was distinguished by many different names. The earliest and most constant, indicating the great event of the day, being Palm Sunday; κυριακή, ἑορτὴ τῶν βαλῶν; ἡ βασιφόρος ἑορτή; Dominica Palmarum, or in Palmis, Florum, or Ramorum, or Osanna. A later appellation derived from the same event was Pascha florum, or floridum. From the Easter absolution which followed it was known as Dominica indulgentiæ; and with reference to the great Paschal baptism, Pascha petitem, or competentium (Ordo Romanus), while the mass was styled Missa in Symboli traditione, because on this day, or according to the Ambrosian rite the day before (Miss. Ambros. apud Pamel. i. 336) the creed was recited to the competentes, or candidates for baptism, to be learnt by Easter eve, as was ordained by the 13th canon of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1385; cf. Isid. de Eccl. Off. i. 27. ii. 21). The works of Augustine and other fathers contain sermons delivered on this and the following days to the competentes in exposition of the creed (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 113-135). Palm Sunday was also called capitulavium because on that day the heads of the catechumens were washed in preparation for baptism and confirmation (Raban. De Inst. Cler. c. 35).

The ceremony of the benediction of the palm branches, or other branches that were substituted for them, especially olive boughs, appears in the Sacramentary of Gregory, where it has a special collect (Pamel. ii. 245). The jubilant processions which have long formed so characteristic a part of the ritual of Palm Sunday in the East as in the West, are mentioned by Gregory Nyssen (l. c.) and were introduced almost universally by the end of the 7th century (Augusti Hdbch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 338).

Each day in this Holy Week was one of special sanctity, designated μεγάλη δευτέρα, μεγάλη τρίτη, &c. (Bevereg. Pandect. ii. 163), the observances gradually rising in solemnity to the Thursday in Coenâ Domini [MAUNDY THURSDAY], and the Friday, Passio Domini [GOOD FRIDAY]. The history of our Lord's Passion was recited on successive days, beginning with that by St. Matthew on Palm Sunday, and closing with that by St. John on Good Friday. [E. V.]

HOMICIDE (Homicidium, φόνος). Murder was regarded by the church as one of the gravest crimes. It is joined by Cyprian (de Pat. c. 9) with adultery and fraud, by Pacian (Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 9) with fornication and idolatry, by Augustine (de Fid. et Op. c. 19) also with fornication and idolatry, as one of the three mortal sins which were always to be visited with excommunication. By the laws of the Christian emperors murderers were expressly excepted from the general pardons granted to criminals on occasions of great festivals (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxviii. 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8), and were refused the right of appeal (ibid. XI. xxxvi. 1). In some dioceses the peace of the church was denied for ever to wilful murderers (Tert. de Pudicit. c. 12, Gregor. Thaumat. Can. Ep. c. 7, Comp. Cyprian Ep. 55 ad Anton. on the practice of some of his predecessors with reference to the other great crime of adultery). But in general a murderer was re-admitted to the church after a long term of exclusion. By a decree of the council of Ancyra A.D. 314, c. 22, this term was lifelong; by Gregory of Nyssa (Ep. ad Letoi.) it was fixed at twenty-seven years; by Basil (ad Amphil. c. 56) at twenty. In the Penitential of Theodore (I. iv. 1), a murder committed to revenge a relation, was punished by seven or ten years' penance; but if restitution was made to the next of kin, half the term was remitted. If one layman slew another (ibid. c. 4), he must either relinquish arms or do penance seven years, three of them without wine and flesh; but (ibid. c. 5) if a monk or one of the inferior clergy was slain, the slayer must either relinquish arms and serve God the remainder of his life, or do penance seven years, as the bishop should direct; if a presbyter or bishop was the victim, the matter was to be brought before the king (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 1-8, Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10, 11). In the Dialogue of Egbert (Haddan and Stubbs Councils and Eccl. Doc. iii. 403), there is some variety in the penalty; a layman who slew a bishop was to pay the fine and submit to the term of penance a council should appoint, if he slew a priest the fine was to be eighty shekels; if a deacon, sixty; if a monk, forty. The ecclesiastical law in these instances being in accordance with the well-known system of early English jurisprudence, which allowed homicide and every variety of personal injury to be expiated by money payments. See the laws of Ethelbert, between A.D. 597, and 604, on the payments to be made for murders (cc. 5-7, 13).

and for injuries to the person (cc. 33-72). The laws of Ine of Wessex A.D. 690 (c. 76), contain the provision that if a man slew another's godson or godfather, he must pay "bot" (fine to justice), as well as "wer" (recompence to kindred); and that if the slain was a bishop's son (i.e. confirmation son), only half the payment was to be exacted. For a full account of the laws on injuries to the person, see Turner Anglo-Saxons, vol. ii. pp. 436-447, ed. 1852.

Murder joined with other great crimes was more severely punished. One who used magical arts to slay another, thereby adding idolatry to murder, was denied communion even at the last (Conc. Eliber. c. 6). The same sentence was decreed against a woman who added murder to adultery by slaying the offspring which she had conceived in the absence of her husband (ibid. c. 63), and the council of Lerida A.D. 523, more than two centuries after that of Eliberis, when the terms of penance had become much easier, assigned (c. 2) a lifelong exclusion to any who used sorcery to get rid of the offspring of adultery. In an English Penitential code (Theodor. Poenitent. I. vii. 1) the punishment of homicide combined with adultery, was seclusion in a monastery for life. The parricide or the slayer of any near blood relation was, by the civil law (Cod. Theod. IX. xv. 1), in imitation of the old Roman custom, to be sewn in a sack with serpents and thrown into the water; and if this were generally executed there would be no opportunity for the early church to attach any special stigma to the crime. In England a woman who slew her son, was to do penance fifteen years, with no relaxation except on the Lord's day (Theodor. Poenitent. I. xiv. 25). The parricide or fratricide was assigned by some seven years, by others fourteen, of which half were to be passed in exile (Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10).

The modern distinction between murder and manslaughter was not invariably observed. In the council of Ancyra A.D. 314 (cc. 22-23) a shorter term is imposed upon involuntary than upon wilful homicide. But in the canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa involuntary homicide is explained to mean that which occurs through simple accident; but homicide which is the result of passion, is treated as if it were wilful murder, even if deliberation and intention, which constitute the legal crime of murder, are absent. The distinction however appears in the Penitential of Theodore, where it is decreed (I. iv. 7) that if a man kills another by accident, he shall do penance one year; if in a passion, three years; if over the wine cup, four years; if in strife, ten. Homicide committed at the command of a master or in war was to be subject (ibid. I. iv. 6) to forty days' penance. The chastisement of a slave with such severity that he died, which was a crime on the borderland of manslaughter and murder, was not dealt with so severely as wilful homicide (Conc. Eliber. c. 5, Conc. Epaon. c. 34).

Causing abortion in any stage of conception, or taking or even administering drugs for that purpose, was treated as a form of murder, and a long period of penance was allotted to it (Tert. Apolog. c. 9; Basil ad Amphiloc. cc. 2, 8; Conc. Ancyra. c. 21; Conc. Clerd. c. 2; Conc. in Trull. c. 91). But that there was some laxity of opinion on the crime, appears from one of the English Penitentials (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 12), which excludes from communion for a longer term a woman who procured abortion in order to conceal her shame, than one who did so because she was too poor to maintain her child. Closely allied to this crime was the EXPOSING OF INFANTS. [See that head.]

Anger and strife as tending to murder (Matt. v. 22) were brought under discipline. In the African church (Stat. Eccl. Antiq. c. 93, ed. Bruns) the oblations of those who were at enmity with their brethren were received neither at the altar nor in the common treasury, and they were consequently excluded from communion. A similar decree prevailed in the Gallic church (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 50), those who broke out into open strife were to be removed from all church assemblies till they were reconciled. The discipline of the English church was more in accordance with the practice of the Anglo-Saxon law. He who wounded another in strife was to pay him a recompence, and help to support him till he had recovered, and do half a year's penance; if he was unable to support him, the penance was to extend to a whole year (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 9). [G. M.]

HOMILY AND HOMILIARIUM. The word ὁμιλία designates generally "intercourse," implying the interchange of thought and feeling by words. In a special sense, it is used for the instruction which a philosopher gave his pupils in familiar conversation (Xenophon, Mem. I. ii. 6 and 15). In this sense of "familiar instruction" it passed into Christian usage. Thus St. Luke uses the word ὁμιλήσας of the same address which he had previously described by the word διαλεγόμενος (Acts xx. 9, 11). Compare Euseb. H.E. vi. 19, § 17. Photius (Biblioth. no. 174, 4, in Suicer's Thes. s. v.) notices that the discourses of Chrysostom were properly called ὁμιλαίαι, rather than λόγοι, as being simple, inartificial, popular addresses, in a style rather conversational than formal, while a λόγος was constructed according to the rules of art, and with a certain dignity and elevation of style. Similarly the French Conférence. The council of Ancyra (c. 1) A.D. 314, forbidding presbyters who have sacrificed to idols προσφέρειν ἢ ὁμιλεῖν ἢ ὅπως λειτουργεῖν seems to use the word ὁμιλεῖν as the common technical expression for the address of the presbyter in the liturgy.

Probably the earliest extant addresses commonly called Homilies are those of Origen, who (if he himself applied the term to his discourses) no doubt took it from the schools of philosophy.

The word seemingly did not pass into common use in Latin before the fifth century; for Victor Vitensis (Persec. Vandal. i. 3, p. 10, Ruinart), writing towards the end of that century, speaks of Augustine's popular addresses, "quos Græci homiliae vocant," as if "homilia" were still to some extent strange to his Latin readers.

Augustine had himself made a similar explanation of the word (Op. Ps. 118 [119], Pref.; Epist. 2, ad Quodvultdes). And he also supplies abundant evidence that these homilies were intentionally careless and colloquial in style. So long as all are instructed (he says), let us not fear the critics (Serm. 37, c. 10, p. 187); let not word-catchers ask whether it is Latin, but Christians whether it is true (Serm. 299, p. 1213); it is better that the preacher should be barbarous, and his hearers understand, than the preacher scholarly and the people lacking (On Ps. 36, Serm. 3, p. 285); it is better that critics should blame, than that the people should miss the meaning (On Ps. 138, p. 1545).

See further on preaching, and its place in the liturgy, under SERMON.

At a comparatively early period we find that the custom arose of delivering the sermons of others in churches where the priest was, for some reason, unable to preach. Mr. Scudamore (p. 290) gives the following instances:—

Augustine (De Doct. Chr. iv. 62) thinks it well that those who have a good delivery, but no power of composition, should adopt the sermons of others. Isidore of Pelusium (A.D. 412) wrote a homily to be delivered by his friend Dorotheus, which was declaimed with much applause (Epist. iii. 382). Cyril of Alexandria is said by Gennadius (De Vir. Illust. c. 57 in Fabricii Biblioth. Eccl. p. 27) to have composed many homilies, which (he adds) are committed to memory by the Greek bishops for delivery. The same author relates (u. s. c. 67, p. 31) that Salvian of Marseilles made many homilies for bishops. Some of the Dictiones Sacrae of Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 511) are manifestly written to be preached by some other than the writer, and two of them bear the titles: "Sent to Honoratus, bishop of Novara, at the dedication of the basilica of the Apostles," and "Given to Stephanus . . . to be pronounced by Maximus the bishop." The second council of Vaison, A.D. 529, licenses all presbyters to preach in their districts, and provides (c. 2) that, in case the presbyter, from sickness, is unable to preach, homilies of the Holy Fathers should be recited by the deacons [DEACON, p. 529]. Caesarius of Arles († 542) is said (Life by Cyprian, c. 31; in Acta SS. Ben. i. 645) to have composed homilies, which the bishops in the Frank territory, the Gauls, Italy, or Spain, to whom he sent them, might cause to be preached in their churches. To read the sermons of others seems indeed to have been a recognised practice in the Gallican church. Thus Germanus of Paris (Expositio Brevis, in Migne's Patrol. lxxii. 91) says, that the homilies of the saints which are read after the Gospel, are to be taken merely as preaching, that the pastor or doctor of the church may explain in popular language to the people what has been delivered in the Prophecy, Epistle, or Gospel.

This constant habit of using the sermons of others led in process of time to the formation of collections of homilies, of which those who were unable or unwilling to compose sermons might avail themselves. Bede's Homiliae de Tempore are said to have been much used in this way. This collection contains 33 homilies for the summer half of the year, 15 for the winter; 22 for Lent; 32 for the Saints' Days of the summer half, 16 for those of the winter half; and various Sermones ad Populum. Probably several other collections were in circulation before the end of the eighth century. See Mabillon, Act. SS. Bened. iii. pt. 1, p. 556 ff. But in the time of Charles the Great all the homiliaries in common use in the Frankish kingdom were found to labour under great defects; the homilies which they contained were in many cases written by men of no authority, and they were full of errors both of style and matter. The king, therefore, commissioned Paul Warnefrid, the well-known historian of the Lombards, to draw up a collection of homilies from the Fathers which should be free from these faults. This task he accomplished before the end of the eighth century, probably not later than A.D. 780; for Charles, in the recommendation prefixed to the book, does not style himself Imperator.

In this preface (Mabillon's Anlect. Vet. p. 75, ed. 1723) the king states that in gratitude to God for the protection which He had given him in war and peace, he had set himself to promote the welfare of the church and the advancement of knowledge; he refers to the efforts which he had made to secure a correct text of the Scriptures [CANONICAL BOOKS], and then proceeds to recommend the homiliarium for adoption in the Gallican churches, which his father Pepin had already furnished with chants after the Roman model (Romanae traditionis cantibus). In this collection* the discourses are arranged according to the series of Sundays and Festivals; that form of the Vulgate text is adopted in quotations from Scripture which had been in common use since the days of Gregory the Great.

In the year 813 the council of Rheims (c. 15) enjoined the bishops to preach sermons of the Holy Fathers in the dialect of their several dioceses, so that all might understand, and in the same year the third council of Tours (c. 17) ordered that every bishop should have homilies prepared containing needful admonitions for the use of those under them, and that each should endeavour to translate the said homilies clearly into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue, so that all might more easily understand the things spoken. To the same effect the council of Mayence (c. 2), in the year 847.

The collection of Aelfric (generally supposed to be the archbishop of York, 1023–1051) does not fall within our period; but it was probably the successor of various other collections of English homilies, some of which may have existed before the time of Charles.

John Beleth (A.D. 1162) calls the Book of Homilies (Div. Off. Expl. c. 60) the Homeliarius, and mentions a Sermologus separately among the books which a church ought to have.

* It was commonly attributed in the Middle Ages to Alcuin, and bears in the Cologne edition of 1530 the following title: "Homiliae seu mavis sermones sive conclusiones ad populum praestantissimorum ecclesiae doctorum Hieronymi Augustini Ambrosii Gregorii Origenis Chrysostomi Bedae etc. in hunc ordinem digestae per Alchuinum levitam idque injungente ei Carolo Mag. Rom. Imp. cui a secretis fuit." Possibly the mistake arose from the fact that Alcuin revised the so-called Comes Hieronymi [LECTIONARY]; or he may have revised the work of Warnefrid. See on this point Mabillon (Ann. O. S. Ben. ii. 328) and Rivet (Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 337). The Editio Princeps is that of Speyer, 1482. The author of the ancient Life of Alcuin (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. Saec. iv. pt. i. p. 158) says that Alcuin collected two volumes of Homilies from the works of the Fathers. If he did—which is scarcely probable when Warnefrid's collection had just been authorised—the work is lost.

Durandus uses (Rationale, vi. i. §§ 28, 32) the form Homiliarius [i.e. Liber] as well as Homeliarius.

(Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. 3.340 ff.; Wetzter and Welte's Kirchenlexicon, v. 307; Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, 290 ff.; Ranke in Studien und Kritiken, 1855, ii. p. 387 ff.) [C.]

HONEY AND MILK. 1. The giving of honey and milk to a person newly baptised, as a symbol of the nourishment of the renewed soul, has already been mentioned [BAPTISM, § 66, p. 164].

2. Among the things enumerated by the Apostolical Canons (c. 3), which the bishop is forbidden to bring to the altar [or sanctuary], are honey and milk. The 24th canon of the third council of Carthage also excludes honey and milk from the offerings on the altar, in that it forbids anything to be placed upon it but bread and wine mixed with water. But the 27th of the African canons, repeating this, adds: "Primitiæ vero, seu mel et lac quod uno die solemnissimo in infantum mysterio solet offerri, quavis in altari offerantur, suam tamen habeant propriam benedictionem, ut a sacramento Domini Corporis et sanguinis distinguantur; nec amplius in primitiis offeratur quam de uvis et frumentis." It is evident from this, that at the time when these canons were drawn up, the custom had arisen of placing on the altar the honey and milk for the neophytes at Easter, and (apparently) of consecrating them with the bread and wine. It is this latter practice which is here forbidden; the honey and milk are to have a benediction of their own, but not that given to the eucharistic elements. At the end of the seventh century the placing of honey and milk on the altar was wholly forbidden (Conc. in Trullo, c. 57; cf. c. 28).

(Bingham, Ant. XV. ii. 3; Van Espen, Jus Eccl. iii. 329, 414; ed. Colon. 1777.) [C.]

HONOR. 1. The word is used specially of ecclesiastical dignities or orders. Thus Optatus of Milevis (c. Donat. ii. 24) says, speaking of the attempts of the Donatists to annul the orders of Catholic priests, "quid prodest quod vivi sunt homines et occisi sunt honores a vobis?" So Augustine, Adv. Epist. Parmen. ii. 11; and Conc. Arelat. IV. cc. 1 and 2. In Charles the Great's Capitularies (v. 8), "honorabilis persona" is used apparently to distinguish one in major orders from "ecclesiastici viri" who were only in minor orders (Ducange, s. v.).

2. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572, lays down (c. 2) that no bishop making a visitation of his diocese should take anything from the churches besides the customary honorarium to the see (præter honorem cathedrae suae) of two solidi. We may perhaps discern here the germ of the later use, according to which "honor" means a benefice. [C.]

HONORATUS. (1) Bishop of Arles (†429 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 16 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

cucullus, cuculla, cucullio, capa, cappa). Garments intended for outdoor wear were very frequently provided with a hood as a protection for the head against rain or cold, which might be drawn forward when need required, or might be allowed to fall back upon the shoulders. This would of course be ordinarily, but not necessarily, attached to the dress. The lacerna, for example, was generally furnished with a hood or cowl (see e.g. Martial xiv. 132, 129; and cf. Juvenal vi. 117, 330; viii. 145); so also was the caracalla, which was introduced into Rome from Gaul, and from which the emperor Aurelius Antoninus derives the name by which he is ordinarily known. Jerome refers to it by way of illustration in his description of the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, "in modum caracallarum, sed absque cucullis" (Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, § 15; vol. i. 364, ed. Vallarsi), where the last words imply what was the ordinary fashion of it. A hood was also the appendage of the casula, which Isidore (de Origin. xix. 24) describes as vestis cucullata; of the colobium (see e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis, Gemma Animæ, i. 211; Patrol. clxxii. 607), and of the cope (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iii. 1. 13, who speaking of the symbolism associated with the pluviale, or cappa, adds "habet etiam caputium, quod est supernum gaudium"). As regards the last of these, we may take this opportunity of remarking that Isidore (de Origin. xix. 31) uses the word cappa distinctly in the sense of hood, "cappa . . . quia capitis ornamentum est." As an example of this more restricted meaning of the word, we may cite a remark in a letter of Paulus Diaconus, in the name of abbot Theodemar, to Charlemagne as to the dress of the monks of Monte Cassino, "illud autem vestimentum, quod a Gallicanis monachis cuculla dicitur, et nos capam vocamus . . ." (Pauli Diac. Epist. i.; Patrol. xcv. 1587). He had just before remarked that the word cuculla with them meant the same dress "quam alio nomine casulam vocamus." A later instance is found in the records of a council of Metz (A.D. 888), which enjoins the use of the capa (in the sense of hood) to monks and forbids it to laymen (can. 6, Labb. ix. 414). An earlier council, that of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 816), had restricted the use of the cuculla to monks, excluding other ecclesiastics (can. 125, Labb. viii. 1395). It may be added here that the congress of Gallican abbots and monks, held at the same place in the following year, carefully fixed the size of the cowl, "mensura cucullæ duobus consistat cubitis" (cap. 21; op. cit. 1508). With reference to the foregoing prohibitions, it may be mentioned that the Theodosian code had expressly permitted to slaves, with certain exceptions, the use of the byrrus and cucullus (Cod. Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 1).

The most prominent instance of the use of the hood is to be found in that of the monastic cowl, which is frequently referred to in various Rules, and which formed a special part of the monkish dress at least as early as the time of Jerome. The hermit Hilarion was, according to this father, buried "in tunica cilicium et cuculla" (Vita S. Hilar. cc. 44, 46; vol. ii. 39, 40, ed. Vallarsi). We meet with several allusions to the cuculla in Jerome's translation of the Rule of the Egyptian Pachomius (see e.g. cc. 81, 91, 99).

op. cit. 67, sqq.). Thus the monks in this system were to have two cowls, which were to bear tokens indicative of the particular monastery, and without his cowl and "pellicula" no monk was to appear at divine service or at meals. The Rule of St. Benedict allowed to each monk, in the case of dwellers in temperate climates, a frock and hood (cuculla), the latter to be "in hyeme villosa, in aestate pura aut vetusta" (Reg. S. Bened. c. 55; in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, pt. ii. p. 32; ed. Paris, 1663). The same distinction between hoods for summer and winter wear is also found in the Rule of St. Fructuosus (c. 4; op. cit. p. 139), which allows a couple to each monk, "villata et simplex." The Regula Magistri lays down a wholesome provision as to the hoods and frocks of the monks who discharged the weekly office of cook (c. 81; op. cit. p. 257). The word cucula passed from Latin into Greek, where it appears as κουκούλλιον, etc. Thus, for example, it is mentioned in connection with the monastic dress by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. iii. 14, where he remarks on the Egyptian monks), Pseudo-Athanasius (de Virginitate, c. 11; vol. ii. 116, ed. Montfaucon), and by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740, A.D.), who also appears to allude to the cross on the cowl, still worn by bishops and σταυρόφοροι in the Greek church (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Conventus; Patrol. Gr. xviii. 396). The name ἕν καμηλαύχιον (variously spelled) is given to the hood which covers the under headdress (κάτω καμηλαύχιον) worn by a Greek patriarch who has been a member of a monastic order (see Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. καμηλαύχιον). An illustration of this may be seen in Goar's Euchologion (p. 156; cf. also p. 518), where the patriarch Bekkus is thus figured. This name, however, belongs to a date subsequent to our period.

We may briefly refer in passing to the hood worn after baptism, which is spoken of in connection with the white baptismal robe, but as distinct from it (see e.g. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans [ob. 821 A.D.], de Ordine Baptismi, c. 16; Patrol. cv. 234; Jesse Ambianensis [ob. 836 A.D.], Epist. de Baptismo, ib. 790; Rabanus Maurus, de Inst. Cler. i. 29; Patrol. cvii. 313). We may perhaps further refer to an epistle of Gregory the Great, who blames one Peter, a Jew, for having on the day after his baptism entered a synagogue and placed there, among other things, "birrum album, quo de fonte resurgens indutus fuerat" (Epist. lib. ix. ep. 6; vol. iii. 930, ed. Bened.). For further remarks on this species of hood, reference may be made to Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, i. 54, ed. Venice, 1783; Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. κουκούλλα; Goar's Euchologion, p. 366. [R. S.]

HOPE. [SOPHIA.]

HOROLOGIUM (ὥρολόγιον). An office book of the Greek church, containing the daily hours of prayer, and certain other forms, and which therefore corresponds in a general manner, though with important differences, to the Latin breviary.

The contents of the Great Horologion (ὥρολόγιον τὸ μέγα) which is the fullest form, as described in the edition published at Venice 1856, and approved by the oecumenical patriarch, are arranged in three generic parts (τρία γενικά μέρη) as follows:

1. The office for the day and night hours of the church from matins to compline (ἀπὸ τοῦ μεσονυκτικοῦ ἕως τοῦ ἀποδείπνου).

This part therefore corresponds in the main to the "Psalterium cum Ordinario Officii de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

2. The variable antiphons and hymns, by whatever name they are distinguished, taken from the Menology (which answers to the Roman Martyrology) and from the other office books which contain the variable portions of the office; and whatever is sung in it on Sundays, festivals, and ordinary days.

This part therefore corresponds in some measure to the "Proprium de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

3. Various short offices (ἀκολουθίαι), prayers, and canons; independent of the hours; and for occasional use. Into the details of these it is unnecessary to enter; and would be impossible without considerable explanation.

This part therefore may be compared to the collection of short offices and forms of prayer which are found at the end of the Latin breviary; though the offices contained in it are for the most part different from and more numerous than those in the breviary.

The Horologion is often prefaced by the calendar of the Menology, which begins with September; sometimes (as in a copy I possess, printed at Venice 1523) by "the gospel" according to St. John: i.e. the introduction, and four last chapters; and sometimes (as in another copy in my possession, printed at Venice 1775 "con Licenza de' Superiori"), by the Athanasian creed in Greek, of course without the words which imply the double procession. [H. J. H.]

HORRES, martyr at Nicaea with Arabia, Marcus, Nimpodora, Theodora, Theusetas; commemorated March 13 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HORSE. The horse is represented attending on the Orpheus shepherd [Fresco, p. 696]. As a servant or companion of mankind, he occurs frequently in representations of the Magi (Bottari, tav. cxxiii. &c.). Two horses act as cross-bearers (tav. iii.); and horses of course occur in the numerous representations of the translation of Elijah which are found on sarcophagi and elsewhere. The horses of Egypt are commemorated in representations of Pharaoh and the Red Sea (Ariinghi, vol. i. p. 331), where a mounted horseman accompanies the chariots. In Bottari (tav. clx.) there are two quadrigae, with horses decorated with palm-branches or plumes. Martigny states in this connexion that the horse symbol has been very frequently found in the graves of martyrs, quoting the titulus of the youth Florens (Lupi, Dissert. elett. i. p. 258), and the horses loose and grazing in the tribune of the cemetery of Basilla (Bianchini Not. ad Anast. Prolegomena, t. iii.). [R. St. J. T.]

HORSE-RACING. [CHARIOTEERS.]

HORTULANUS, the gardener of the monastery. The rule of Benedict provided certain deputies (solatia) to assist the cellarer (cellarius) in the larger monasteries. These were, usually, a farm bailiff (granatarius), a butler

(custos panis et vini), and a gardener (hortulanus) (Reg. Bened. c. 31; cf. Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxxi. 17). [I. G. S.]

HOSANNA (or Osanna). This word, adopted from the salutation of the populace at Christ's entry into Jerusalem, occurs in the Mass at the end of the Sanctus, which ends thus: "Hosanna in excelsis. Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini. Hosanna in excelsis." The same words are found in the Greek form of the Sanctus, called ἐπικλῖος ὕμνος; as given in the liturgies of SS. Basil, Chrysostom, &c.

The word also frequently occurs in the antiphons and other parts of the service for Palm Sunday as given in the Latin Processionals, as for instance in the hymn at the Procession:

"Israel es tu Rex, Davidis et inclita proles,

Nomine qui in Domini, Rex benedicte, venis:

Gloria laus et honor tibi sit, Rex Christe Redemptor,

Cui puerile decus prompsit Osanna pium."

HOSEA, the prophet; commemorated Jakabit 27 = Feb. 21 (Cul. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

HOSPITALARIUS. [HOSPITIUM.]

HOSPITALITY. Hospitality, or a friendly reception and entertainment of strangers, was a Christian virtue strongly inculcated in the New Testament, and practised most liberally by the early Christians, until long after the apostolic times.

The feeling of Christian union and sympathy was so strong, that every Christian was ready to receive another as a friend and brother, although previously unknown: a circumstance which excited the astonishment, and even the hatred and misrepresentations of pagan opponents (Tertul. Apol. 39; Lucian, de mort. perij. 13). And one of the means by which Julian hoped to restore the old Roman paganism was an imitation of this Christian liberality. In a letter of his, addressed to Arsaces a chief priest of Galatia, the emperor urges him to take great care of strangers, and to establish houses for their reception (ἐξοδοχέια) [HOSPITALS] in every city, after the example of the Christians (Sozomen, v. 16).

All Christian families in the earlier times considered it their duty to exercise this hospitality, and Tertullian mentions it as one great objection to a Christian woman marrying a pagan, that she would not be able to entertain any Christian strangers in her house (Tertul. ad Ur. ii. 4).

But presbyters, and afterwards bishops, were specially expected to excel in this virtue. Thus Jerome extols the liberal hospitality of the young presbyter Nepotian (Epit. Nepotiani c. 10). And Chrysostom mentions it as a high praise of Flavian, bishop of Antioch, that his house was always open to strangers and travellers, where they received so kind and generous an entertainment, that it might be doubted whether it ought not to have been called the travellers' home, instead of his (Chrys. in Genes. i. 4).

Monasteries also were distinguished by their ready hospitality to Christians coming from distant parts [HOSPITIUM]. Palladius (Historia Lausica, c. 6) describes the hospital or guest-house (ἐξοδοχέιον) which adjoined the church of the Nitrian monks, in which pilgrims might stay, if they chose, two or three years; the first week a guest was not required to work; if he stayed longer, he must work in the garden, the bakehouse, or the kitchen; or if he was a person of too much consideration for menial labour, the monks would give him a book to read. In our monastery, says Jerome, hospitality is our delight. We receive with a joyful welcome all who come to us, with the exception of heretics (Jer. adv. Ruff. iii.). In the Rule of Benedict of Aniane, drawn up at the end of the eighth century, particular directions are given for the reception and entertainment of the poor and of strangers. They were first to join in prayer with the monks; they then received the kiss of peace; water was brought for their hands and feet; and in their subsequent entertainment the strict monastic rules of fasting were to be relaxed in honour of the guests. There was a distinct kitchen for the strangers' use, with officers to superintend it, so that the regular order of the monastery might not be disturbed (Concor. Reg. S. Benedict. § 60, de hospitibus suscipiendis). This relaxation of strict ascetic rules on occasion of hospitality to strangers is also mentioned with approbation by Cassian (Collat. i. 26, and xxi. 14, &c.). The council of Aix in 816 (ii. c. 28), desired a place to be prepared at the gate of a monastery where all comers might be received.

Theopenhanded hospitality of Christians naturally led sometimes to the practice of deceit and imposture on the part of applicants; and to guard against the admission of pretenders, or otherwise unworthy and dangerous persons, it became customary for letters of recommendation [COMMENDATORY LETTERS] to be required. Christians going into a foreign country, or to any place where they were not known, commonly took with them such letters from their bishop, or some other well-known Christian; which letters were, if necessary, to be examined, on their presentation, by the deacons of the place (Constit. Apostol. ii. 58).

In the earlier times Christians received strangers into their own homes; but at a later period, when such hospitality became inconvenient, and hardly sufficient for what was needed, houses were specially built or prepared for the reception of strangers (ἐξοδοχέια). These were established in places where travellers were most likely to resort, or where Christian strangers were commonly most numerous, such as along the lines of travel taken by pilgrims, when the practice of making pilgrimages to holy places had become usual.

At these houses Christian travellers were entertained according to their need, and were sent forward on their way in peace.

A singular remnant of this ancient hospitality still remains at St. Cross near Winchester, where any one who applies at the porter's lodge receives gratuitously a glass of beer and a slice of bread. [G. A. J.]

HOSPITALS. 1. General account of Hospitals.—The remarkable outflowing of benevolence and sympathy with others, which marked the very commencement of Christianity, led immediately to a care for the poor, especially in times of sickness and distress.

From the earliest times the funds of the church were applied to the maintenance of widows and orphans, sick and poor, prisoners and sojourners (Justin Martyr, Apol. I. c. 67). It was the special duty of the deacons and deaconesses to attend to the sick at their own houses (Constit. Apost. iii. 19, and Epiphanius, Fidei Expos. 21). But all Christians, particularly the women who had the most leisure for this purpose, considered it incumbent on them to visit and relieve the sick poor (Epist. ad Zen. et Seren. c. 17, in Justin Martyr's Works, p. 416; Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 4). And this they did without being deterred by any fear of infection in the case of plagues or other contagious diseases; of which a notable example, among many others, was seen in the heroic conduct of the Christians at Alexandria during the great plague there in the time of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260-268). See the account given in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. viii. 22).

Public hospitals for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected as soon as Christianity, being freed from persecution, could display its natural tendencies without danger or restriction. Houses were set apart for the reception of travellers or sojourners (ξενοδοχεία), for the poor (πτωχοτροφεία), for orphans (ὀρφανοτροφεία), for foundlings (βρεφοτροφεία), and for the aged (γεροντοκομεία), as well as for the sick (νοσοκομεία). [HOSPITALITY, EXPOSING OF CHILDREN, FOUNDLINGS.] Several of these objects were often combined in one establishment, so that it is most convenient to treat of them under one head.

Epiphanius (Hæres. 75, c. 1) mentions that Aërius, afterwards known as a heretic, about the middle of the 4th century was made by the bishop Eustathius superintendent of the hospital (ξενοδοχείον), says Epiphanius, called in Pontus πτωχοτροφείον at Sebaste in Pontus. It does not appear that the hospital was then first established, and Epiphanius mentions it as a common custom for bishops of the church to provide for the maimed and infirm by setting up such establishments.

The most complete hospital of which we have any account in antiquity was built by Basil the Great, soon after his accession to the see, near Caesarea in Pontus. St. Basil, defending himself from the charge of seeking to gain undue influence, which had been brought against him before the prefect of the place, says (Epist. 94 [al. 372] ad Heliam), "Whom do we injure, in building lodgings (καταγάγια) for the strangers who stay with us in passing through, and for those who need attendance (θεραπείας) in consequence of infirmity? What, in supplying necessary comfort for these persons, nurses, medical attendants, means of conveying them (τὰ νωτοφόρα),^a and persons to take charge of them in removal (τοὺς παραπέμποντας)? And these things must of necessity carry with them handicrafts, both such as are required for sustenance and such as conduce to decorum, and these again require workshops." He also (Epist. 142 [al. 374]) begs an official of the empire to exempt his poor-house from state taxation, and speaks (Epist. 143 [al. 428]) of its being managed by a chorepiscopus. St. Basil's hospital is thus spoken of by Gregory of Nazianzus (who had himself seen it) in his panegyric on the saint (Orat. 20, p. 359, ed. Colon.

1690). "Go forth a little from the city, and behold the new city, the treasure-house of godliness . . . in which the superfluities of wealth—nay, even things not superfluous—have been laid up in store at his exhortation; . . . in which disease is investigated (φιλοσοφείται) and sympathy proved . . . We have no longer to look on the fearful and pitiable sight of men like corpses before death, with the greater part of their limbs dead [from leprosy], driven from cities, from dwellings, from public places, from water-courses . . . Basil it was more than any one who persuaded those who are men not to scorn men, nor to dishonour Christ the head of all by their inhumanity towards human beings." From this it appears that at least a portion of St. Basil's hospital was for lepers. Sozomen, again (H. E. vi. 34) speaks of Prapadius having been principal of this "Basiliad, that most famous lodging for the poor founded by Basil, from whom it received the appellation which it still retains." Of St. Chrysostom, too, Palladius (Vita Chrys. p. 19, ed. Montfaucon) relates that he diverted the superfluous expenses of his see to the maintenance of the hospital (νοσοκομείον), and that as the need increased he founded several, over which he set two presbyters of high character; he engaged further physicians and cooks, and kind unmarried attendants to work under them. St. Chrysostom himself (Hom. 66 [al. 67] in Matt.) pointing triumphantly to the large-handed bounty of the church, says, "consider how many widows, how many virgins, the church sustains day by day; the number on the roll is not less than three thousand [in Constantinople]. And she provides also for those who are in distress in the guest-house; for those who are maimed in body; and yet her substance is not diminished." It is evident that a regular system of providing for the poor in connexion with the church was organised in the middle of the fifth century; for the council of Chalcedon (c. 3) especially recognises the care of widows and orphans, and the needy generally as one of the justifications for a cleric's engaging in secular affairs (κοσμικαὶ διοικήσεις), if he does it at the command of his bishop.

The emperor Julian recognised the importance of institutions such as those of St. Basil; "these impious Galilæans," says he (Fragment. p. 305, quoted by Rheinwald) "give themselves to this kind of humanity; as men allure children with a cake, so they, starting from what they call love and entertaining and serving of tables, bring in converts to their impiety;" and again he bids Arsacius (Epist. 49, u. s.), "establish abundance of hospitals in every city, that our kindness may be enjoyed by strangers, not only of our own people, but of others who are in need."

Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, devoted herself much to the care of the sick. She cared, says Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. v. 19), for those who were maimed and injured, not devolving the charge of them on subordinates, but attending to them personally, going into the places where they were received (τὰς τούτων καταγάγας) and supplying their several wants. So also, making the round of the hospitals (ξενώνας) of the churches, she attended on those who were confined to bed, herself handling the pots and tasting the broth, bringing bowls, breaking bread, and offering mouthfuls, washing

Samson of Constantinople received the name of "Xenodochus" from his devotion to the care of hospitals and asylums, and is said to have persuaded the emperor Justinian to give up his own palace for the purposes of a xenodochion (see the Byzantine Menaia, June 27). Procopius however (De Aedif. Just. i. 2) gives a somewhat different account of the matter. There was, he says, a hospital for the sick and infirm, built in former years by the pious care of one Samson, of which there were in Justinian's time some remains in a ruinous condition. This the emperor restored, decorated, and amplified in the most liberal manner. He increased, says Procopius, both the number of wards (οἰκίδιον, domuncularum) and the annual revenue. Whether by the expression οἰκίδιον we are to understand detached buildings, or rooms, is doubtful; if the former, Justinian's hospital, like that of Basil previously described, would resemble a little town, a place of many buildings within a wall. Justinian further built, in concert with Theodora, two other hospitals (ξενώνας). Of the empress Eudocia it is related (Vita Euthymii, c. 16, in Acta SS. January, vol. ii. p. 317) that she built many churches, gerontocomia, ptochotrophia, and monasteries. She is said also to have prepared food for the sick with her own hands.

It is not necessary to go through the long list of pious foundations for the benefit of the sick which we meet with in the history of the church. But it may be mentioned as an instance of the general recognition of the duty of providing for sick and infirm brethren, that by the so-called Arabic canons of Nicaea the bishop was expressly bound, in virtue of his office, to institute hospitals. Canon 70 (Hardouin, Concilia, i. 475) prescribes, that in every city a place should be set apart for strangers, sick, and poor, which should be called a xenodochium; and that the bishop should select one of the monks of the desert, himself a foreigner, far from home and family, and a man of integrity, to take charge of the hospital, to procure for it beds and whatever may be necessary for the sick and poor; and that if the property of the hospital be inadequate, he should make a collection from the Christians, according to their several means, and with this provision sustain the brethren who are strangers, poor, or sick, as each may have need.

Most of these instances belong to the Eastern church; but the Western church was not behind in the good work. Paulinus of Nola has left us (Poem. xx. 114) a brief description of the hospital which he himself built, which appears to have been rather for the reception of the poor and old than of the sick, as such:

"Dispositi trino per longa sedilia coetu
Obstrepere senes, inopum miserabile vulgus, Et socio carnae residentes agmine matres."

This description suggests long wards, provided with "sedilia"—perhaps "berths," or divans running along the wall—in which the inmates were separated into three classes—poor, old men, and old women.

Jerome, in a letter to Pammachius (Epist. 66 [al. 26], c. 11, written, according to Vallarsi, A.D. 387) speaks of a xenodochium which the latter had built in the Portus Romanus, of which he (Jerome) had just heard. This was probably attended to by Pammachius himself and the monks for whom he had provided a convent in the neighbourhood. Jerome himself founded a hospital for the reception of the sick and the stranger in Bethlehem; finding his means insufficient to finish it, he sent his brother Paulinianus (u. s. c. 14) to sell his remaining property in his native country, to provide money for its completion. Fabiola, the friend of Jerome, also founded a hospital at Rome. Having been obliged to obtain a divorce from her first husband on account of his intolerable profligacy, she married another before his death. On becoming a widow she learned that according to church law, of which she had been previously ignorant ("nec evangelii vigore non noverat," says Jerome Ep. 77 [al. 30], c. 3), it was unlawful for her to have married again during her first husband's life, however justly she had separated from him. Upon this she submitted to a humiliating penance; and afterwards devoted all her property to charitable purposes, and among other good works built a hospital, where she ministered to the sick with her own hands (ib. c. 6).

Jerome remarks that Fabiola was the first person who founded a hospital (prima omnium νοσοκομείον instituit). But this perhaps only means the first hospital in Rome or Italy. And the fact that Jerome uses the Greek word νοσοκομείον, and not the Latin valetudinarium, tends to confirm the account which points to the Eastern church as the first to exhibit such acts of benevolence.

Rome itself had an ancient fame for its care of the sick and poor (Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 140 ff.). Its hospitals were frequently the objects of the munificence of the popes. Anastasius (Vitae Pontif. 134 A, ed. Muratori) tells us of Pelagius II. (578–590), that he caused his own house to be made a refuge for the poor and aged (ptochium pauperum et senum). His successor, Gregory the Great (Dilogus, iii. 35, p. 243) seems to say that he had taken Amantius from his own dwelling to pass some days in the infirmary; and John the Deacon relates of him that he set over the several hospitals careful and conscientious men, who had to submit their accounts to himself, that the beneficence of the people towards those institutions might not be checked by mismanagement of the funds. He also provided Probus with money to build a xenodochium on a large scale at Jerusalem, and supported it by an annual subvention (Vita Greg. ii. 7). Other hospitals in Rome of an early date are known to us at least by name. Pope Symmachus (498–514) is said by Ado (Chronicon, in Migne's Patrol. exxiii. 100 f.) to have founded or restored three hospitals (pauperibus habitacula) known by the names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Laurence respectively. Stephen III. (752–757) is said by Anastasius (Vitae Pontif. p. 165, c. d.) to have restored four xenodochia and founded two others, which were placed in the charge of the reginary deacons of St. Maria and St. Silvester; and Adrian I. (772–795, ib. p. 190, d.) to have founded three DIACONIAE (see the word) "foris portam Beati Apostolorum Principis."

Nor was it only in Rome that such institutions were found. In Gaul they existed at any rate before the death of St. Remi (†542), if we may trust Flodoard. The saint is made (Hist. Remens. i. 18) to entreat his successors to preserve inviolate his statutes for the management of his poor-houses (ptochia), coenobia, martyria, diaconiae and xenodochia, as he had done those of his predecessors—an expression which implies that some at least of these foundations existed before St. Remi came to the see of Reims before 496. The fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, places (c. 13) the property of xenodochia on the same footing, with regard to alienation, as that of churches and monasteries; and (c. 15) makes special provision for the magnificent hospital which, under the influence of its bishop Sacerdos, Childebert with his queen Ultragotha had founded in Lyons, forbidding the bishop of that city to merge any of its property in that of his church, or to diminish its privileges in any way, and enjoining him to take care that active and God-fearing superintendents (praepositi) be always appointed, and that the care of the sick and the entertainment of strangers be always maintained according to the statutes.

We do not trace the existence of hospitals in the African fathers or councils. In Victor's account of the Vandal persecution (i. 8), we find that Deogratias bishop of Carthage, A.D. 455, turned two churches into hospitals for the reception of the wretched captives who were poured on the African shores from Italy; but this was a temporary expedient, such as has often been adopted in times of calamity. But we are not to suppose that the sick of the African church were ill-cared for; the houses of the bishops, the clergy and the monks often served for the reception of the sick. Augustine (Possidius, Vita Aug. cc. 22, 23) exercised constant care for the sick and poor, and (Regula ad Servos Dei, c. 5) gives directions to monks as to their reception and treatment of the sick and infirm; directions in which he seems to contemplate the case not only of feeble members of the monastic body, but of sick persons brought in from without.

In the Teutonic countries, we have of course no accounts of hospitals of so early a date as those which have been mentioned in Italy and Gaul. Chrodegang, however (Regula, c. 45, in Migne's Patrol. 89, 1076), recommends that a guest-room (hospitale) should be formed in a suitable place, convenient for the brothers to visit; and desires the brothers of his Rule, even if they cannot maintain a hospital at other times, at least in Lent to wash the feet of the poor in a hospital or guest-room. The famous Alcuin at a somewhat later date also warned the bishops of the great necessity there was for forming hospitals, and probably also directed the attention of his patron Charles the Great to the same subject. To Eanbald, as soon as he entered on his see, Alcuin wrote urging him to establish "xenodochia, id est, hospitalia" (Epist. 56, ad Eanb., Alc. Opp. i. 65) in which the poor and the strangers might be received. In accordance with the Rule of Chrodegang and the wish of Alcuin, the synod of Aix, in the year 816, ordered (c. 28) that every ecclesiastical foundation, whether canonical or monastic, should provide accommodation for the poor, the sick, the widows, and the strangers. The poor-house was to be placed near the church, and a priest was to be its superintendent; the infirmary was to be within the convent, as were also the wards for the widows and poor maidens, though probably in a building separate from that which contained the cells of the canons or monks (Conc. Germ. i. 539). The Frankish Capitularies also take order for the maintenance of the poor and sick. Thus it is ordered (i. c. 70, A.D. 789) that "hospites, peregrini et pauperes" have the due entertainment in various places to which they are entitled by the canons; a passage in which "peregrini" are probably monks from other houses, "hospites" are lay guests. And again (ii. c. 29) they bring xenodochia, ptochotrophia, nosocomia, orphanotrophia, gerontocomia, and brephotrophia under the same law as churches and monasteries with regard to the non-alienation of their property.

The establishment of many of the hospitals which existed in the northern countries in the 8th and 9th centuries is due to the Irish missionaries, who cared for the bodies as well as the souls of the people among whom they preached. Hence they received the name of "Hospitalia Scotorum,"^b an expression found both in the canons of Meaux (C. Meldense, c. 40), and in the petition of the bishops of the provinces of Reims and Rouen to Lewis the Pious (c. 10, Baluze, Capit. Franc. ii. 111). These hospitals were closely connected with the monasteries founded by the same missionaries. Gretser (Ad Vit. S. Willibaldi, lib. i. observ. 19; Grets. Opera, v. 778) enumerates some of the hospitals of their foundation.

2. Administration of Hospitals.—In the first instance, the hospitals, like other institutions of the church, were under the immediate superintendence of the bishops. In many cases, as we have seen, they were founded by the bishops themselves from the funds placed at their disposal by the church, and so the oversight of them naturally fell to the founder and his successors. And even when endowed by private persons, such foundation was regarded as of the nature of alms, and so given into the hands of those who were, directly or indirectly, the universal almoners. The property of hospitals was regarded (as has been shewn above) by kings and rulers as being of the same kind as the property of the church. And the attendants on the sick were, at least in very many cases, drawn from the neighbouring monasteries or houses of canons. When the duty was laid upon bishops of providing, so far as in them lay, food and clothing for those who in consequence of infirmity were unable to earn their own living (Conc. Avel. I. c. 16), it naturally followed that they superintended and directed the establishments for attaining this end.

It must however have been from the first impossible for a much-occupied bishop to give personal attention to all the details of a large hospital, and therefore other clerics were employed under him on this behalf. We have seen already that Aerius was a hospital-superintendent under his bishop Eustathius; and as early as the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, we find the clerics attached to the poor-houses (τῶν πτωχέων) placed on the same footing as those of the monasteries and martyr-churches, and admonished to obey their bishops according to the tradition of the fathers (c. 8), a passage which probably indicates that they had been disposed to assert too great independence. The legislation of Justinian provided carefully for the due administration of hospitals. Thus (Codex, l. 42, § 9, De Episcopis et Clericis) it is provided that prefects of hospitals (of whatever kind) shall be appointed according to the judgment and with the approval of the bishop of the place; and again (Ib. l. 46, § 3) bishops are enjoined not to administer the hospitals within their dioceses personally, but to appoint superintendents, and to act themselves as visitors and auditors, in case of need removing the officials. The same law desires that men be appointed to such offices who have before their eyes the fear of God and of the dreadful day of judgment. The same code (l. 28) makes the bishop of the diocese the executor of a will containing a bequest for pious uses, where no executor has been named in the will itself; and desires him (l. 49) in cases where the testator has not designated special objects of his bounty, to apply the bequest to the benefit of the hospital of the city, or to the poorest hospital, where there were more than one. In deciding the question, which is poorest, he is to take counsel with his clergy. But in case there be no hospital (xenos) in the city, then the oeconomus or the bishop is to take the bequest, and apply it for the benefit of the poor. In case the bishop is negligent in discharging this duty, then the metropolitan of the province or the archbishop of the diocese [see DIOCESE] may enquire into the matter and compel the bishop to act. Or (l. 46, § 6) any inhabitant of the city interested in the matter may compel the carrying out of the will.

That in the time of Gregory the Great the xenodochia were under the jurisdiction of the bishop is clear from several passages in his letters. Thus (Epist. iv. 27) he desires Januarius, bishop of Cagliari, to take care that the xenodochi render their accounts to him; and begs him not to let the hospitals fall to decay by his neglect; and he desires that men of proved integrity may be appointed prefects of xenodochia, and these only ecclesiastics (religiosi), who cannot be harassed by lay tribunals. To those whom he himself had appointed prefects of diaconiae or xenodochia he gave full power over the funds, expressly exempting them from rendering an account to any one (Joan. Diaconus, Vita Greg. ii. c. 51).

The bishops of the provinces of Reims and Rouen, in their petition to Lewis the Pious, son of Charles the Great, beg that the rectors of monasteries and xenodochia be made subject to the authority of their bishops (c. 10, in Baluze Capit. Franc. ii. 111).

3. Dedication.—Martigny (referring to Wernsdorf De Columbae Simulacris) says that hospitals were in ancient times commonly dedicated to the Holy Spirit, which was represented under the form of a dove, either on the façade, or on some other conspicuous part of the building. The principal hospital in Rome bears this designation, and has borne it from a very remote period (Fantucci, Tratt. di tutte le opere pie nell' antica città di Roma, c. 1, quoted by Martigny).

HOSPITIUM (also Hospitale). One of the characteristics, perhaps the most commendable, of monasticism, was its unvarying hospitality to all comers. None were to be refused admission; all were to be made welcome (Bened. Reg. c. 53); especially monks, clergy, poor, and foreigners (Reg. Pachom. c. 51; Isidor. Reg. c. 23; Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 53). No questions were to be asked (Reg. Patr. c. 4) unless by the abbat's order (Reg. Tarnat. c. 7). Even passing wayfarers were to be pressed to eat before going on; if they could not wait for the usual hour, the dinner was to be served three hours sooner than usual; or, if they could not stay even so long, they were to have their meal separately (Reg. Mag. c. 72). Everything was to be done in courtesy, and for the comfort of the guests. The prior (or some others of the brethren), was to meet them, and, after a few words of prayer by way of salutation, as well as by way of precaution against any Satanic illusion, was to give and receive the kiss of peace; on their arriving and departing he was to make obeisance to them, as recognising in them a visit from the Saviour (Bened. Reg. c. 53). He was to lead them straightway on arrival to the oratory or sacristy, (usually in Benedictine monasteries close to the entrance-gate), and after praying together (cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 51) awhile, was to sit with them, reading aloud, first some holy book (lex divina), the Scriptures especially (Mart. loc. cit.), and then, these primary duties attended to, conversing amicably ("Omnis humanitas praebeunda," Bened. Reg. v. s.). The abbat himself was to bring water, this was to be done at bedtime, and the footsore were to be rubbed with oil, according to the rule (c. 10) of Fructuosus, and with certain brethren in rotation (so Martene understands "omnis congregatio") was to wash the feet of all without distinction, repeating a verse of the Psalms (Bened. Reg. v. s.). In compliment to the guests, the prior, though not the other monks, was excused from observing a fast day, unless one of special obligation (ib.). If sick or delicate, some dainties ("pulmentaria") were to be provided for them (Fruct. Reg. c. 10). Nor were the guests to leave the monastery empty-handed; for the journey, the best that the monastery could afford was to be supplied as a parting gift (viaticum).

In the annals of the monastery of Micy (Micium), it is recorded in praise of an abbat in the 6th century, that, though the monastery was then very poor, its guests were always regaled with wine, without being allowed to see that the brethren were drinking only water (Mab. A. A. O. S. B. I. ad fin.). Caesarius of Arles is similarly extolled by his biographer for keeping open house as abbat (Vit. Caes. Arclat. i. 37, ap. Mab. ib.).

Such hospitality was sure to be largely used in days when travelling was so difficult and so dangerous. Benedict wisely provides for a constant influx of strangers ("nunquam desunt monasterio," Reg. c. 53). Nowhere indeed in his rule is its tenderness and forethought more remarkable than about the reception of guests. In some of these arrangements he had been anticipated. Cassian speaks of one of the older monks being stationed by the abbat, with the advice of the seniors, near the entrance of the monastery, to receive strangers as they arrived (Cass. Instit. iv. 7). Benedict placed them under the general supervision of the cellarer, or house-steward (Reg. c. 31), and his deputies. Subsequently, a distinct officer was created, the "hospitalarius," corresponding to the eastern "ξενοδόχος" (Mart. ad loc. cit. Alteserr. Ascticon, ix. 9; Du Cange, s. v.), whose duties, however, did not extend to the refectory. One of the brethren, selected as a specially God-fearing man ("Cujus animam timor dei habet") was appointed by Benedict to look after the guests' dormitory ("cella hospitum") (Bened. Reg. c. 53) (usually on the east side of the Benedictine quadrangle, over the "hospitium" ^a); and two others were told off annually for the guests' kitchen, which adjoined the abbat's kitchen (usually on the south side of the quadrangle ^a with a window between (Mart. ad loc.); these officials were to have extra assistance, as occasion required (ib.). Every precaution was taken, lest the influx of strangers should either disturb the placidity of the "house of God" (ib.), or lead to the propagation of silly rumours about it (ib.). Their sitting-room, dormitory, and kitchen were all to be separate from those of the monks (ib. cf. c. 56). None of the monks, unless expressly ordered, might exchange even in passing a word with a guest, except to ask a blessing (ib. cf. Reg. Mac. c. 8). Nor were the guests to be trusted to themselves without supervision. Care was to be taken that the monks' wallets were not left about in the guests' dormitory; and two of the monks, whose turn it was to help in the kitchen and otherwise for the week ("hebdomadarii"), were to keep close to the guests night and day (Reg. Mag. c. 79). It is not clear whether Benedict intended the guests to be entertained in the refectory at a separate table with the abbat, or with him in a separate table (Bened. Reg. c. 56); Martene thinks in the refectory (Reg. Comment. ad loc. cit.; cf. Conc. Aquisgr. c. 27). The abbat on these occasions might invite a few of the brethren to his table, leaving the charge of the rest to the prior, and might make some addition to the ordinary fare (Bened. Reg. c. 56; Mart. ad loc.; Mab. Ann. O. S. B. v. xiii.). It was strictly forbidden by the council of Saragossa, A.D. 691, for lay persons to be lodged in the quadrangle of the monastery ("intra claustra"), even with the abbat's special permission, lest contact with them should demoralise the brethren or give rise to scandals; they were to be lodged in a separate house within the precincts (intra septa) (Conc. Cuesar. august. A.D. 691; cf. Mab. Ann. O. S. B. xviii. xv.)

Benedict orders, that monks coming from another country (peregrini) may, if orderly, prolong their stay in the monastery (Reg. c. 61) for one, two, or even three years (Mart. Reg. Comment. l. c.); and that any suggestions which they make for its better management are to be welcomed as providential (Bened. Reg. ib.). They are then either to be dismissed kindly ("honeste") or formally admitted, not, however, unless they bring commendatory letters from their former abbat, or otherwise give proof of his consent. Once admitted, they may be promoted without delay at the abbat's discretion, to places of authority; as may clergy similarly admitted (ib.). Laymen, willing to stay on, are either to take the vow, or to make themselves useful to the monastery in some sort of work in return for board and lodging (Reg. Mag. c. 79).

It was part of the discipline of candidates for the novitiate to wait on the guests in their sitting-room ("cella hospitum," or "hospitium"), according to the rule of Benedict, for some days (Reg. c. 58), or, according to some later rules, for three months (Isid. Reg. c. 5; Fruct. Reg. c. 21; Menard ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxi.) [see NOVICE].

History shows how the simple and frugal hospitality enjoined by Benedict and monastic lawmakers degenerated in time into luxury and display, burdensome to the revenues of the monasteries, demoralising to their inmates, and one of the proximate causes of their fall. [I. G. S.]

HOST, from the Latin Hostia, a victim. It was applied to sacrifices, or offerings of various kinds in the ecclesiastical language of the West. E.g. in the Vulgate version of Rom. xii. 1, we have "Ut exhibeatis corpora vestra hostiam" (E. V. sacrifice) "viventem, sanctam, Deo placentem, rationabile obsequium vestrum:" and similarly in the Missale Gothicum, the people are bid to pray that God "may cleanse the hearts of all the offerers unto (i.e. that they may become) a sacrifice (hostiam) of sanctification, reasonable and well-pleasing unto Himself" (Liturg. Gall. ed. Mabill. p. 237). In the Vulgate of Phil. iv. 18, it is used of almsgiving, "Hostiam acceptam, placentem Deo." Christ, the one true victim, is called hostia, as in Eph. v. 2, "Tradidit semetipsum pro nobis oblationem et hostiam." Similarly Heb. x. 12: "Unam pro nobis offerens hostiam." Compare Heb. ix. 26. This is frequent in the old Latin liturgies. Thus in the Gothic Missal, "Suppliant to Thee who wast slain a victim (hostia) for the salvation of the world, we pray, &c." (Lit. Gall. p. 235); and "Whom Thou didst will to be delivered up a sacrifice (hostiam) for us" (ibid. p. 257; comp. p. 198). In the following example the church commemorates and pleads that sacrifice:—"We offer unto thee, O God, an immaculate victim (hostiam), whom the maternal womb brought forth without defilement to virginity" (Missale Mozar. Leslie, p. 39). As the thank-offering (Eucharist) of the Mosaic law had been called hostia laudis (Ps. cxvi. 17), or hostia gratiarum (Lev. vi. 13), so was the Christian thank-offering, the sacramental commemoration of the death of Christ. E.g. "Receive we beseech thee, O Lord, the sacrifice (hostiam) of propitiation and praise, and these oblations of Thy servants" (Miss. Goth. u. s. p. 253).

As the word properly expresses a concrete notion, it would readily pass from the last meaning to attach itself to the material symbols offered in the rite. In the Missale Gothicum, in a prayer said after the consecration, we read, "We offer unto thee, O Lord, this immaculate host, reasonable host, unbloody host, this holy bread and salutary cup" (u. s. p. 298). The following example is from the Mozarabic Missal:—"This host of bread and wine, which have been placed on Thy altar by me unworthy" (Leslie, p. 445). It will be observed that in these extracts the bread and wine (after conse-eration) are together called the host. Even in the 11th century Anselm affirmed correctly, "One host in bread and wine. . . . They call both together by one name, oblation or host" (Ad Walerannum, c. 2). Long before this, however, it was sometimes restrained to the bread alone, as in the three earliest Ordines Romani, which range from the 7th to the 9th century:—"The acolytes (carrying the consecrated bread) go down to the presbyters that they may break the hosts" (Museum Ital. tom. ii. pp. 13, 49, 59). In these ancient directories the unconsecrated loaves are always, and the consecrated more frequently, called by the older name of "oblates."

When the phrase "immaculate host" was introduced into the Roman Missal towards the 11th century (Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, P. iii. art. 6) from that of Spain, the mistake was made of applying it to the unconsecrated bread. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 370. [W. E. S.]

HOST, THE ADORATION OF. In the modern church of Rome, the worship of latrâ, i.e. such worship as is due to God, is paid to the consecrated symbol of our Lord's body in the eucharist, under sanction of the dogma, that the bread is, in all but appearance and other "accidents," converted into that body, and that His human soul and His divinity, being united to His body, are therefore in that which has become His body; so that whole Christ, God and man, is in it, and in every particle of it (Catech. Trident. p. ii. de Euch. cc. 33, 35). Of such adoration of the host the church knew nothing, and could know nothing, before the opinions which at last shaped themselves into that dogma had taken possession of the minds of men. But the Latin word adoratio, and the Greek προσκύνησις, like the old English worship, have a great latitude of meaning, and are applied to the simplest outward tokens of respect, no less than to that highest homage of the body, soul, and spirit, which is due to God alone. For example, in Gen. xxxvii. 7, 9, where the English has "did obeisance," the Septuagint gives προσεκύνησαν and προσεκύνουν; the Latin Vulgate, adorare. Exod. xi. 8: Eng., "Thy servants . . . shall bow down to me"; Sept. προσκυνήσουσί με; Vulg. adorabunt me. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 844. In this lower sense, we find the word "adoration," and its equivalents, employed within the period which it is our part to illustrate, to denote the expression of reverence to the bread and wine, which are the sacramental body and blood of Christ.

With this previous explanation, we give, in chronological order, a catena of passages, which will exhibit sufficiently, as we hope, both the feelings of reverence which the early Christians had for the sacred symbols, and the manner in which they expressed it by words, or gesture, or careful handling, and the like. Among these are several which have often been mistakenly adduced as affording testimony to the antiquity of the Roman worship of the host.

Tertullian, A.D. 192, "We are distressed, if any of our cup, or even bread, be cast on the ground" (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.). The context shows that the allusion is to a religious rite. Origen, A.D. 230: "Ye who are wont to be present at the Divine Mysteries, know how, when ye take the body of the Lord, ye keep it with all care and reverence, lest any particle fall therefrom, lest aught of the consecrated gift be spilled. For ye believe, and rightly believe, yourselves to be guilty, if aught fall therefrom through negligence. But if ye use, and justly use, so great care about the keeping of His body, how do ye think it involves less guilt to have been careless about the word of God, than to have been careless about His body?" (Hom. in Exod. xiii. § 3). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350; "When thou drawest near, do not draw near with hands expanded or fingers wide apart; but making thy left hand a throne for thy right, as about to receive a king, and making the palm hollow, receive the body of Christ, answering Amen. Partake, therefore, having heedfully sanctified thine eyes with the touch of the holy body, taking care that thou drop nought of it. . . . Then, after the communion of the body of Christ, approach thou also to the cup of His blood, not stretching forth thy hands; but with head bowed, and with gesture of adoration (προσκυνήσας) and reverence, saying Amen, be thou sanctified, partaking also of the blood of Christ. And while the moisture is still on thy lips, touching them with thy hands, sanctify both eyes and forehead, and the other organs of sense" (Catech. Myst. v. §§ 18, 19). Pseudo-Dionysius, who may have written as early as 362, in a highly rhetorical passage, makes the following apostrophe to the sacrament: "But, O most divine and sacred celebration (τελετή; in the Latin translation, Sacramentum), do thou, unfolding the enigmatic wrappings that with symbols enshroud thee, manifest thyself to us in clear light, and fill our mental vision with the only and unshrouded light" (De Eccl. Hier. cap. iii. n. iii. § 2). Owing to the word τελετή (celebration of mysteries) having been rendered by Sacramentum, this passage has been often brought forward as an address to "the Sacrament;" i.e. to the consecrated host (Bellarm. Disput. tom. iii. l. iv. c. 29 compared with l. ii. c. 3). Had the word been capable of that meaning, it would still have been only an apostrophe, not an example of adoration directed to the sacred element. Gorgonia, the sister of Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 370, is said by him, in a dangerous illness, to have "prostrated herself before the altar, and called with a loud voice upon Him who is honoured thereon" (Orat. viii. § 18). This has been understood (Bellarm. u. s.) to mean that she worshipped the host on the altar; which for several centuries after that time was not reserved there. St. Gregory himself goes on to tell us that "she mingled with her tears whatever her hand had treasured of the antitypes of the precious body and blood." St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, commenting on the words of the 98th Psalm, adorate sub pedibus pedum tuorum, considers that "by the footstool the earth is meant, and by the earth, the flesh of Christ, which to this day we adore in the mysteries, and which the apostles adored in the Lord Jesus" (De S. S. lib. iii. c. 11, n. 79). Here it is implied that a reverence is due to the consecrated earthly elements, not equal to that which is due to Christ Himself, but in such proportion to it, more or less, as our loyal respect for the insignia of royalty has to that which we entertain for the person of the king himself. St.

Augustine, A.D. 396, explains the same passage at greater length, but does not lead us to a different view of the adoration intended: "He took earth of the earth; for flesh is of the earth, and He took flesh of the flesh of Mary. And because He walked here in the flesh itself, and gave His flesh itself to be eaten by us unto salvation, but no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored, we have found out how such a footstool of God may be adored, and how we not only do not sin by adoring, but sin by not adoring" (Enarr. in Ps. xcvi. § 9). Commenting on Ps. xxi. 29 (Lat. 30), the same father says: the rich of the earth "have themselves been brought to the table of Christ, and take of His body and blood; but they only worship,—are not also satisfied, because they do not imitate" (Ep. cxi. ad Honoratum, cxxvii. § 66; Sim. Enarr. i. in Ps. xxi. v. 30). Here, however, it is doubtful whether the writer had at all in view the reverence paid to the sacramental body. He rather, perhaps, is thinking of communion as accompanied by prayer, and as the crowning act of the eucharist, or thanksgiving. The following words of St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, have been supposed (Bellarm. u. s.) to refer to the adoration of the eucharist: "Are thy garments filthy, and it concerns thee not? But are they clean? Then recline (ἀνέσθαι, rendered improperly adore) and partake" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. vv. 20–23; often quoted from the cento known as Hom. lxi. ad Antioch.). Again, a worship of the elements has been inferred (Bell. u. s.) from this sentence: "This table is in the place of the manger, and here also will the body of the Lord lie; not, indeed, as then, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, but clothed all around with the Holy Ghost. The initiated understand. And the Magi then did nothing but adore; but we will permit thee both to receive, and having received to return home, if thou draw near with a clean conscience" (De Beat. Philogono, § 3). Other passages, to which controversialists refer, in the works of St. Chrysostom (as Hom. lxxiii. in St. Matt. xiv. in Ep. i. ad Cor. &c.), only exalt the sacrament, do not speak of any adoration. Theodoret, A.D. 423: "The mystic symbols do not, after the consecration, pass out of their own nature; for they remain in their former substance, and form, and appearance, and are visible and palpable, as they were before; but they are mentally perceived as what they have become, and are believed to be, and are adored as being what they are believed to be" (Dialog. ii. tom. iv. p. 85). Here the worship of latria cannot possibly be intended, because the author, in the same sentence, teaches that the "creatures of bread and wine" are, after consecration, bread and wine still. It may be remarked also, that although many, or perhaps all, of the foregoing extracts may be seen quoted in favour of the modern cultus of the host, there is not one that is really to the purpose. Nor is it until the 7th century, an age in which the outward observances of religion multiplied rapidly, that we find any definite gesture of respect to the host mentioned. It was the custom at Rome then to reserve a portion of the eucharist [see FERMENTUM], to be put into the chalice at the next celebration. The earliest Ordo Romanus (§ 8, Musæe Ital. tom. ii. p. 8) directs that when this is brought out for use, "the bishop or deacon salute the holy things (sancta) with an inclination of the head." In Ordo II., which is a revision of the first, and perhaps a century later, the bishop, "his head bowed toward the altar, first adores the holy things," &c. (§ 4, p. 43). See also the Ecloga of Amalarius, who comments on this Ordo (§ 6, p. 550). The significance of the action may be estimated by the similar respect paid in some churches to the gospel, e.g. "The priests and bishops standing by uncover their heads, lay down their sticks, and worship the gospel by an inclination of the head" (Rituale Gabriel, Renaud. tom. i. p. 211). The last passage to which we shall call attention, occurs in the Acts of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 754: "As that which He took of us is only the matter of human substance, perfect in all things, without expressing the proper form of a person, that no addition of person may take place in the Godhead, so also did He command the image, chosen matter, to wit the substance of bread, to be offered, not, however, fashioned after the form of man, lest idolatry should be brought in" (in Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. tom. vii. col. 448). It is evident that the adoration of the host, in its modern sense, could not have been known when this was written.

As elevation is often supposed to imply adoration, it should be mentioned that there was no elevation of the consecrated elements in the West before the twelfth century; and that the so-called elevation of the East was merely a "showing of the gifts," designed to second the invitation to communicate conveyed by the proclamation, "Holy things for the holy" (see Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 546, 595). [W. E. S.]

HOURS OF PRAYER. I. This phrase was inherited from the elder church. "Peter and John went up together into the temple at the Hour of Prayer, being the ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At first the observance of the hours was of devotion only, but it was afterwards made obligatory by canon on the clergy and monks, and they began to be called Canonical Hours. The earliest use of this expression is found, we think, in the rule of St. Benedict (c. 67; in Holstenii Codex Regularum, P. ii.); but it does not appear to have been very common within the period of which we treat. It occurs in the Regula of St. Isidore of Seville who died in 636 (cap. 7; Holst. u. s.). St. Eloy, A.D. 640, employs it: "To whom should it be said that 'men ought always to pray and not to faint' (St. Luke xviii. 1), if not to him who daily at the Canonical Hours, according to the rite of ecclesiastical tradition, praises and beseeches the Lord without ceasing in the accustomed psalmody and prayers" (Hom. xi. in Biblioth. PP. tom. xii.). Bede in our own country (A.D. 701), in his commentary on those words of St. Luke, copies this sentence from St. Eloy. The "Canonical Hours" are mentioned in the exceptions of Eggbright, A.D. 740 (can. 28; Johnson's Engl. Canons), and in the canons of Cuthbert, 747 (c. 15; ibid.).

II. What is meant by an Hour.—By an hour was understood a twelfth part of the natural day, reckoned from sunrise to sunset, of whatever length it might be. Upon the use of this natural measure of time by the Jews is founded that saying of our Lord: "Are there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not; because he seeth the light of this world" (St. John xi. 9). The Romans are said to have adopted this division of the day about B.C. 291. Martial refers to it as in use among them, when he tells a friend that he might read his book in less than an hour, and that not one of summer's length (Epigr. lib. xii. n. 1, ad Priscum). In the Pseudolus of Plautus an "hour in winter" is said to be "shortest" (Act V. sc. 2, l. 11). The Greeks had learnt this method in the 6th century before Christ, when the sun-dial became known to them probably through Anaximander (see Diogenes Laert. lib. i. c. 7); and they retained it during their subjection to the Roman empire. Thus in the Sentences ascribed to Secundus of Athens in the time of Hadrian, a day is defined to be "the space given to toil, the course of twelve hours" (Sent. 4). As the time of labour varied, so must the hours have been longer or shorter. It is employed beyond our period by Cassianus Bassus, A.D. 940, as when he tells the tiller of the land at what hour the moon sets and rises on each day of the month (Geoponica lib. i. c. 7). St. Augustine speaks as if he knew of no other, "The hour in winter, compared with the hour in summer, is the shorter" (De Verâ Relig. c. xliii. § 80). Hence we infer that the natural day and hour were also employed by the church in his day. Amalarius at the close of our period uses the same division of time with express reference to the Hours of Prayer; prefacing his account of them thus: "The people properly call the presence of the sun above the earth the complete day. From this definition it may be understood that a day of twelve hours ought to begin at the rising and end at the setting of the sun" (De Ordine Antiphonarii, c. 6; see also cc. 16, 70). By the first hour, then, we are to understand that twelfth part of the natural day which began at sunrise; by the sixth that which ended when the sun crossed the meridian; the twelfth that which immediately preceded the sunset.

The day and the night were further divided into four equal parts. Each quarter of the day consisting of three hours was named after the last hour in it. Thus the first quarter, containing the first, second, and third hour, was called the third hour (Tertia, Terce), that is to say, by the "third hour" we often have to understand the whole interval between sunrise and the beginning of the fourth (smaller) hour. Similarly Sext is the space of the three hours that follow, viz. the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth, ending at noon, or twelve o'clock. None embraces the seventh, eighth and ninth hours; and the last, called Duodecima, contains the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth, ending at sunset. This is satisfactorily shown by Francolinus (De Temporibus Horar. Canon. c. xxi.; Romæ, 1571). Hence St. Benedict (Regula, c. 48) was free to direct that from Easter to the Kalends of October None should be said "in the middle of the eighth hour," and that from the latter time to Ash-Wednesday "Terce should be performed at the second hour."

III. The Prayers called Hours, &c.—By the Hours of Prayer and the Canonical Hours were also understood the devotions themselves, consisting for the most part of psalms and prayers, which were used at the stated times more properly so called. Equivalents in this secondary sense within the first eight centuries were Officium Divinum, or Officia Divina (see e. g. Bened. Regula, cc. 8, 43; Isidore of Seville, De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 19), Cursus (sc. Divinus) (Greg. Turon. de Gloria Mart. lib. i. c. 11; Hist. Franc. l. viii. c. 15; ix. c. 6, &c.); Cursus ecclesiastici (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. l. x. c. 31; n. 19); Missa (Conc. Aqath. A.D. 506, cap. 30; Cassian. De Coenob. Institut. l. ii. c. 7); and so Missa nocturna (Cass. u. s. l. ii. c. 13), Vigiliarum Missa (Ibid. l. iii. c. 8), &c.; Missa Canonica (Ibid. c. 5) (though it may be doubted whether in Cassian's time the thought of dismissal was entirely absent when that word was used); Orationes Canonicae (Ibid. l. ii. c. 12). We find used also the more general terms Diurna Celebritas, Solemnitas, Agenda, or, from the staple of the devotions used, Psalmodia. The word synaxis (assembling) employed by the Egyptian, Syrian, and Grecian monks, conveyed to the mind alike the notion of the times at which and of the purpose for which they assembled (Ibid. lib. ii. c. 10; Collat. viii. c. 16, &c.). It was often thus used in the West, but at first needed explanation. Hence in the rule of St. Columban, abbot of Luxeuil in Burgundy, and afterwards of Bobio in Italy from 589 to 615 we read, "concerning the synaxis, that is, the course of psalms and the canonical method of prayers" (cap. 7, Holst. u. s. sim. Regula Donati, c. 75, Holst. P. iii.). In England the following example occurs in 740, "These seven synaxes we ought daily to offer to God with great concern for ourselves and for all Christian people" (Excerptions of Eggbriht, c. 28). It was Latinised by Collecta, as in the version of the rule of Pachomius (ad calc. Opp. Cassiani), and by St. Jerome, who says "Alleluia was sung, by which sign they were called to collect" (Epitaph. Paulæ, Ep. lxxxvi.). By the Greeks the daily course was also called the canon, because it was the prescribed rule or norm of prayer. Thus Antiochus, A.D. 614, "Our canon is called Psalmody" (Hom. CV. Auct. Gr. Lat. Biblioth. PP. tom. i.). Compare John Moschus, A.D. 630, Limnionion, c. 40. There is perhaps a much earlier instance in St. Basil, A.D. 370, "Every one keeps his proper canon" i. e. observes the prayers assigned to him (Regulae Breviores, Resp. ad Qu. 147). St. Benedict gave to the daily offices of his monks the expressive name of Opus Dei, God's Work (Regula, cc. 43, 44, &c.), a title soon adopted by others (Caesarii Regula ad Mon. c. 19, Holst. P. ii.; Aureliani Regula, c. 29, Ibid. &c.). It was used conventionally as a complete equivalent to Officium Divinum; e. g. Opus Dei, celebratur, expletur (Reg. Bened. cc. 44, 52); dicitur, canitur (Regula, SS. Pauli et Stephani, cc. 8, 11, Holst. P. ii.). Opus Divinum is also found as in Benedict (Regula, c. 19), Cassiodorius, A.D. 562 (De Institut. Div. Litt. c. 30), &c. Obsequium Divinum also occurs at the beginning of the 9th century (Conc. Aquisgr., A.D. 816, cap. 131). This use of obsequium, service, may be traced to the Vulgate. See St. John xvi. 2; Rom. ix. 4; xii. 1; xv. 31; Phil. ii. 17, 30.

IV. The several Hours of Prayer and their various Names.—Three hours at prayer, the third, the sixth, and the ninth were observed by the Jews. "Evening and morning and at noon will I pray," was the resolve of David (Ps. lv. 17). Daniel "kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed and gave thanks before his God" (Dan. vi. 10). Two of these hours were determined by the times of the daily sacrifices (Joshua ben Levi in Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Act. Apost. iii. 1), which were offered "in the morning and about the ninth hour" (Josephus, Antiq. L. xiv. c. 4 § 3). The force of St. Peter's argument in Acts ii. 15, "These are not drunken as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day," depends on the fact familiar to his hearers that the Jews generally did not break their fast (See Grotius and others in loc.) before the morning sacrifice and prayer. This therefore was about the third hour. We are expressly told that "the hour of prayer" at which Peter and John went up to the temple was the "ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At the ninth hour Cornelius, a proselyte of the gate, "prayed in his house" (Acts x. 30). St. Peter "went up upon the house-top to pray about the sixth hour" (ibid. v. 9). "We read," says Ardo Smaragdus, and he may speak for many, "that the third, sixth, and ninth hours were observed by the apostles" (Comm. in S. Bened. Regulam, c. 16).

The three hours of the apostolic church were transmitted to the succeeding ages. Tertullian, A.D. 192, speaks of "those common hours which mark the divisions of the day, the third, sixth, and ninth, which we may observe in Scripture to be more solemn than the rest" (De Orat. c. 25. See De Jejun. adv. Psychicos, c. 10). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, "If some assign stated hours to prayer, as the third, sixth, and ninth, the man of knowledge prays to God throughout his whole life" (Strom. l. vii. c. 7, § 40). "There are three times," observes St. Jerome, "in which the knees are to be bent to God. Ecclesiastical tradition understands the third, the sixth, and the ninth hour" (Comm. in Dan. c. vi. v. 10).

In the 3rd century, however, we begin to hear of five stated times of prayer. St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, after citing the Scriptural examples given above, goes on to say, "But beside the hours observed of old, both the durations and sacraments of prayer have increased for us now. For we ought to pray in the morning Also when the sun withdraws and the day fails, we must by a necessary obligation pray again" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). St. Basil in Cappadocia speaks of these hours of prayer as necessary and suitable for monks; the morning, the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, and the evening (Regulae fusius Tract. Resp. ad Qu. 37, §§ 3-5).

The morning office now introduced is called by Cyprian (u. s.) matutina oratio; matutinae orationes by Aurelian (Regula c. 28); by Cassian matutina solemnitas (De Coenob. Inst. lib. iii. c. 3). By others it was called laudes matutinae, from the use in it of the three last psalms, which were called emphatically by the Latins "laudes," and by the Greeks αἶνοι. Hence the later common appellation of lauds. From this the office also took the name of matutinae (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 23: Vit. Patr. c. 4, &c.; Ferreoli Regula, c. 13 in Holsten. P. ii.; Guidonis Reg. c. 39 in Hergot, Vet. Discipl. Mon. Par. 1726). It was also called matutinum sacrificium, as by Fructuosus (Reg. c. 3; Holsten.

u. s. and matutinum officium; Isidor. Reg. c. 7 Conc. Bracar. A.D. 560, can. i.); whence also simply matutinum (Isid. ibid.). Matutinale officium is also found (Vita S. Joann. Gorz. in Acta SS. Ben., saec. v. p. 392) and matutinus (sc. cursus) (Regula Magistri, c. 34, Holsten.); also matutinarium (Caesarii Reg. c. 21), and matutinarum canonici (Aurel. Ord. post Reg.). But the most common name was matutini, from the psalmi, which formed the chief part of the office. This was employed by Benedict (Regula, cc. 12, 13, &c.) and was naturally adopted by many in the same age (Pseud-Aug. Reg. § 1; Caes. Reg. c. 21; Aurel. Ord. u. s. &c.).

Among the Greeks this office is called by St. Basil (Regulae fus. Tr. u. s.) τὸ ὄρθρον, the office of dawn, a name which it retains to this day; by St. Epiphanius, A.D. 368, "morning (ἑσθυροί) hymns and morning prayers" (De Fide, c. 23); in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions the "prayers of dawn" (lib. viii. c. 34), and the "thanksgiving at dawn" (c. 38).

The evening office was generally called vespera in the West (Bened. Reg. c. 41; Isidor. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 20), and vespertinum officium (Isid. Reg. c. 7). St. Ambrose (De Virginibus, lib. iii. c. 4, § 18) calls it the "hour of incense" in allusion to the Jewish rite (Exod. xxx. 8; Ps. cxli. 2; St. Luke i. 10). It was sometimes called lucernarium, as in a comment on the 119th Psalm ascribed (incorrectly, we think) to St. Jerome. "We (monks) pray at the third hour. We pray at the sixth hour; at the ninth. We make the Lucernarium. We rise in the middle of the night. Finally we pray at cock-crow" (ad fin. Breviar. in Psalm. See also Regul. Turnat. c. 9, in Holst. P. ii.). Another form was Lucernarii, as in Regula Magistri, (c. 36, Holst. u. s.). In Spain, as we shall see, the Lucernarium was only considered the first part of vespers. Vespers were also called the twelfth (hour), as in the Regula Magistri (c. 34). "Prime ought to be said in the same manner as Twelfth, which is called vespers." The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, says, "The statutes of the fathers have prescribed that . . . twelve psalms be said at the Twelfth with Alleluia, which moreover they learnt from the showing of an angel" (can. 18). A reference to Cassian (De Coenob. Inst. l. ii. c. 5), who tells the story, proves that the Twelfth is here an equivalent to solemnitas vespertina. Compare the Ordines at the end of the Regulae of St. Aurelian in Holsten. P. ii. pp. 110, 112; P. iii. pp. 69, 72. St. Columban does not use the words vespers and completorium in his rule, but (c. 7) orders a certain service to be said "ad initium noctis." It appears more probable that this refers to vespers, the older office which must certainly have been said in his monastery, though Menard and others think that compline is meant. In the Greek church, as partially in the Latin, the lighting of the lamps gave the office its common name τὸ λυχνικόν, though it is also called more properly τὸ ἐσπερινόν (Goar in Euchologio, p. 30). In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii.) the whole office is called τὸ ἐσπερινόν (c. 35). It begins with a Psalm (the 140th) called ἐπὶ λυχνίῳ; prayers are then said for the catechumens, energumens, &c. These are then dismissed, and the faithful say a prayer and thanksgiving by themselves, both of which are qualified by the title ἐπιλύχνιος (cc. 36, 37). At the council of Constantinople A.D. 536, on one occasion the patriarch announced τὸ λυχνικὸν on Saturday evening in the oratory of St. Mary (Act V. Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 212). The council held there in 691 (in Trullo) ordered that there should be no kneeling from Saturday evening until Sunday evening, "on which they again knelt" ἐν τῷ λυχνικῷ (can. 90).

St. Jerome at Bethlehem mentions at least six hours as kept by the religious women whom he advised: "There is no one who knows not the third, the sixth, the ninth hour, the dawn also and the evening . . . In the night we should rise twice or thrice" (Ad Eustoch. Ep. xviii.). To Demetrias he says, "Beside the order of the Psalms and prayer, which thing is to be always practised by thee at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at even, midnight, and morning, settle at how many hours thou shouldst learn the Holy Scripture," &c. (Epist. xcvi.). Of Paula and her community he says, "They sang the psalter in due course at the morning hour, at the third, the sixth, the ninth, at even, at midnight" (Ad Eustoch. Epitaph. Paulae, Ep. lxxxvi.), and he advised that one preparing for that mode of life be trained "to rise in the night for prayers and psalms, to sing hymns in the morning, to stand in the field like a good soldier of Jesus Christ at the third, sixth, and ninth hour . . . and to render the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Laetam, Ep. lvii.). The author of the Apostolical Constitutions says, "Make prayers at sunrise, at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at evening, and at the cock-crow" (i.e. evidently at midnight) (lib. viii. c. 34).

The ordinary night office of the monasteries is called by Cassian solemnitas nocturna (Instit. lib. ii. c. 4), and nocturni psalmi et orationes (ibid. c. 13); by Pseudo-Augustine (Regula, App. i. ad Opp.) and others nocturnae orationes; whence simply nocturnae, as in the rule of S. Ferreol, c. 13. Nocturni (sc. psalmi as in Bened. Regula, c. 15; Aurelian Ordo Regulæ affix.; Regula Magistri, c. 33; &c.) was common. It was also called Nocturnum Officium (Reg. Mag. u. s.); Officium Vigiliæ (Isidori Regula, c. 7); and apparently the word vigiliæ itself conveyed the notion of the service used in the nightly vigil (Benedicti Regula, c. 9; Isid. Reg. c. 7; &c.). The Greek name for the nocturnal office is μεσονυκτικόν (Ordo Philothei in Euchol. Goar, p. 7; Typicon Sabae, c. 5; see Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Graec. Diss. i. p. 65).

In the 4th century there appears a desire to conform, the rule of prayer to the standard which was supposed to be set up in the 119th Psalm, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (v. 164). St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, asks, "If the prophet says, Seven times, &c., who was taken up with the affairs of a kingdom, what ought we to do, who read, Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation? Certainly solemn prayers are to be offered with giving of thanks when we rise from sleep, when we go forth, when we prepare to take food, when we have taken it, and at the hour of incense (St. Luke, ii. 10), lastly when we go to bed" (De Virginitas, lib. iii. c. 4, n. 18; Comm. in Luc. Ev. lib. vii. § 88). If such were to be the practice in private life, it would be felt, how much more signally should monks observe the Psalmist's rule? The argument had weight even with those who understood, as St. Augustine (Serm. xxxi. in Ps. cxviii. § 4) and St. Hilary (Tract. in Ps. eund. lib. xxi. § 4) did, the Scriptural use of that number. Because it is "universitatis indicium," therefore (argues the former) "the church with reason has praised God for His righteous judgments seven times a day." Cassian, A.D. 424, claims for his monastery, the foundation of Paula at Bethlehem, the honour of having settled the rule. This was by the addition of a matin office, afterwards called prime, between the matin lauds and terce. The lauds were "said in the monasteries after a short interval of time when the nocturn psalms and prayers were over;" i.e. shortly before sunrise, while the new matin office, or prime, was said after it. We are not told when it was introduced, but in Cassian's time, though of Eastern origin, it was observed "chiefly in the regions of the West" (De Cœnob. Instit. l. iii. c. iv.). Nevertheless there is no mention of prime in the rules of St. Caesarius (bishop of Arles, A.D. 506) for monks and nuns on week days, and only in one MS. of the latter is it prescribed for Sundays (Martene, De Ant. Monach. Rit. l. i. c. iv. n. 2); nor does he mention it in his homilies, though he entreats the devout to rise early in Lent for vigils, and before all things to assemble for "terce, sext, none" (Hom. cxi. § 2, in App. Opp. Aug.). He assumes of course that they would be present at matins and evensong; and in the duties proper to litany days we find him including attendance at church at "the six hours" (Hom. clxxv. § 3). Some sixty years later Cassiodorus omits prime in his enumeration of the seven hours observed by the monks (Expos. in Ps. cxviii. v. 164). Nor is it recognised by St. Isidore of Seville a century later either in his rule (Holstenii Codex Regul. Monast. p. ii.), or in his work De Officiis. In the latter (lib. i. c. 23) he even quotes what Cassian says of prime as if it referred to the older matin lauds, thus showing ignorance of the institution of another matin office. It was however already known in France, being ordered (and that as if already known) in the rule of Aurelian, a successor of Caesarius at Arles, A.D. 555 (Ordo Regulæ affix. Holst. P. ii. p. 111; P. iii. p. 71). Before the middle of the 7th century it had found its way into Spain; for it is mentioned in the rule of Fructuosus (Holsten. P. ii.; Regula, c. 2) the founder of the Complutensian monastery and many others, who died in 675. It had been introduced in Italy, and an office for it prescribed by St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (Holst. u. s. Regula, c. 17). It appears also in two other Western rules of unknown authorship and country; one (Pseudo-Aug. u. s.) of the 6th century, and the other (Regula Magistri, c. 35, Holsten. P. ii.) belonging to the 7th. It was without doubt largely owing to Benedict and his followers that it now became universal in the Latin church.

The use of seven offices for the day and night, and where prime was adopted, of seven for the day alone, was attained in the 6th century by erecting the last brief prayers said before going to bed into a formal and common service under the name of Compline. St. Ambrose, as already quoted, probably referred to private prayer only; but St. Chrysostom, though the Greek monks did not adopt any set service answering to the Western Compline, appears to speak of hymns sung together when he describes the life of monks in his day. He says that they rise at cockcrow for psalmody and prayer, going to rest again a little before light, that after completing the morning prayers and hymns they turn to the reading of the Scriptures, . . . then observe the third, sixth, and ninth hours, and the evening prayers, and, dividing the day into four parts, honour God in each part by psalmody and prayer; . . . and after sitting (at table) a short time, closing all with hymns, take their rest (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Basil again, referring to the custom of monks:—"When the day is ended, thanksgiving for the things that have been supplied to us and been prosperously ordered, and confession of omissions voluntary or otherwise, &c., are made (i.e. in the evening office) . . . and again, at the beginning of the night, prayer (αἴτησις), that our rest may be undisturbed and free from illusions" (Reg. Fus. Tract. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 5). John Climacus, A.D. 564, in his Liber ad Pastorem, says that a certain abbot when vespers were over would order one monk to say ten psalms (psalmorum odaria), another thirty, a third a hundred, before they went to sleep. The present writer has observed no trace in the East within our period to secure any such last act of devotion by appointing a form of prayer for constant use; but in the Latin church the rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (cc. 16, 17), speaks of Compline as if it were already as well known as Terce or Sext. He does not claim to introduce it; nor does he offer any explanation. At the same time, his adoption of the new hour would cause it to be widely received. Cassiodorus, who probably borrowed from St. Benedict (see Garet's Dissert. appended to the Life in Cassiod. Opp.), in his commentary on the 119th Psalm, written about 560, remarks on the words, "Seven times a day," &c. (v. 164), "If we desire to understand this number literally, it signifies the seven times at which the pious devotion of the monks solaces itself; i.e. at matins, terce, sext, none, lucernaria (vespers), completoria, nocturns."

The word completorium has been said to refer rather in its origin to the completion of the ordinary acts of daily life (Amalaricus De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8; De Ordine Antiph. c. 7) than to the completion of the daily round of devotion. This is the name of most frequent occurrence, owing evidently to its adoption by St. Benedict (cc. 16, 17); but completa is also found as in the Ordines of Aurelian (Holst. P. ii. p. 112: P. iii. p. 72), and in the work of Isidore De Eccl. Off. (lib. i. c. 21); though in his rule (c. 7) completorium is used. A corrupt reading in the 2nd canon of Merida, A.D. 666, which orders that vespers be said on feasts prius quam somnum has led to the conjecture that in Spain compline was sometimes called somnum. No name is given to the office by Fructuosus of Braga, 656, who appears however to refer to compline when in his rule (c. 2) he says, "In the night season therefore the first hour of the night is to be celebrated with six prayers, &c." After describing the office, he speaks of the manner in which the monks shall retire to rest. When the Greeks at length prescribed a constant form answering to the Latin completorium, they called it ἀποδειπνον because it followed the last meal of the day.

Perhaps the earliest authority is the Typicon ascribed to St. Sabas, who died in the 6th century, but which cannot in its present form be earlier than the 11th.

In some monasteries a ninth office was said, called Lucernarium. There was from an early period a pious custom of praying when lamps were lighted in the evening, an action so marked among the old Romans as to give name to that part of the day (prima fax, or prima lumina). "It seemed good to our fathers," says St. Basil, "not to receive in silence the gift of the evening light, but to give thanks as soon as it appeared. But who was the author of those words of thanksgiving at the lighting of lamps we are unable to tell. The people, however, utter the ancient saying, and by no one have they ever been thought guilty of impiety, who say, 'We praise the Father and the Son and Holy Spirit of God'" (De Spir. Sanct. c. lxxiii.). In the Mozarabic Breviary are the following directions for the performance of this rite:—"A commencement is made by the invocation of JESUS CHRIST (the Lord's Prayer preceding it, 'Lord, have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy; Our Father' being said in a low voice) in a loud voice, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, light with peace;' that is, the light offered. Those who stand round respond 'Thanks be to God.' And the presbyter says, 'The Lord be with you always.' Resp. 'And with thy spirit.' And the order of vespers whether it be a festival or not, follows in this manner. This may be illustrated from other Spanish sources. E.g. the rule of St. Isidore says, "In the evening offices, first the lucernarium, then two psalms, one responsory and lauds, a hymn and prayer are to be said" (cap. 7). The lucernarium is here considered the first part of vespers. The second canon of the council of Merida, 666, mentions that vespers were said "after the offering of the light." In the East the 140th Psalm, called the psalm at the lighting (ἐπιλόχμιος) was said before vespers (Compare Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 35, with lib. ii. c. 59). St. Jerome at Bethlehem:—"Let her be trained to offer the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Lactan. Epist. lviii.). Socrates says that "in Greece and at Jerusalem, and in Thessaly they say the prayers at the lighting of lamps very much in the same manner as the Novatians at Constantinople" (Eccl. Hist. lib. v. c. 22). Naturally, vespers which followed these prayers came to be called in some churches by the name of lucernarium, which appeared to be the first part of it; but sometimes the lucernarium was enlarged into a distinct office, said some little time before vespers. Thus the rule falsely ascribed to St. Augustine (Opp. App. i.), after prescribing the psalm for matins, prime, &c., says, "Let the same thing be observed at vespers and compline; but at lucernarium let there be the (proper) psalm, one responsory, three antiphons, three lessons." So in the rules of Aurelian:—"At lucernarium let there be said in the first place at all seasons, both on festivals and ordinary days, a psalm in monotone (directaneus), then two antiphons. In the third place let there be said with Alleluia, one day the hymn Deus, qui certis legibus; another Deus creator omnium, and a little chapter. At Twelfth (vespers) eighteen psalms, an antiphon and hymn, a lesson and little chapter. When ye are about to take your rest, let compline be said in the school in which ye remain" (Regula ad Mon. Holst. P. ii.; Sim. ad Virg. ibid. P. iii.). Here a distinction is clearly made between the lucernarium and vespers. They are distinct offices. It is probable, however, from the paucity of such notices, that the former was treated as a separate service on the same footing with the ancient hours only in a very few communities.

V. Grounds of Observance.—For Matins, reasons of natural piety were often urged, as by St. Basil, "That the first motions of the soul and mind may be dedicated to God, and we admit nothing else into our mind before we have rejoiced in the thought of God" (Rej. Fus. Tr. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 3); and in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 34), "To give thanks because the Lord, causing the night to pass away and the day to come on, hath given us light."

There was the Scriptural reason too, "That the resurrection of the Lord, which took place in the morning, may be celebrated by prayer" (Cyprian, De Or. Dom. u. s.). Similarly, Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. Off. l. i. c. 22; Conc. Aquisgr. cap. 130.

There was a practical reason for the institution of Prime, as well as the ground of religious sentiment, to which we have already had occasion to refer. It was found that the long interval between the matin lauds and terce was often spent in comparative idleness and sloth. The new office was therefore introduced to prevent this (Cassian, Coenob. Inst. l. iii. c. 4). With this statement compare the provision of a Western rule: "After morning prayers let it not be lawful to return to sleep; but when matins are finished let prime be said forthwith. Then let all employ themselves in reading to the third hour" (Aurel. Reg. ad Monach. c. 28).

The third, sixth, and ninth hours, which were observed earlier than any other, were thought to have been selected in honour of the Holy Trinity. Thus St. Cyprian—"We find that the three children with Daniel, strong in faith and conquerors in captivity, observed the third, sixth, and ninth hours for a sacrament of the Trinity, which was to be manifested in the last time; for the first hour coming to the third exhibits the full number of a Trinity, and again the fourth proceeding to the sixth declares another Trinity, and when the ninth is completed by three hours from the seventh a perfect Trinity (i. e. a Trinity of Trinities) is numbered" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). Similarly Isid. Hispal. De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 19; Concil. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, c. 126. The significance of these hours taken separately will be shown below.

Terce, as we have seen, was the continuation of a Jewish custom, as were Sext and None. But there were Christian reasons of great weight for retaining it. "The Holy Ghost," says Cyprian, "descended on the disciples at the third hour" (De Or. Dom. u. s.; Sim. Basil. u. s.; Resp. ad Q. 37; Hieron. Comm. in Dan. vi. 10; Isid. Hispal. u. s. &c.).

Another ground alleged was that "at that hour the Lord received sentence from Pilate" (Cons. Apost. l. viii. c. 34). St. Mark x. 25 refers the crucifixion to the third hour, i. e. to the third of the twelve hours between sunrise and sunset; but if the condemnation took place between that and sunrise, it was also correctly said in ecclesiastical language to have been at the third hour. So John xix. 14, reckoning apparently from midnight, places the condemnation at "about the sixth hour," which brings it down to the third hour understood of the larger space of time, and reckoned from sunrise.

With reference to Sext, it was observed that St. Peter "at the sixth hour went up to the house-top, and was both by sign and by the voice of God warning him, instructed to admit all to the grace of salvation" (Cypr. u. s. comp. Hieron. u. s.). Another and more important reason was that "The Lord was crucified at the sixth hour" (Cypr. u. s. Sim. Constit. Apost. u. s. Isid. Hispal. u. s. Conc. Aquisgr. u. s.), a statement, which if taken to the letter, can only be reconciled with that of St. Mark, by supposing the "sixth hour" to cover the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the smaller hours. If however it means no more than that our Lord hung on the cross at that hour, it needs no explanation.

None was said to be observed because "Peter and John went up to the temple at the ninth hour of prayer" (St. Basil. u. s.; St. Jerome, u. s.); but more than all because "at the ninth hour Christ washed away our sins with His blood" (Cypr. Constit. Apost. &c. as before).

The pious sentiment which dictated the prayers developed in some religious houses into a distinct office, called lucernarium, came before us while we traced the origin of that rite.

Evensong was especially an office of thanksgiving. St. Basil—"Is the day ended? Thank Him who hath given us the sun to minister to the works of the day" (Hom. in Mart. Julittum, § 2). "In the evening giving thanks that God has given us the night for a season of rest from the labours of the day" (Const. Apost. u. s.).

Another thought is connected with it by St. Cyprian:—"Because Christ is the true sun and the true day, when, at the departure of the sun and day of the world, we pray and beseech that the light may come on us again, we are praying for the coming of Christ, who will give the grace of everlasting light" (De Orat. Dom. u. s.). A third ground of this observance is suggested by Cassian, viz., that the eucharist was "delivered to the apostles by the Lord the Saviour in the evening" (Inst. l. iii. c. 3; so Isidore, De Eccl. Off. l. i. c. 20; Conc. Aquisgr. c. 127); and with this was associated the completion of the passion on the following day towards the evening, and about the time of the evening sacrifice (Isid. &c. u. s.).

For Compline there was the strong natural reason, often alleged for private prayer before going to sleep at night, as e. g. in a tract doubtfully ascribed to St. Chrysostom:—"With what hope wilt thou come to the season of night; with what dreams dost thou expect to converse, if thou hast not walled thyself round with prayers, but goest to sleep unprotected?" (De Precat. Or. l. sub fin.). The zeal of David (Ps. cxxii. 3-5) was held up as a model:—"This thing ought powerfully to admonish us that, if we wish to be 'a place for the Lord' and desire to be accounted His tabernacle and temple, we should follow the examples of the saints, lest that which is read should be said of us, 'They have slept their sleep, and none of the men of might have found their hands'" (Isid. u. s. l. i. c. 21; so Conc. Aquisgr. c. 128; Raban. u. s. l. ii. c. 7). "Every one," says Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. iv. c. 8), "who has even a little sense, knows how many dangers may assail a man from without when sleeping more than when waking. This office is in some sort analogous to that commendation, by which a man commends himself to God, when he is passing away from this world. Sleep is the image of death," &c.

Nocturns originated in the pious custom of prayer when one woke in the night. Tertullian says of the meals of Christians, "They are so filled as they who remember that even in the night God is to be worshipped by them" (Apol. c. 39). St. Cyprian:—"There can be no loss from the darkness of night to those who pray; for there is day even in the night to the sons of light" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). Clemens of Alexandria (Pædag. l. ii. c. 9, § 79):—"Often in the night should we rise from bed and bless God; for happy are they who watch unto Him, thus making themselves like the angels whom we call watchers" (Dan. iv. 13, &c.). "Without this prayer" (i.e. prayer expressed in words), says Origen, "we shall not pass the season of the night in a fit manner" (De Orat. c. 12). He refers to David (Ps. cxix. 62), and St. Paul and Silas (Acts xvi. 25). St. Cyril of Jerusalem asks, "When is our mind more intent on psalmody and prayer? Is it not in the night? When do we most frequently come to the remembrance of our sins? Is it not in the night?" (Catech. ix. § 4). St. Ambrose cites the example of Christ:—"The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer, that by His own example He might invite thee to pray" (Expos. in Ps. cxviii. v. 62; Serm. viii. § 45). Elsewhere he says:—"In thy chamber itself I would have psalms by frequent alternation interwoven with the Lord's Prayer, either when thou hast waked up or before sleep bedews the body, that sleep may find thee at the very entrance on rest free from care of worldly things and meditating on divine" (De Virginitas, lib. iii. c. iv. § 19). "David every night watered his couch with tears; he rose also in the middle of the night that he might confess to God, and dost thou think that the whole night is to be assigned to sleep? Then is the Lord to be the more entreated by thee; then is protection to be (more) sought, fault to be (more) guarded against when there appears to be secrecy, and then above all, when darkness is round about me and walls cover me, must I reflect that God beholds all hidden things" (in Ps. cxviii. Expos. Serm. vii. § 31). The example of our Lord was urged:—"The day is not enough for prayer. We must rise in the night and at midnight. The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer; that He might invite thee to pray by His own example" (ibid. Serm. viii. § 45). St. Hilary, after dwelling on the words of David, adds, "The mind is not to be released by the dangerous idleness of wakefulness in the night, but to be employed in prayers, in pleadings, in confessions of sins; that when occasion is most given to the vices of the body, then above all those vices may be subdued by the remembrance of the divine law" (Tract in Ps. cxviii. lit. vii. § 6). To these motives St. Basil adds, "Let the night supply other grounds of prayer. When thou lookest into the sky and gazest on the beauty of the stars," &c. (Hom. in Mart. Julitt. § 3).

VI. The Times of the Offices.—For Nocturns some rose at cockcrow, as prescribed in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. 34). So St. Chrysostom:—"As soon as the cock crows the prefect is standing by (the sleeping monk), and strikes him as he lies lightly with his foot, and so wakes all straightway" (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Columban's rule says the "middle" of the night (c. 7); and in Gregory of Tours one speaks of himself as rising "about midnight ad reddendum cursum" (Hist. Franc. lib. viii. c. 15). St. Benedict orders his monks to rise for vigils "at the eighth hour of the night in winter; i.e. from the Kalends of November to Easter," but during the rest of the year the time of vigils was to be regulated by that of matins, which it was to precede by a "very short interval" (Reg. cap. 8). Another rule, of the 7th century, orders nocturns to be said before cockcrow in winter, and after it in summer, when it was to be "soon" followed by matins (Regula Magistri, c. 33). In Spain the severe rule of St. Fructuosus prescribed two or three offices for the night according to the season, one "before midnight," and a second "at midnight," throughout the year, and in winter a third "after midnight" (Reg. cap. 3); thus carrying out to the letter the exhortation of St. Jerome to Eustochium, "You should rise twice or thrice in the night" (Epist. xviii.).

From the union of nocturns with matins, of which we have seen the beginning, the double office was at a later period called indifferently, nocturns or matins, or lauds.

Matins, properly so-called, were said in the morning watch, or fourth watch of the night; that is to say, at any part of that space of three natural hours which preceded sunrise. They were to be over by dawn: Post matutinum tempus sequitur diluculum (Amal. de Ord. Antiph. c. 5). St. Benedict ordered matins to be said "when the light began" (Reg. c. 8). If it surprised them at nocturns, the latter were to be shortened (c. 11). So early as the beginning of the 5th century, matins (solemnitas matutina) were "wont to be celebrated in the monasteries of Gaul a short interval of time after the night psalms and prayers were finished" (Cassian, Instit. lib. iii. c. 4).

Prime was said in the first natural hour after sunrise. This appears from Cassian's account of its origin. The monks were to be allowed to rest after matins, "usque ad solis ortum," and were then to rise for the new office (Instit. u. s.). And so, four centuries later, Amalarius:—"We begin the first of the day from the rising of the sun" (De Ord. Ant. c. 6); and Rabanus fixes it "at the beginning of the day when the sun first appears from the east" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. c. 3).

Terce might originally be said at any part of the three hours which began at sunrise (see before § ii.); but after the institution of prime it could only be said during the two last. It was not in practice always confined to the last; for in the rule of an unknown author, formerly ascribed to St. Jerome, it is expressly provided that on fast-days, terce, sext, and none, be each said an hour earlier than usual (cap. 34; inter Opp. S. Hieron. tom. v. ed. Ben.). See also the rule of St. Benedict, as cited in § ii.

As the lamps were lighted in preparation for evening prayer, the Lucernarium, as a merely preliminary act of devotion would be said immediately before that; and it was in fact as we have seen, often considered an actual part of the office. Where it became a distinct service, there would, we presume, be an interval of some length before vespers began; but we have no information on the subject.

"It becomes evening when the sun sets" (St. Aug. in Ps. xxix. v. 6, Enarr. ii.). Nevertheless vespers were more generally said in the hour before sunset. This is why the office was called Duodecima (see before § iv.). "We celebrate the evening synaxis," observes Amalarius, "about the 12th hour, which hour is about the end of the day" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 6); "most frequently before sunset" (ibid. c. 70; comp. c. 16; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 20; Raban. Maur. De Instit. Cleri, lib. ii. c. 7). Benedict, in fact, made a rule, which must have influenced the custom greatly, that vespers should be said at all seasons while it was yet daylight; and that in Lent, when refectio followed vespers, they should be said at such an early hour that the meal might be over before the light failed (Reg. cap. 41). Another authority says, "Vespers ought to be said while the rays of the sun are still declining." "In summer, on account of the short nights, let lucernaria (here vespers) be begun while the sun is still high" (Regula Magistri, c. 34).

The history of compline has shown the proper time of saying, viz. before retiring to rest; and this was the time observed by the monks within our period. Thus a MS. of the Regula of pseudo-Augustine, now 1200 years old:—"After this (i.e. after certain lessons read at night) let the usual psalms be said before sleep" (Note of Bened. editors, App. i. Opp. Aug.). St. Isidore:—"Compline being ended, the brethren, as the custom is, having wished each other good night before sleeping, must keep still with all heed and silence until they rise for vigils" (Reg. c. 7). St. Fructuosus, after prescribing the office of "the first hour of the night," orders his monks to bid each other good-night and retire to their dormitories (Reg. i. c. 2). Another rule forbids the monks to speak, eat, drink, or do any work after compline (Regula Magistri, c. 30). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8) tells us that compline was said in the conticinium; i.e. in the third part of the night, reckoning from sunset, when it was divided, as by the Romans, into seven.

When vespers were said earlier compline was put earlier too, and one writer at the close of our period gives it the name of Duodecima (Smaragdus, Comment. in S. Ben. Reg. c. 16). It had already taken possession of the hour so long occupied by vespers. At length it became the common opinion that it ought to be said at the twelfth hour (Francolinus, u. s. cap. 18).

HOUSE. In Aringhi, i. p. 522, ii. 658, are woodcuts of houses from ancient tombs [TOMB]. This, perhaps, refers to the grave as the house of the dead, an idea or expression inherited from heathenism (Horace Carm. i. iv. 19, and Boddetti, p. 463; even Domus Aeterna, Perret v. pi. 36, x. 110), or to the deserted house of the soul, the buried body (2 Cor. v. i.). "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God," &c. In one of the plates from Aringhi above referred to (ii. 658) there is a house of the grave, with a small mummy of Lazarus; laid up alone (depositus or repositus) to abide the resurrection. The houses of Jerusalem and Bethlehem, representing the Jewish and Gentile churches, occur frequently in ancient paintings and mosaics. [BETHLEHEM.] How far the word Beth, as part of Bethlehem ("house of bread"), may be connected with the Christian import of this symbol, is hard to say. [R. St. J. T.]

HUCKSTERS. The mind of the church has of course always been against all unprincipled gain in traffic, even when permitted by law and custom. Adulterators or fraudulent dealers (κάπηλοι) are enumerated (Apost. Const. iv. 6, §2) among those whose oblations are not to be received.^a And again (ib. viii. 32, §5) the κάπηλος is classed with the stage-players and dancers, among those who must abandon their profession before they can be admitted to the church. Lactantius (Div. Inst. v. c. 16) emphatically rejects the doctrine of Carneades, that the seller is not bound to declare the faults of the article which he has for sale, and insists that the Christian conscience requires perfect frankness and openness in such a matter. In the same spirit St. Augustine (Tract. 41 in Joan.) puts fraud on the same level as fornication and theft, and gives high praise (De Trin. xiii. 3) to one who, in buying a book, declined to overreach the seller, who was ignorant of its value. So, too, Hilary (on Ps. cxix. [cxviii. Vulg.] 139) enumerates cheating (falsitates) among the things which make our bodies a den of thieves. In short, all kinds of unprincipled dealers (ῥαδιουργοί) and sorcerers, all who give short weight or measure (ζυγοκρούσται καὶ δολομέτραι) are condemned (Apost. Const. iv. 6, §1).

Tertullian (De Idolol. c. 11; cf. Epiphanius, Ereos. Fid. c. 24) and some others regard with disfavour all gain derived from mere buying and selling of goods, considering the labour of the hands the proper means of earning a living. But Leo the Great (Epist. 92, ad Rustic. c. 9) reasonably distinguishes between honest and unprincipled gain (quaestus honestus aut turpis); the culpability or innocence of gain (he holds) depends upon its character; there is no harm in profit not derived from fraudulent practice. HUMERALE. [AMICE.]

HUNTING. Field-sports have been under the censure of the church from an early period, and in the many canons relating to them there is very little trace of any disposition to relax the severity of absolute prohibition, or to allow exceptional cases in which they might be necessary or desirable.

By the 55th canon of the council of Agde (C. Agathense), A.D. 544, bishops and presbyters are forbidden to keep hawks and hounds for the chase under penalty of three months' excommunication in the case of bishops, and of two months' in the case of priests, and of one in the case of deacons. The same abstinence is enjoined on bishops, presbyters and deacons, under the same penalty by the 4th canon of the council of Epaon. By the 3rd canon of the council of Soissons, not only bishops, presbyters and deacons, but all ecclesiastical persons (clerici) are forbidden to hunt with hounds or to take out hawks. In the 8th canon of the third council of Tours, priests are cautioned against the hunting of birds and wild animals, and the second council of Châlons (c. 9) addresses a similar warning against devoting their time to "hounds, hawks, and falcons," to laity as well as to clergy. It seems that certain bishops kept dogs under the pretence that they were necessary for the defence of their houses; but they are reminded by the 13th canon of the second council of Maçon, A.D. 585, that not "barks but hymns, not bites but good works" are the proper protection of a bishop's house, which ought to welcome and not repel men, and certainly not subject any who came for the relief of their sorrows to the risk of being torn by dogs.

Among prohibitions against the same pursuits issued by individuals, is to be found a letter of Boniface, bishop of Mayence (Epist. 105), probably written on the authority of pope Zachary, forbidding "huntings and excursions with dogs through the woods, and the keeping of hawks and falcons;" and the same prohibition is repeated, totidem verbis, in the 2nd canon of the council of Liptine, A.D. 743, over which Boniface presided. In the Liber Poenitentialis of pope Gregory III. one year's penance is decreed against one in minor orders (clericus), two years' against a deacon, and three years' against a priest, for hunting.

Ferreolus, bishop of Uzès, in his Rule (about A.D. 558), forbids his monks to hunt and hawk on the ground that such pursuits dissipate the mind; he allows them however to set dogs at the wild animals which waste their crops, but only that they may "drive them away, not that they may catch them." Jonas, bishop of Orleans, A.D. 821-844, (de Institut. laic. ii. 23, quoted by Thomassin), vents his indignation against the nobles for spending so much money on hawks and hounds instead of on the poor; and is even more fierce against them for the hardships and cruelties which for the sake of their sport they inflicted on the poor. The frequent recurrence of these prohibitions and the number of years over which they extend, show how rooted was the taste for field-sports among the Teutonic clergy; and the language of some of the canons indicates that these sports sometimes became as oppressive as the Forest Laws of the Middle Ages.

Looking on, or being present at the hunting, or baiting, or fighting of wild animals in the amphitheatre is just as strictly forbidden. The council in Trullo (Quinisextum), can. 51, orders both laity and clergy to avoid "the spectacles of huntings," on pain of excommunication, and hunting is so frequently mentioned in connection with games, dances, and dramatic performances, that it must be concluded that the sports of the amphitheatre are intended. The Codex Eccl. Africanæ (c. 61) entreats the emperors to put an end to spectacles on great festivals, such as the octave of Easter, and begs that no Christian may be compelled to attend them. By the council of Mayence (addit. 3, c. 27) it is ordered that if any ecclesiastical person attend any spectacle he is liable to three years' suspension. By the 3rd council of Tours and the second council of Châlons, quoted above, the condemnation of hunting is coupled with that of theatrical spectacles, so that to look at a spectacle of hunting in the amphitheatre would be by the same act to commit two offences against the canon. The 8th canon of the council of Friuli (Forojuliense) issued a canon against the worldly pomps and vanities in vogue, in which "huntings" are mentioned with other amusements manifestly scenic.

Theodosius the younger abolished contests between men and brutes in the circus on the ground that "cruel sights made him shudder" (Socrates, H.E. vii. 22).

HYDROMANTIA. The Decretum Gratiani (cau. 26, qu. 5, c. 14, § 3) has the following in the enumeration of magic arts which are condemned:—"Hydromantici ab aquâ dicti; est enim Hydromantia in aquæ inspectione umbras daemonum evocare, et imagineas ludificationes eorum videre, ibique ab eis aliqua audire, ubi adhibito sanguine etiam interos perhibentur suscitare." The chapter from which this is extracted is taken wholly from Rabanus De Magorum Praestigis, which is again a compilation from Augustine and Isidore of Seville. The passage of Augustine on which the account of Hydromantia is mainly founded is De Civ. Dei, vii. 35, and is to this effect; that Numa, having no real divine inspiration, was compelled to practise hydromancy, so as to see in water images, or rather false semblances (ludificationes), of the gods, and learn from them what he was to ordain with regard to the sacra of his people; and from this use of water for divining purposes (says Varro) Numa gained the reputation of having consulted the nymph Egeria.

It is evident (as indeed Augustine says) that this hydromancy was a form of necromancy. What was its exact nature is not apparent, but it was probably similar to the divining by means of a mirror, or of a dark fluid poured into the palm of the hand, which is frequently mentioned in accounts of magic. HYMN (the Cherubic). A hymn so called from the reference to the cherubim which it contains, which occurs in the chief eastern liturgies shortly after the dismissal of the catechumens, and immediately preceding the "great entrance" (i.e. that of the elements). It is found in the same position in the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark; and also in the Armenian, in which however it is only sung on special occasions, other hymns being appointed in its place on other days. It is not found in the "heretical liturgies;" which, inasmuch as these underwent less alteration than the orthodox, is an argument against the antiquity of the hymn. Cedrenus (Dupin Bibl. des Aut. Eccles. 11me Siècle) a Greek monk who flourished towards the middle of the 11th century, and who wrote "annals" from the creation of the world down to the reign of Isaac Comnenus, says that Justinian first ordered it to be sung in the churches; and it appears to have been composed about that time. Its object is described as being to excite the minds of the faithful to a devout attention to the mysteries about to be celebrated. While it is being sung, the priest says secretly a prayer called "the prayer of the cherubic hymn." The words of the hymn are: οἱ τὰ χερουβίμ μυστικῶς εἰκονίζοντες, καὶ τῷ ζωοποιῷ Τριᾷδι τὸν τρισάγιον ὕμνον ᾄδοντες. πᾶσαν τὴν βιωτικὴν ἀποτομέμεθα μέριμναν, ὡς τὸν βασιλέα τῶν ὅλων ὑποδεξάμενοι ταῖς ἀγγελικαῖς ἀοράτως δορυφορομενον τάξεσιν. Ἀλληλούια. [H. J. H.]

HYMNARIUM. The book containing the hymns sung in the services of the church. Genadius (De Script. Eccl. c. 49) says that Paulinus of Nola composed "Sacramentarium et Hymnarium;" see Gavanti, *Thes. "State nunc, hymnite matres pro receptis parvulis."

HYMNOLOGIA (ὕμνολογία) seems to be equivalent to the service chanted at the Hours. Thus Gregory of Tours (Hist. Rem. c. 25) says that St. Remi with the brothers, "horarum laudes persolvebat hymnologiarum," meaning (seemingly) that he observed the course set down in the Hymnologies, the term being used so as to include psalms, canticles, antiphons, etc. Macro (Hierolex. s. v.) supposes that Dionysius, the Pseudo-Areopagite (Hierarch. Eccl. iii. 2), when he speaks of ἡ καθολικὴ ὕμνολογία having been uttered as a confession (προσολογηθείσης) before the elements were placed on the altar, meant the Creed. This is of course possible, and Pachymeres (Paraphr. in loco) seems to have taken it so; for they had, he says, even then, μᾶθημά τι καὶ συμάστημα πίστεως [CREED]. [C.]

HYMNS. In the following article no attempt will be made to deal with the literary or theological history of Christian hymnody. All that can be here undertaken is to give a sketch of what is known respecting the liturgical use of hymns within the limits to which this work is restricted. Much of the difficulty connected with the subject arises from our uncertainty as to how much was covered by the word ὕμνος in early Christian writers. Almost everything sung, or rhythmically recited, which was not one of the Davidic Psalms, was called a hymn, or said to be "hymned." Even as late as the middle of the ninth century, Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 25) warns us that by "hymns" he does not mean merely such metrical hymns as those of Hilary, Ambrose, Prudentius, or Bede, but such other acts of praise as are offered in fitting words and with musical sounds. He adds that still in some churches there were no metrical hymns, but that in all "generales hymni, id est laudes," were in use. The well-known passage of St. Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. lxxii.), which was for centuries the formal definition of a hymn in every ritual writer, gives us the same rule. A hymn might or might not be in verse; but it was always something meant to be sung, and sung as an act of divine worship. So Gregory Nazianzen defines a hymn as αἶνος ῥαψῳδῆς. Further, Christian writers gradually learned to use the term in contradistinction to the Psalm of the Old Dispensation; though both words were for a time interchangeable.

It is obvious that from the very first, Gentile disciples must have sought and found some further expression for the praise of God than the translation of Hebrew Psalms, or of the canticles from the Hebrew prophets, could afford. But at what period Christian songs of praise first found their place in common worship, it is impossible to say. None can tell in what words Paul and Silas "ᾄδοντες τῷ κυρίῳ" in prison (Acts xvi. 25); nor can we say with certainty that the rhythmic passages in the Epistles (e. g. Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 15, 16; 2 Tim. ii. 11-13) are quotations from hymns, though this has been frequently maintained. The parallel passages, again, Eph. v. 19, 20, and Col. iii. 16, 17, though evidently pointing to some form of Christian song, yet appear to connect these with social and festive gatherings rather than with worship. Probably they bore the same relation to the forms used in public worship which the Spiritual Songs of Luther, the "Ghostly Psalms" of Coverdale, or the early Wesleyan hymns, did to the existing forms of service in their day; and it may be that, like some of the first and last of these, they were subsequently adopted into divine service. This we know to have been the case at a later period with the φῶς ἱλαρόν referred to by St. Basil (De Sp. Sancto, c. 29) as being (in his time) of ancient use; it is still, as is well known, a part of the daily office of the Greek church. If this hymn were really the work of Athenagenes († 169), it would doubtless be the earliest hymn now in use; but a reference to the passage in St. Basil will show that he did not believe Athenagenes to be the author. This hymn, with the early form of the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the latter being given as the morning hymn of the church in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 48 Cotelier.), probably represent in their rhythmic but unmetrical structure many early Christian hymns now lost. Of the existence of such hymns, from the time of Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (Epist. 97), we have abundant evidence. The "hymning to God the giver of all good things," by the Roman Christians after the martyrdom of Ignatius (Mart. S. Ign. vii.), may have been a burst of extemporaneous thanksgiving; but early in the following century a Roman writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28) tells us how ψαλμοὶ δὲ ὕμνοι καὶ ψάλλαι ἀδελφῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὑπὸ πιστῶν γραφεῖσιν, τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν Χριστὸν ὑμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες; and again the Clementine Epitome De gestis Petri, § 152, refers to ἱερῶν ὕμνων εὐχὴν as a part of worship. Of Alexandria, again, Origen testifies (c. Celsum, viii. c. 67) ὕμνοις γὰρ εἰς μόνον τὸν ἐπὶ πᾶσι λεγόμενον Θεὸν καὶ τὸν μονογενῆ αὐτοῦ Θεὸν λόγον [al. τ. κ. α. λόγον καὶ Θεόν]. (Cf. also Fragm. in Ps. 148.)

Again, an early tradition reported by Socrates (H. E. vi. 8) attributes to Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal singing at Antioch, as the result of a vision of the angelic worship which was revealed to him [ANTIPHON]. The monks of the Syrian deserts, in the time of Sozomen (H. E. vi. 33, 2) continued in prayers and hymns according to the rule of the church (θέσμον τῆς ἐκκλησίας). The point to which all these allusions tend is the very early use of hymns both in the East and West. Of the East, indeed, we can speak more positively. The Epistle of the second council of Antioch (A.D. 269) to the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, against Paul of Samosata, makes it one of the charges against him, that he had "put a stop to the psalms that were sung to our Lord Jesus Christ, as being innovations, the work of men of later times;" while, to the horror of every one, he had appointed women to say psalms on Easter Day in his own honour (εἰς ἑαυτὸν) [Euseb. H. E. vii. 30]. This last expression may simply refer to his position on a throne of unusual height and dignity in the church; and it is not unlikely that Paul sought to confine the singing strictly to Jewish psalmody. Another inference deducible from this passage is that metrical hymns were as yet unknown in Antioch. It is a disputed point whether metre was used in divine service before the fourth century; but probabilities are against its use. If used at all, it must have been in Greek hymns, for reasons which will presently appear. No metrical hymns are now used in the Orthodox Eastern church, but all its ecclesiastical verse since the eighth century has been simply rhythmic and accentual, like the earliest Latin sequences; but it is impossible to say whether for a time metrical hymns found their way into Greek offices. The so-called "earliest Christian hymn," the epilogue of Clement of Alexandria to his Παιδαγωγός, is not, except in a loose modern sense, a hymn at all. The same may be said of the sacred verses of Gregory Nazianzen; those of Sophronius approach nearer to the hymnic form, but it is unlikely that his Anacreontic verse could have found its way into divine service.

The fourth century, however, saw a great impulse given to the liturgical use of hymns successively in Syria, Constantinople, and the West, under the influence of three eminent men, and with the same object, the enlisting popular feeling on the side of orthodoxy in times of fierce controversy. The earliest of these movements was that of Ephraim at Edessa. Greek metres and music were introduced into Syriac either by Bardaisan [see BARDESANES in Dict. of Chr. Biogr.], or (more probably) by his son Harmonius, whose hymns Ephraim found to be so popular, that he felt anxious to counteract their influence by the substitution of orthodox hymns which might be sung to the same tunes. According to the Syriac life of St. Ephraim (quoted by Augusti), he trained choirs of virgins to sing to these tunes hymns which he proceeded to write on the Nativity, Baptism, Fasting, Passion and Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord, and on other divine mysteries; to which he added others on the martyrs, on penitence, and on the departed. The young women of this association attended divine service on the festivals of our Lord, and of martyrs, and on Sundays; Ephraim himself standing in the midst, and leading them (cf. Sozomen, H. E. iv. 16; Theodoret, iv. 29). From that time forward metrical hymnody became a fixed element in the worship of the Syriac-speaking churches, and has filled a very large place not only in their daily offices, but in the Eucharistic, and indeed in all others. It is not so easy to understand precisely what was effected in Constantinople under Chrysostom; because we do not know what singing was already in use in the churches there. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 24) attributes the introduction of antiphonal singing into Constantinople to two priests under Constantine, named Flavian and Diodorus. In most ritual matters Constantinople followed the lead of Antioch; and this custom may have been an imitation of what was already in use there. We cannot doubt, however, that the device of Chrysostom for silencing or outbidding the Arians, as related by Sozomen (H. E. viii. 8, 1-5), led to a much freer and more abundant use of hymns in divine service. The Arians had been expelled by Theodosius from the churches of the city; but their numbers were still very great, and they had places of assembly outside the walls. On Saturdays and Sundays they assembled in crowds in the open spaces of the city, singing Arian hymns and antiphons, and went in procession, with these hymns, to their churches. Chrysostom determined to organize rival processions of the orthodox. The empress Eudocia entered into the scheme, and a eunuch of the imperial household was instructed to furnish the necessary materials for the ceremonial, at her expense. It is curious to find that these included not merely crosses and torches, but also hymns; so unimportant did the words sung appear to Chrysostom in reference to the end in view. But whether the hymns were good or bad, the midnight processions popularised their use; and from the night offices of the church they seem to have passed into other hours. The midnight singing of the "Golden Canon" of St. John Damascene, so graphically described by Neale (Hymns of Eastern Ch. p. 35), which forms so marked and picturesque a feature of the Greek Easter, is doubtless the true historical representation of Chrysostom's nocturnal processions (cf. Socrates, vi. 8; Cassiodorus, Hist. Trip. x. 8; Nicephorus, viii. 8, 9). It was not, however, according to Neale (u. s. p. 13), till the period of the Iconoclastic controversy (A.D. 726-820) that Greek hymnology reached its full development. Its great names are Andrew of Crete (660-732), John Damascene († 780), Cosmas the melodist († 760), Theophanes (759-818), Theodore of the Studium († 826), and Methodius († 836). How marvellous its development was may be gathered from the fact alleged by Neale that out of the five thousand quarto pages, which he computes to be the contents of the whole body of Greek office-books, at least four thousand are poetry. For a full and elaborate account of the structure and contents of a Greek canon, or group of odes, which forms the staple of the morning office, the reader is referred to the articles CANON (p. 277) and ODE. The other subsidiary forms of hymn are explained in the same volume.

By a singular coincidence the establishment of hymnody as a constant element of divine service in the West, had been brought about, a few years before, by similar disputes between Arians and Catholics. The facts are related by Augustine, who, with his mother Monica, was at Milan at the time (Conf. IX. vii.), as well as more briefly by Paulinus, St. Ambrose's deacon (Vita S. Amb. p. 80; ed. Bened. Paris, 1632). St. Ambrose, in consequence of his refusal to give up to the empress Justina one of the basilicas of Milan for Arian worship at Easter, A.D. 385, had incurred her resentment. In the following year sentence of exile was passed upon him. He refused to obey; and the population, who were devoted to him, guarded the gates of his house, and kept watch night and day in his church, to defend him from capture by the imperial troops. This company of perpetual watchers Ambrose organized into a band of perpetual worshippers. A course of offices, psalmody, prayer, and hymns, was established, and once established, became a permanent institution [HOURS OF PRAYER]. Augustine expressly says that this was an imitation of the Eastern custom; by which he probably means the course of daily and nightly psalmody and prayer—the practice of Oriental ascetics, both Jewish (cf. Philo de Vita contemplativa, c. x. [ii. 484, Mangey] quoted by Euseb. H. E. ii. 17) and Christian.

But it is especially to these services organized by St. Ambrose, as all subsequent writers agree, that we of the Western churches owe the incorporation into our offices of metrical hymnody (cf. Isidore of Seville, de Eccl. Off. i. 6; Walafriid Strabo, de Rebus Eccl. xxv. &c. and Paulinus, l. c.). Unlike Chrysostom, Ambrose was able to supply his congregations with words, and himself to set them to music (see AMBROSIAN MUSIC, and Koch, Kirchenlied, vol. i. pp. 61, sqq.). Of the metrical hymns which are undoubtedly his, Biraghi (Iuni Sincri di Sant' Ambrogio) enumerates eighteen, Koch twenty-one. But Milan became a school of Ambrosian hymnody, which has left its mark upon the whole of the West. Ninety-two hymns of this school are given by Daniel (Thes. Hymn. vol. i.). Yet, though Ambrose is the true founder of metrical hymnody in the West, it is possible that hymns were already in use elsewhere. Hilary of Poitiers is sometimes spoken of as the first to introduce them; he certainly was a hymn writer, and his hymn "Lucis largitor optime (al. splendide)," sent from his exile in Phrygia, as early as A.D. 358, to his daughter Abra, found its way into church use. Pseudo-Alcuin (de Div. Off. § 10) attributes to him the completion, in its present Western form, of the "Gloria in Excelsis," and it is at least possible that he may have introduced other innovations, especially as some of his hymns (notably a well-known Lenten one, "Jesu quadragenariae)," though common in Germany and England, were not in use in Italy. The work of St. Gregory the Great is not, as a hymnographer, distinct from that of St. Ambrose; he introduced no new species of hymn, nor, it would appear, any new use for hymns; his ritual and liturgical work lay in other directions, though he made many important contributions to the now rapidly increasing stock of metrical hymns. But the progress of hymnody for the next four centuries will be best illustrated by a table of the sources from which the leading Breviary hymns have been derived. In the subjoined list, the numbers in the first column are from Daniel, who, without attempting perfect accuracy, arranges under the name of each author the hymns traditionally assigned to him; those in the second column from Koch, who has endeavoured to assign to each author the hymns known to be his, but has not consulted so wide a range of breviaries as Daniel:—

The use of Ambrosian and other hymns of Italian origin was much extended by the establishment of the monastic orders, each with its own set of offices for the hours. Benedict especially is expressly mentioned by Walafrid Strabo as having inserted in his offices many Ambrosian hymns. Other countries began, as the above lists will show, to produce hymnographers of their own, especially Spain, of whose rich store of hymns the Mozarabic Breviary is an evidence. There are signs, however, that this influx of hymns did not everywhere meet with favour. The complaint made by the orthodox against heretics that they had innovated, could now be turned against themselves (Ambrose, Ep. 873, 72); and among Catholics there were some who doubted, like the Genevan reformers later, whether it were right to use in worship any but the words of Scripture. Others, as time went on, became accustomed to the Ambrosian hymns, but hesitated to receive fresh ones. At the second council of Tours (567-8), by canon 23, the admission of other hymns of merit, in addition to the Ambrosian, was formally sanctioned. At Toledo, again, complaints were made that some still rejected the hymns of Hilary and Ambrose, as not scriptural (Walafrid Strabo, l. c.). At length, on Dec. 5, 633, at the fourth council of Toledo, under the presidency of Isidore, a canon (c. 13) was passed threatening with excommunication all in France or Spain who opposed the use of hymns in divine service. Yet, as we have seen, there were still some churches, even in the ninth century, which did not admit metrical hymns into their offices.

Two points remain to be noticed—the metre of Latin hymns, and the offices to which they were restricted.

Ambrose found in the Iambic Dimeter (our present L. M.) a metre admirably adapted to the concise and solemn language of his hymns, and equally well fitted for singing. This accordingly has been the normal metre of Latin hymnology, down to the invention of sequences. But it was by no means used in strict conformity to classical models; accent and quantity, it must be confessed, were both at times disregarded. Some attempts were made, however, at other metres. Among the so-called Ambrosian hymns appears one on St. John Baptist, in four-line stanzas of Alcaic Hendecasyllables—and four others, one for fair weather, one for rain, and two in time of war, in a peculiar form of the lesser Asclepiad, with spondee instead of dactyl in the last place.

"Obduxere potum nubila coeli."

The poems of Prudentius, not being originally intended for church song, supply other irregularities, as Iambic Trimeter—

"O Nazarene, lux Bethlem, verbum Patris,"

and the Anacreontic (Iamb. Dim. Catal.)—

"Cultor Dei memento."

The fine cento from his "Da puer plectrum," beginning—

"Corde natus ex Parentis ante mundi exordium," first introduced into church song the Trochaic Tetrameter Catalectic of Greek tragedy, which has been so great and permanent a gain. He has also a hymn in stanzas of four Sapphic lines (without the final Adonius)—

"Inventor rutili dux bone luminis."

Two centos from Fortunatus—

"Crux benedicta nitet, dominus qua carne pendit," and the well-known "Salve festa dies," are the earliest instances of elegiac verse in church song. It is to be noted that both were processional. St. Gregory the Great wrote Sapphic hymns for the hours—

"Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes,"

and thenceforth their use was not infrequent.

A few other irregularities may be mentioned, but they are unimportant.

The use of hymns till now was threefold: (1) as processional; (2) in the canonical hours; (3) at certain special offices, such as the Benediction of Paschal tapers, &c. As yet no metrical hymns were used in any part of the Eucharistic office. Walafrid Strabo mentions, however, that Paulinus "Patriarcha Forojuliensis" (Paulinus of Aquileia) had frequently, especially in private masses, introduced hymns either of his own or of others, "circa immolationem sacramentorum" (i.e. at the Illation or Preface following the Sursum corda). He adds that so great a man would not have done this without authority or reason. It is possible, therefore, that there were other instances of the interpolation of hymns into the Mass. One such is known to us, the verses attributed by Daniel to Eugenius of Toledo—sung as a Communio, or Antiphona ad accedentes, before the reception of the elements; Neale (Chr. Reminiscancer, Oct. 1853) assigns this to the seventh or eighth century. These exceptional uses were foreshadowings of the great outburst of sequences in the beginning of the tenth century, which was destined to add so much to the splendour and variety of Latin hymnody.

"Sancti venite, corpus Christi sumite,"

HYPACOE (ὑπακοή). Certain rhythmic compositions, or hymns, which follow upon and echo (as it were) the sense of that which prereded, are called ὑπακοαί, because they depend upon (ὑπακουοῦσι) that which has gone before, as a servant on a master. This is the explanation of Coresi. Goar, however (quoted in Daniel's Codex, iv. 723), prefers the explanation, that such hymns relate some wonderful work of God, by listening to which the church may be edified. Neither explanation is perhaps quite satisfactory, but the latter can scarcely be considered to give any reason at all why these hymns should be called Hypacoe more than many other parts of the office. [C.]

HYPAPANTE (often written HYPANTE), a name given to the festival of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, from her meeting (ὑπαπαντή) with Simeon and Anna in the Temple. [MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] [C.]

HYPATIUS, bishop of Gangra in Paphlagonia, θανατοουργός; commemorated March 31 (Cul. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

HYPocaustORIUM, a room warmed by a hypocaust, or furnace under the floor. Thus Thiadidlis, abbess of Freckenhorst, in Westphalia, is said to have built in her monastery "refectatorium hemale et aestivale, hypocaustorium, dormitorium, cellarium, domum arearum, etc." (Vita S. Thiad. c. 7, in Acta Sanctorum, 30 January, App. vol. ii.). [C.]

HYPOPSALMA (ὑπόψαλμα), a particular manner of chanting the Psalms. The Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57, § 5) give the direction, "after every two lessons let some other chant (ψαλλέτω) the hymns of David, and let the people chant responsive (ὑποψαλλέτω) the ends of the verses." Such a replication of the body of the congregation to the voice of the single chanter was called ὑπόψαλμα. Compare ANTI-PHON (Bingham's Ant. XIV. i. 12). [C.]

IXΘΥC. (Compare FISH, p. 673.) The fish is found in an allegoric or symbolic sense in the ancient remains of almost every nation. Among the Assyrian fragments discovered by Mr. Layard, for instance, are frequent instances of monsters partly formed of fish. See, as examples, Monuments of Nineveh, pl. 39, 67 B, 68, 71, 72, &c. The gem figured on p. 674 of this work, in which a man appears covered with the skin of a fish, is probably a representation of this kind of monster, rather than of the Apostolic fisherman. The coins of Tyre and Phoenicia, maritime nations, show on their coins fish, or monsters ending in fish. The same object is found on Egyptian monuments, though much more sparingly, for the fish was an abomination to the Egyptians (Clemens Alex. Strom. vii. 6; p. 850, Potter; compare v. 7, p. 670). Nor is the symbolic fish wanting in the remains of the Indo-Germanic races (Sir W. Jones in Asiatic Researches, i. p. 230; Ann. de Philosophie Chrét. v. p. 430). The dolphin in particular is continually represented in art and lauded by the poets; and we not unfrequently meet with allusions to a mysterious fish, the κάλλιχθυσ, from the presence of which all noxious things fled away: "Ἐν τοῖς καὶ κάλλιχθυσ ἐπάνωμος, ἰερός ἰχθύς" (Oppian. Haliout. i. 185).

When we find it in Christian symbolism, the question arises, whether the fish, like so many other symbols and formulae, was adopted by the early Christians from the already existing art? Looking at the general character of early Christian art, considering its constant adoption even of symbols and representations obviously pagan, it would seem probable that a special sense was given to an already existing mode of representation. And this particular symbolism seems to have been determined by the discovery of the acrostic ἰχθύς, from which the fish, many times mentioned in the gospels, received a mystic significance.

It is quite uncertain when it was first observed that the word ἰχθύς is formed of the initials of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ. We may perhaps assume, that whenever the fish was recognised as the symbol of the Lord, it was in consequence of the acrostic meaning having been discovered, and, if this was the case, it must have been recognised from the very earliest days of Christianity. The Clavis attributed to Melito of Sardis, which, if genuine, belongs to the middle of the second century, lays it down that Piscis=Christus (c. iv. § xl.; Spirital. Solesm. ii. 173); but the date and character of that work, although Dom Pitra seems to entertain no doubts, cannot be considered as beyond question. The Sibylline verses give (lib. viii. 217–250) the famous acrostic on the letters of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ, σταυρός. At the time when this was written, the mystic meaning of ἰχθύς was clearly recognised, but the date of the verses is by no means certain. Clement of Alexandria (Pædag. iii. 11, § 59; see GEMS, p. 712) numbers the fish among Christian symbols, but does not state its special significance; elsewhere (Strom. vi. 11, § 94) he regards the "five barley loaves and two small fishes" as typical of the preparatory discipline of Jews and Gentiles. In Clement's contemporary Tertullian we arrive at firmer ground; he writes (De Baptismo, c. i.) "Nos pisciculi, secundum IXΘYN nostrum, in aqua nascimur." Here we have both the primary and the secondary application of the fish-symbol. First, the Fish is Christ, and that clearly as IXΘΥC, showing that Tertullian had the acrostic in his mind; secondly, they who are born of Christ are in their turn "smaller fishes," a symbolism which also took a firm hold on the mind of the early Church, and is often alluded to [FISHERMAN, p. 674]; thirdly, a fresh significance is added to the conception of the believer as the fish, inasmuch as it is through the water of baptism that they are born from above. It is to be observed that Tertullian gives no explanation of the IXΘΥC which would be intelligible to the uninitiated; the symbol, whether written or pictured, was part of the secret language of the early Church. This reticence was probably maintained during the centuries of persecution; but when the need of concealment ceased, we find the true significance of the symbol proclaimed. Thus, the writer of the work De promission. et benedict. Dei, attributed to Prosper of Aquitaine (ii. 39), seems to give positive testimony on this point. "IXΘYN, latine piscem, sacris litteris majores nostri interpretati sunt, hoc ex sibyllinis versibus colligentes." Augustine, too, speaking of the Sibyl, says (De civi Dei, xviii. 23), "If you join the first letters of the five Greek words 'Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός, Θεοῦ, Υἱός, Σωτήρ, you will have ΙΧΘΥC, fish, in which word Christ is mysteriously designated. Compare Optatus c. Donatist, iii. 2. And when the Empire became Christian, and it was no longer necessary for Christians to conceal the great object of their faith under a symbol, its use began to decline. De Rossi, the highest authority on such a matter, assures us that at Rome, at least, it is scarcely ever found in cemeteries formed after the age of Constantine, but is almost confined to the catacombs, and to the most ancient portions of these. It was, he believes, growing obsolete in the 4th century, and was scarcely ever used merely as a symbol, whether at Rome or in the provinces, in the 5th. The symbolic fish, indeed, is found on an ambo in the church of St. John and St. Paul at Ravenna, which is shown by an inscription to be of the year 597; and the ΙΧΘΥC is found on the large cross in the apse of St. Apollinaris in Classe, near the same city, which Ciampini* (Vet. Monum. ii. 79, ed. 2) maintains to be a work of the year 567. These, however, are rather instances of the use of ancient symbols by an artist for decorative purposes, than of the continued use of the symbol, as such. When the symbols occur in inscriptions, where mere ornament is evidently not intended, we may be sure that they are still used as a sign for believers. In representations of scenes from the gospels, or from hagiology, fish are of course found in all ages of Christian art.

Although the ΙΧΘΥC was originally an acrostic, there is only one ancient inscription known in which it actually appears as such. In all other cases it stands separate, at the beginning or end of an inscription, or both; generally it is written horizontally in the ordinary manner, but sometimes vertically (Fabretti, Inscript. Expl. p. 329; compare GEMS, p. 714). It would indeed be impossible to arrange ΙΧΘΥC as an acrostic in a Latin inscription, and all the ΙΧΘΥC monuments which have come down to us are Latin, with the one exception just referred to. This famous slab was found in the year 1839, beneath the surface, in an ancient cemetery^b near Autun, and was first published by Dom (now Cardinal) Pitra (Annales de Phil. Chrét. 2^e sér. t. xix. p. 195). Since that time a considerable literature has gathered round it. It is a sepulchral inscription over one Pectorius, son of Aschandius. It is imperfect, but as to the restoration of the first six lines there is no very great difference of opinion among palaeographers and scholars. Mr. W. B. Marriott (Testimony, p. 118) gives the inscription thus:

Χρῆσε λαβὼν [ζῶν] ἄμβροτον ἐν βροτείῳ Θεσπέσιον ἰδάτων τὴν σὴν, φίλε, θάλλω ψυχῇ

* Ciampini misreads the ΙΧΘΥC; but Gori (Diptych. iii. 291) gives the correct reading.

^b It is noteworthy that this cemetery is locally called, not cimetière, but polyandre, i. e. πολύανδριον—a curious relic of the time when Greek was spoken at Autun. Probably this was the very name used in the time of Gregory of Tours, who, in his ignorance of Greek, took it for a Gallic word (De gloria Confess. c. 73, quoted by Marriott, Testimony, p. 127).

Ἰχθῆσιν ἀνδραῖς πλουτοδότου σφίγης,
Σωτήρ δ' ἁγίων μελιθῆα λαμβανέ βρώσῃ,
Ἐσθιέ πινάων Ἰχθυὺν ἔχων παλάμαις.

νόντων.
Ἄσχανδιε πάτερ, τῷ μὲ κεχαρισμένη θύμῳ
σὺν μ' οἷσιν ἐμοῖσιν
I . . . μνήσσο Πεκτορίου.

For ζῶν we should perhaps read πηγῶν. The word χρῆσε may be taken either for ἔχρησε, or for χρῆσαι, as λιτάζωμε for λιτάζομαι in the latter part of the inscription. Πινάων is for πινάων. The hiatus in the last line but one may perhaps be filled by the words σὺν μητρὶ γλυκερῇ καὶ ἀδελφεοῖσιν ἐμοῖσιν (Franz), or something equivalent; and the last may perhaps run Ἰχθυὺν ἰδὼν υἱὸν μνήσσο Πεκτορίου. Mr. Marriott translates the whole as follows:—"Offspring of the heavenly Ichthus, see that a heart of holy reverence be thine, now that from divine waters thou hast received, while yet among mortals, a fount of life that is to immortality. Quicken thy soul, beloved one, with the ever-flowing waters of wealth-giving wisdom, and receive the honey-sweet food of the Saviour of the saints. Eat with a longing hunger, holding Ichthus in thy hands.

To Ichthus . . . come nigh unto me, my Lord [and] Saviour [be Thou my guide] I entreat Thee, Thou light of them for whom the hour of death is past.

Aschandius, my Father, dear unto mine heart, and thou [sweet mother and all] that are mine . . . remember Pectorius."

The first portion seems to be an admonition to the Christian passer-by who reads it, the second a prayer of the deceased himself; the third an address to his parents and friends.

This inscription has been referred to very various dates, from the end of the 2nd century (Pitra) to the end of the 6th (Rossignol). Probably the judgment of Messrs. Franks and C. T. Newton, of the British Museum (in Marriott's Testimony, etc. p. 133), who assign it to the 4th or 5th century, is not far from the truth. With this agrees the decision of Kirchoff, the editor of the fourth volume of the Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, which contains this inscription (No. 9890).

^c For the tracing from which this engraving was made the writer is indebted to Prof. Churchill Babington.

Mr. Marriott (u. s. p. 141) conjectures that the space at the lower corner of the marble, to the spectator's right, was occupied by a sculptured fish, whether alone or in combination with some other symbol.

Costadoni (ix. 35) gives a genē (no. xi. in his plate) engraved with two fishes, with this inscription in three lines: IX || CωTHP || ΘV: evidently the IXΘYC, differing from the form common elsewhere in having CωTHP written at full length, instead of being separated by its initial letter like the other words of the acrostic. The CωTHP is probably placed between the IX and the ΘV because that shape of the inscription best suits the space.

Of seventy-five sculptured slabs containing the symbol which De Rossi has examined, not more than eight contain the ixθύς alone, and only twenty—of which four are fragments of slabs which may have contained other symbols—the sculptured fish alone; the rest give also other symbols. Seventeen join with the fish the dove and olive-branch; a conjunction which seems clearly equivalent to Spiritus in pace in Christo; or—if the olive-branch be omitted—Spiritus in Christo. Spiritus tuus in pace is a common form of acclamation in Christian epitaphs. Twenty-three add the anchor to the fish, whether separate or intertwined; a conjunction also extremely common on GEMS [p. 714]. As the ANCHOR [p. 81] unquestionably symbolizes Hope, we may read these symbols Spēs in Christo, one of the most common of Christian sepulchral formulæ. A sepulchral slab from the catacombs, now in the Kircher Museum, exhibits an anchor between two fishes, with the inscription IXΘYC ZωNTωN. (See further under GEMS, p. 713). Of the fish swimming in the water and supporting a ship on its back, clearly signifying that Christ bears up the church, De Rossi has seen three instances.

There remains the conjunction of loaves and fishes. That these in some instances simply form part of a representation of the Lord's miracle of the loaves is clear from the fact that in at least one of De Rossi's Monumenti (No. 71, from the cemetery of St. Hermes, now in the Kircher Museum) there are five loaves and two fishes; but there can be no doubt that the fishes and loaves conjoined were intended to convey the further meaning that Christ is the Bread of Life, and that with special reference to the Eucharist [CANISTER, p. 261; EUCHARIST IN ART, p. 625]. This is well illustrated by the Autun inscription, given above, where, according to the most probable restoration, the fish is spoken of as in the hands. We can scarcely doubt that these words refer to the receiving of Christ in the Eucharist. So when Augustine (Confess. xiii. 23, § 34), after mentioning the sacrament of baptism, goes on to speak of that other "solemnitas . . . in qua ille pascis exhibetur quem levatum de profundo terra pasci comedit," he undoubtedly refers to the sacrament of the Eucharist. It ought however to be noticed, that some at least of the painting commonly supposed to be Eucharistic are intended rather to represent the heavenly marriage-supper which Christ makes for his faithful ones (Polidori, Dei concēri affigati a simbolo ne' monumenti Cristiani. Milano, 1844).

Ample information on this curious subject may be found in Costadoni, Sopra il Pesce come simbolo di Gesù Christo presso gli antichi Cristiani, in Calogiera's collection, vol. xli. p. 247 ff.; in J. B. De Rossi's treatise, De Christianis Monumentis IXΘYN exhibentibus, and in Pitra's De Piscis Allegorico et Symbolico, both in Pitra's Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. iii.; and in the late Mr. Wharton Marriott's Essay on the Autun Inscription, in his Testimony of the Catacombs, p. 115 ff. (London, 1870). [C.]

ICONIUM, COUNCIL OF. The date generally assigned to it is A.D. 378 (Mansi, iii. 505–10), this being the year in which St. Basil died; and Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, who presided, speaking of him as having been expected there, but kept away by severe illness. St. Basil himself (Ep. ccii. al. cxcvi.) had asked to have it put off in the hope that his health might improve. But it may be doubted whether this is not the meeting of which he speaks in a subsequent letter (cxcvi. al. cclxii.), when illness equally compelled him to return home. Mansi thinks his words here prove that he actually was at this meeting: they may mean no more than that he had commenced his journey with that intention, but after he had got as far as Neo-Cæsarea, which he may have gone to first, he was taken ill and had to return. This, according to Mansi, took place A.D. 375; and the question is, whether Amphilochius must necessarily be supposed to have been speaking of a later illness. To make up for his absence, his treatise on the Holy Spirit was read there, to attest his sentiments on the subject of which it treats, says Amphilochius; in all probability, therefore, this council had to do with the followers of Macedonius. ICONOSTASIS. In the ecclesiology of the Eastern church this designation is given to the screen or partition wall, tabulatum, which cuts off the benet or sacrarium from the Soleis and the choir. From its general similarity in form to the chancel screens of Western churches, the iconostasis is often identified with them. This, however, is based on an erroneous idea. The screen of western ecclesiology separates the nave, the place of the laity, from the choir, the place of the clergy. The iconostasis, on the other hand, invested with far greater dignity and importance, has its position further eastward, and corresponds in locality to the altar rails. Thus it divides the choir, or place of the clergy, into two parts, separating "the holiest of all," containing the holy table and the place for the celebrant and his assistants, from the "holy place," on either side of which are arranged the stalls for the clergy. The iconostasis in its original construction was a comparatively light and open screen, the νεφέλιος θρόνος or concilli of primitive times, very much resembling the ordinary type of western chancel screens. The present arrangement, by which it has been converted into a close partition with curtained doors, entirely concealing the holy mysteries from those who stand outside it, cannot be traced higher than the 8th century, and in its existing development is probably later still. The name εικονόστασις is derived from the ἰκόν (εἰκόνες) or sacred pictures painted on it.

These screens in the larger and more dignified churches were of the richest materials attainable, and were adorned with all the resources of art. The elaborate description given by Paul the Silentiary, enables us to realize the form and character of that in St. Sophia, as rebuilt by Justinian, in the middle of the 6th century. The material was silver. It consisted of a ἔρκος, or partition, described as being of ivory, tortoise-shell, and silver.

According to Goar, the iconostasis owes its present close form to a reaction against the iconoclastic fury of the 8th century, as affording a more ample space for the exhibition of sacred pictures. His words are, "Reticula illa lignea" (the wooden trellis work, such as that in Paulinus' church at Tyre) "mutavit Ecclesia Orientalis in tabulata solida a tempore quo iconoclastarum furore turbata plures et frequen- formed by a stylobate, ornamented with arabesque flower work. On this stood pairs of twisted columns, twelve in number, surmounted by an architrave of chased metal. The spaces between the columns were filled in with panels, bearing in oval medallions the icons of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, the apostles and prophets. In the centre, above the "holy doors," the intertwined monogram of Justinian and Theodora was to be seen, surmounted by the crucifix in an oval panel (Paul Silentiary, part ii. v. 265, sq.)

tiore sanctorum imagines ibi depictas esse voluit" (Eucholog. p. 18). Early examples of the solid iconostasis are hard to find. The partition has been invariably removed by the Turks in the churches converted by them into mosques, so that not a single instance appears in the churches of the Holy Land, and of Central Syria, drawn by De Vogué, nor in those given in Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, or in Hübsch's Altchristliche Kirche. The earliest example known to Dr. Neale is that in the Arian crypt church, at Tepekermann, in the Crimea, which he thinks "may be referred to about A.D.

copper (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 59). They were often of brass, or bronze. In that rebuilt by Paulinus, at Tyre, the screen was a trellis work of wood of the most slender and graceful workmanship (Euseb. H. E. x. 4, § 14). That of St. Peter in the Palace, built by Basil the Macedonian (A.D. 867-886), was of marble (Theophan. Ceram. Homil. lv.). The screen in the convent church of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, is 350," of which a woodcut is annexed. This is not a close screen, but consists of four pillars standing on a solid stylobate, the panels of which are ornamented with boldly incised crosses. The columns reach to the roof of the cave. The openings between them may have been probably closed with curtains (Neale, Hist. of East. Church, vol. i. p. 193). According to Guénebaud (Dict. des Monumens, Art. Iconostase), one of the most ancient examples of a closed screen known is also in a cave church, the Grotto of the Apocalypse, at Patmos. From the woodcut given, taken from Calmet (Dict. de la Bible), it will be seen to be a plain boarded partition, reaching, in two divisions, from the floor to the spring of the vault, and very much resembling a Jacobean chancel screen in England. It has a central arched door, and two arched windows on either side, surrounded with arabesque work, and closed with curtains. The upper division exhibits an icon of Our Lord to the right, and of the Blessed Virgin to the left, with the crucifix above.

According to the normal arrangement, an iconostasis had three doorways, that to the right hand leading to the diaconicon; that to the left to the

the present day. The iconostasis, according to Dr. Neale, is "now generally made of wood; what would be the pierced part in a western rood screen being panelled and painted. In Attica they are found of plain deal." (Neale, u. s., Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, p. 62.) The iconostasis in the churches of Russia is always a feature of considerable magnificence, which, from its size and elaborate decoration, is the object that first attracts attention on entering, being rather an architectural feature of the edifice than a mere piece of church furniture. It is very possible that more complete acquaintance with the ecclesiology of Russia will bring to light earlier examples of the iconostasis than those hitherto known. The annexed example from a church near Kostroma, in Eastern Russia, prothesis, through which the "Great Entrance" was made. The central doorway, ἀγία θύρα, always the largest, and most highly decorated with carvings, opened on to the bema. It was protected in the lower part by two gates, about the height of a man, meeting in the middle, the upper portion, as well as the two side doorways, being closed with curtains [CURTAINS, HANGINGS]. On the right of the holy doors was invariably the icon of Our Blessed Lord; on the left that of His Virgin mother. On the panels on either side, and on those above, other icons were depicted, according to the taste or devotion of the founders of the church, and to the saints under whose invocation it was placed. This arrangement remains on the whole unchanged to given by Mr. Fergusson in his History of Architecture, is not of very early date, but is pronounced by him to be "a favourable specimen of its class." [E. V.]

ICONOSTASIUM, εἰκονοστάσιον, in the Greek church, a moveable stand for the suspension of icones or sacred pictures. Such a piece of church furniture is mentioned by Codinus (de Off. Aul. Constantinop. c. vi. § 2), when describing the imperial ceremonial of Christmas Day. After mattins the canonarchs brought out the iconostasion, and set it in its place, with an analogium, or reading desk, bearing a copy of the gospels in front of it. On it they suspended an icon of the nativity, and three or four others

The emperor on entering the church kissed the icons, and again on leaving. Ducange, s. v. identifies the iconostasion generally with a small domestic chapel, or oratory, and considers that that described by Codinus was a portable shrine. Gretser is more correct in defining it as "omne illud in quo stant, vel ex quo pendent sacrae imagines." Goar strangely interprets it of a carved picture frame. [E. V.]

IDIOBELA (i. e. στιχηρὰ ἰδιόμειλα). These are Stichera or Strophes, which have no hirmos (ἔρμος), the rhythm of which they follow, but which are independent as to rhythm. They are usually said at lauds and at vespers on days of special observance. At lauds one only is said as a rule, though not invariably, as in the Holy week when there are several, after the στίχοι following the αἶνοι (i. e. Pss. 148, 149, 150). At vespers we find sometimes one only, as on certain week-days in Lent. Sometimes several, four or five being the usual number; and occasionally more, e. g. nine on St. John-Baptist's day, and of these one or more is often repeated. The tone to which they are said is specified, and the name of the author is often given. Their character is that of other troparia used in the Greek offices; but they are often, though not invariably, longer than others. Idiobelae are also used in other offices, e. g. in the office for the burial of a priest. [H. J. H.]

IDIOTA (ἰδιωτής). 1. An illiterate person, as contrasted with a "clerk." Thus, Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 9) speaking of the use of pictures from sacred history, says that pictures are the bible of the uneducated—"quod legentibus scriptura, hoc idiotis praestat pictura cernentibus." Bede (Epist. ad Egbert.; Migne's Petrol. xciv. 659 c) wishes the idiotae—that is, he explains, those who have no knowledge of any tongue but their own—to learn by heart the Apostle's Creed and the Lord's Prayer in their own tongue. In the Middle Ages, when an educated man was almost of course in holy orders, the word "idiot" came to mean simply a layman.

2. The word Idiotae was also used to designate those who attached themselves to some convent as helpers, without being regular members of the brotherhood, i. e. lay-brothers [CONVERS] (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.). [C.]

IDLENESS. [MENDICANCY.]

IDOLATRY (Idololatria, εἰδωλαλατρεία). The object of this article is to describe the laws of the ancient church relating to idolatry, or any rites or customs connected with it. The treatment of Christians who went back altogether to heathenism, belongs to APOSTASY; of those who succumbed for a time under pressure of persecution, to LAPSED.

Few canons directed against idolatry appear in the councils, until Christianity had become the dominant religion in the different countries of Europe. The first law which interfered with the free exercise of Paganism, was an edict of Constantine, A. D. 319, against private sacrifices (Cod. Theod. IX. xvi. 1, 2), but it is questionable whether this was issued solely in the interest of Christianity. Later laws were undoubtedly levelled against idolatry. In A. D. 324, Constantine forbade (Euseb. Vit.

Const. ii. 45) the erection of images of the gods, or (ibid. iv. 16) of his own statue in the temples; he (ibid. ii. 44-5) prohibited all state sacrifices, and (ibid. iii. 54-8) shut up many of the temples, converted others into churches, and destroyed some which had been the scene of immoral rites. Laws of Constantius forbade (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 4, 6) all sacrifices whatever on pain of death; but it does not appear that the penalty was ever exacted. But that which is considered to have given the death-blow to Paganism, is a comprehensive law of Theodosius, A. D. 392 (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 12); sacrifice and divination were declared treasonable and punishable with death; the use of lights, incense, garlands, and libations, was to involve the forfeiture of house or land where they were used; and all who entered heathen temples were to be fined. But that Pagan rites lingered after this appears, among other proofs, from a petition addressed to the emperor by a Carthaginian council (A. D. 399), requesting him to destroy some rural temples, and forbid certain idolatrous banquets, which were held on Saints-Days, and which the Christians were compelled to attend (Cod. Eccl. Afric. cc. 58-60). And two centuries later Gregory has occasion (Epp. iv. 23-6) to rebuke some landowners in the remote parts of Italy, who suffered their peasants to continue in heathenism; and in a letter (Epist. ix. 65) to the bishop of Cagliari, he recommends that if the rustics will not listen to preaching, they shall be fined, imprisoned, or chastised. On the disappearance of Paganism, see Robertson, Church Hist. iii. 5.

2. Local Edicts.—In the Gallic church, a fragmentary letter of Childebert, A. D. 554 (Harduin, Conc. iii. 334), commands all landlords who have images or idols on their estates, to remove them, and assist the priests in destroying them. The worship of sacred trees or groves^a or stones or fountains, is frequently forbidden, and the bishops are admonished to be more zealous in checking it (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 23; 2 Conc. Turon. c. 22; Conc. Francoford. c. 43). A Frankish council presided over by Boniface, A. D. 742 (Conc. German. c. 5, in Hartzheim's Conc. i. 49) prohibits incantations and auguries, and sacrifices which were offered to martyrs in place of the old Pagan deities; other councils forbid the "sacreligious fire-burnings which are called Nedfrates"^b (Conc. Liptin. c. 4; Conc. Saures. c. 6). Appended to the council of Liptina (probably Lestines, Hartzheim, i. 51), A. D. 743, is a curious list of forbidden Pagan superstitions. It contains mention of the widespread worship of sacred trees and stones; of sacrificing to saints; of various omens and charms, such as observing tempests, horns, and snails, and the brain and dung of animals, and fire on the hearth; or superstitions connected with the state of the moon, particularly women hoping to attract men

^a On the Teutonic religion of worshipping in groves, see Milman, Lat. Christ. iii. 2. The most recent and satisfactory investigation into the history and meaning of sacred stones will be found in Fergusson's Rue Stone Monuments.

^b On the derivation and meaning of ned-fr, see Ducange, s. v. Nedfri. It appears to have been a superstitious practice in certain parts of Germany of striking fire from dry wood on the eve of St. John [JOHN, St., FIRE OF].

by lunar influences. Compare a similar superstition in England, where people are warned against trusting to cries and sorceries during an eclipse of the moon (Egbert. Penit. viii. 3). An edict of Charlemagne issued after the conquest of the Saxons, A.D. 785, contains some severe enactments against the heathen practices of the vanquished ('de Partibus Saxon.' in Baluze's Capitularia, i. 250). Death is to be the penalty of (c. 4) ostentatiously and defiantly eating meat in Lent; of (c. 6) burning a witch because of supposed cannibalism, and then superstitiously eating her flesh; of (c. 7) burning a dead body and collecting the ashes; the bodies of the dead (c. 22) are to be buried in cemeteries and not in the Saxon tumuli. A more merciful clause (c. 14) contains a singular provision that if any one who has exposed himself to death by such crimes, shall confess his offence to the priest, and be willing to do penance, the extreme penalty may be remitted on the testimony of the priest. This capitulary was to some extent repealed by a more lenient one, A.D. 797, which, according to the general practice of the Teutonic races, allowed a money payment to compound for the capital offence.

The Spanish councils contain evidence of the lingering of the old heathenism at the end of the 7th century, and that even the clergy were not free from complicity with it. The 3rd council of Toledo, A.D. 589 (c. 16), complains that the "sacrilege of idolatry" was prevalent through both Spain and Gaul, and declares that the bishops and priests neglecting to assist in its extirpation shall be excommunicated. The 12th council, A.D. 681 (c. 11), threatens death to slaves worshipping idols or stones or fountains or trees, or lighting torches; but if their masters will be answerable for their abstaining from such rites for the future, the extreme sentence may be commuted to a flogging or to being shackled with iron: if the masters decline such responsibility, they lose all rights over the slaves, and are themselves subject to excommunication. The same practices are enumerated by the 16th council, A.D. 693, and the bishop or priest who is negligent in searching them out, is sentenced (c. 2) to a year's penance; and further, any one who puts obstacles in the way of priest or officer is to be put under anathema, and if a noble, pay 3 pounds of gold to the treasury, if low born, receive 100 stripes, have his head shorn, and forfeit half his property.

In England, Gregory had given directions to Augustine (Epist. xi. 76) that heathen idols were to be destroyed, but the temples preserved, that the fabric should be sprinkled with holy water, that altars should be constructed in them and relics deposited, and so the building be converted to the worship of God on spots already consecrated in the popular imagination; even the sacrifices of oxen were to continue, but transferred to Saints Days. Gregory defends this policy on the ground that he who aspires to the highest place, must be content to ascend step by step, and not at one bound. The English Penitentials disclose the idolatrous customs which seem to have had the most tenacious hold on the people. Those who sacrifice to devils on slight occasions are to do penance for a year, on great occasions for ten (Theod. Penitent. I. xv. 1; Egbert. Penitent. iv. 12). Any woman who places her daughter on the roof of a house, or in an oven, to cure her of a fever, is sentenced to seven years (Theod. Pen. I. xv. 2; Egbert. Pen. viii. 2). Burning grain in any house where a dead body has been deposited, as a charm to protect the survivors, is punished by five years (Theod. Pen. I. xv. 3). The witches who invoke storms are to be penitents seven years (Egbert. Pen. iv. 14). In the laws of Wihtred of Kent, A.D. 696 (c. 12), it is decreed that if a husband without his wife's knowledge makes an offering to a devil, he shall be liable in all his substance; and if they both agree, they shall both be liable; but that if a "theow" makes the offering, he (c. 13) shall make a "bot" of six shillings or his hide. There are intimations that ecclesiastical law extended to other practices which, though not connected with religion, were regarded as badges of idolatry. The Legatine Synod held in A.D. 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, iii. 458), in its report to Adrian I., complains (c. 19) that the people dress after the manner of the heathen; that they follow the heathen custom of mutilating their horses by clipping their tails and splitting their nostrils and joining their ears; and also that they eat horse-flesh, which no Christian does in the East (Orientalibus, Italy and Germany). In the previous century the eating of horse-flesh, though not prohibited was regarded with disfavour (Theod. Penitent. II. xi. 4). A prohibition against heathen dress is also found in the ancient Welsh code of the 7th century (Canones Willeli. c. 61). "If any Catholic let his hair grow long after the manner of the heathen, he shall be expelled Christian Society."

3. Idolatrous offices or customs.—The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 4), orders Flamens who wish to become Christians to undergo two years' additional probation as catechumens; if after baptism they wear the sacrificial garland (c. 55), to do penance two years; if they provide a public spectacle (munus) (c. 3), to be denied communion till death; and if they sacrifice (c. 2), to be excommunicated for ever. The same council requires a Duumvir to separate himself from the church during his year of office. See also ACTORS, GLADIATORS. The grounds of such prohibitions are stated by Tertullian (de Spectac. c. 12). The same father condemns (de Spectac. cc. 20-22) the actors in each of the four sorts of shows.

The social festivities of the heathen were not regarded with the same suspicion. Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 16) sees no harm in a Christian being present at the solemnity of assuming the togæ virilis, or of espousals or nuptials, or of giving a name to a child. But this toleration was not extended to festivities of a less innocent character. [HEATHEN, § 5, p. 763.] The superstitious lighting of torches and burning of lamps is forbidden both in the 4th and 7th centuries (Urb. Rom. c. 37; Conc. in Ponth. c. 60). Another canon of Elvira (c. 34) prohibits the burning of wax candles in the cemeteries lest the spirits of the saints should be disturbed; a reference probably to the idolatrous practices associated with lighting lamps on heathen festivals (Tert. Apolog. c. 33; de Idolol. c. 16). The irregularities attending the observance of the feast of the Kalends of January (the new year) form the subject of one of Chrysostom's Homilies (in Kalend. t. i. p. 697, ed.

Bened.), from which it appears that Christians set up lamps in the market place, and adorned their doors with garlands, and gave themselves up to excess and made divinations of their future. "You will prosper," says Chrysostom, "in the coming year, not if you make yourself drunk on the new moon, but if you do what God approves" (Tert. de Idolol. c. 14; Ambrose, Serm. 17; Conc. Autiss. c. 1; Conc. in Trull. c. 62). The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, states (c. 17) that it was a custom in the church to have special Litanies on the three days of the Kalends of January, as a protest against the heathen licentiousness [CIRCUMCISION]. The observance of the heathen festivals lingered long after heathenism itself was extinct; at the end of the 7th century the Trullan council (c. 62) after denouncing the Kalends, declares that the church will excommunicate any who keep the solemnities of the Bota (Vota), or the Brumalia (the winter feast), or the 1st of March; and forbids the heathenish customs of those festivals, the public dancing of women, the interchange of dress between men and women, wearing comic or satyric or tragic masks, calling on the name of Bacchus and simulating a Bacchic frenzy while treading the grapes.

Making gain from idolatry was considered idolatrous. No artisan might assist in making an idol. "Canst thou," says Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 6), "preach the true God, who makest false ones? 'I make them,' says one, 'but I worship them not.' Verily thou dost worship them, and that not with the spirit of any worthless savour of sacrifice, but with thine own; not at the cost of the life of a beast, but of thine own." Similarly he exposes (ibid. c. 8) the sophistries of those who made their livelihood by building or adorning heathen shrines; and (ibid. cc. 5, 6, 8, 11, 17) the dealers in victims and incense, and the guardians of the temples and the collectors of their revenues. A landlord who reckoned in his accounts any property of an idol, was subject to five years' separation (Conc. Eliber. c. 40); a man or woman lending vestments to decorate idolatrous pomp, to three (ibid. c. 57).

The rule which was to govern Christians in eating food, which might have been previously offered to an idol, is laid down by St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 25, 30). A great part of the animals used in the sacrifices was frequently sold by the priests, and afterwards retailed in the public shambles. This the Christians were at liberty to eat. But any attendance at a temple for the sake of the sacrifice was strictly prohibited (Conc. Eliber. c. 59). The council of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 7), forbids any one to eat in a place consecrated to idolatry, even if he took his own food. But by the direction of Leo (Ep. ad Nicet.), a captive among the barbarians who from hunger or terror eat idol food, was to be leniently dealt with. Directions with regard to eating food offered to idols appear frequently in subsequent councils; it is the same as eating carrion, and exposes the offender to excommunication (4 Conc. Aurel. c. 20); offering food to the dead on the festival of St. Peter, and after receiving the body of Christ going home and eating meat consecrated to devils, incurs a like penalty (2 Conc. Turon. c. 22); other superstitions with food are to be reprimanded (Conc. Remen.

c. 14); not even the sign of the cross will purify an idol offering (Gregory II. Can. Epist. c. 6). [G. M.]

IGNATIUS. (1) Bishop of Antioch, ἱερομάρτυς, martyr under Trajan (A.D. 109); commemorated Feb. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); translation to Antioch, Dec. 17 (ib.), and Jan. 29 (*Cal. ILERDENSE CONCILIUM. [LERIDA, COUNCIL OF.]

ILLATION. This in the Mozarabic liturgy is the equivalent to the Preface (Praefatio) of the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies. In the Gallican liturgy the corresponding prayer is called Immolatio or Contestatio. The Mozarabic Illation is usually much longer than the Roman Preface, and varies with each mass. It begins with the words "Dignum et iustum est," and leads up to the Sanctus. [v. PREFACE.]

ILLIBERITANUM CONCILIUM. [EL-VIRA, COUNCIL OF.]

ILLITERATE CLERGY. Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-468) decreed that an illiterate person (litterarum ignarus) incurred irregularity, i. e., disqualification for holy orders. And this rule was repeated, under varying phrases, by a council at Rome during his pontificate and by Pope Gelasius afterwards. But the standard of knowledge required does not appear to have been exactly defined. We learn from St. Augustine (Epist. 76), that the same rule applied to monks who were candidates for orders. In the time of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-604) it was sufficient to be able to read. But the offices were repeated, it seems, to a considerable extent memoriter, especially by the clergy of the lower grades. He ordered the deacons from country cures to be examined as to how many psalms they could say by heart. Thus, too, the Second Council of Orleans (A.D. 545), in its 15th canon, forbids the ordination as priest or deacon of any man who could neither read nor repeat the Baptismal office. And the First of Mâcon (A.D. 581) ordered the clergy to fast every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday from Martinmas to Christmas, and to employ these days in learning the canons. The Council of Narbonne (A.D. 589) even tried to enforce learning by suggesting that a cleric, obstinately illiterate, had no right to his share of the ecclesiastical revenues, and should be sent to a monastery, since he could not edify the people (Can. 10).

We find much the same state of things in Spain. The Fourth Council of Toledo (circa A.D. 630) describes ignorance as the "mother of all other errors," and orders that a bishop when he ordained a parish priest, should give him an office book to use (Canons 25, 26). It is implied that he would be able to read this.

vi. c. 5) forbad the advancing to any grade of the ministry those who were unable to read. During great part of the 8th century the Iconoclastic controversy was raging, and destroyed almost entirely, says Balsamon, the habit of study among the Catholics. Therefore the Seventh General Council at Nicaea, in A.D. 787 ordered in its 2nd canon that no bishop should be consecrated who could not repeat the psalter; and who was not well acquainted with the gospels, the epistles of St. Paul, the whole scriptures, and the canons: a very considerable requirement for the time.

With the accession of Charlemagne a movement upwards began. In many capitularies of that sovereign, stringent regulations against ignorance in the clergy were laid down (for details see Thomassin, p. ii. lib. i. cc. 90, 96 passim). These details, by the moderation of the standard set up, serve to show the existing lack of knowledge. Even these it was impossible to enforce with any strictness. Lupus, Abbot of Ferrara, writing during this reign to Hincmar, apologises for a bishop, who was unable to teach his flock otherwise than by his good example, because of his ignorance. And Agobard, in a letter to Bernard of Vienne, concludes that ignorance in parish priests would do even more harm than an evil life. Charlemagne himself, lamenting this prevailing ignorance, writes to Alcuin: "Oh, that I had twelve clerks as learned and as perfectly taught in all wisdom, as Jerome and Augustine were!" Alcuin's reply is worth recording: "The Creator of heaven and earth had only two such, and you wish to have twelve!" The complaint of the English Alfred, reported by Asser, is well known, that "from the Humber to the Thames there were very few priests who understood the liturgy in their mother tongue, or who could translate the easiest piece of Latin; and that from the Thames to the sea, the ecclesiastics were still more ignorant" (De Reb. Gest. Alfred. apud Camden, Anglica, p. 25). We must not suppose, however, that there were no exceptions. Bede, Alcuin, John Scotus Erigena, and Hincmar, are proofs to the contrary. But this sudden blaze of learning was a good deal adventitious, rested on the personal influence of Charlemagne, and died out again after his decease (Muratori, Antiquitates; Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disciplina, Pars II. lib. i.; Maitland, Dark Ages). [S. J. E.]

ILLUMINATION. [MINIATURE.]

ILLYRIAN COUNCIL (Illyricum or Illyricianum Concilium according to Cave). Held in Illyria, but it is not agreed in what year: Pagi contending for A.D. 373, others for 375, Cave for 367, and older authorities for 365. Pagi says it had been preceded by the second (he should have said rather the third) of the Roman councils under pope Damasus, in conformity with whose letter to the bishops of Illyria, a letter, asserting the consubstantiality of the three Persons in the Trinity, was now addressed by them to the bishops of Asia Minor. This view is at least countenanced by the letters themselves; and it must be allowed that the letter of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian to the bishops of Asia Minor expresses the declaration of the Illyrian bishops on this occasion (Mansi, iii. 386-94; and 455-68. Comp. Roman Councils, 19).

Three more councils are given under this heading. 1. A.D. 415, according to Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. of Hist. 217), at which Peregrine was appointed bishop of Patras.

2. A.D. 515, according to Mansi (Sir H. Nicolas A.D. 516, as Illyriense) when the bishop of Thessalonica having joined Timothy of Constantinople, forty bishops, whose metropolitan he was, renounced his communion, and declared for communicating with pope Hormisdas (Mansi, viii. 538).

3. A.D. 550, according to Mansi, in defence of the three chapters (ix. 147). [E. S. Ff.]

IMAGES. I. From the time of the Maccabees the second commandment was generally understood by the Jews to forbid not only the worship of the likeness of any living thing, but even the making of it. It is probable that they were led to this view by their abhorrence of the acts of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his agents. Among other outrages these had set up "chapels of idols" in the cities of Judah (1 Macc. i. 47), and even "sought to paint the likeness of their images" in the book of the law (Ibid. iii. 48). Hence Josephus (Antiq. viii. c. 7, § 5) condemns Solomon for making the twelve oxen on which the molten sea was set in the temple (1 Kings vii. 25; comp. 29), and the lions that were about his throne (Ibid. c. x. 19, 20), though no degree of reverence was paid to either of them. In the days of Herod the Great a sedition was nearly caused in Jerusalem by his exhibition of trophies, such as the Romans display after their victories, the Jews supposing that the armour was put on the effigy of a man. They declared that they would never "endure images of men in the city, for it was not their country's custom" (Jos. Antiq. xv. c. 8, §§ 1, 2). In the same spirit a band of zealots destroyed a golden eagle which Herod had put over the great gate of the temple (De Bello Jud. i. c. 33, §§ 2, 3). When Vitellius was marching through Judaea to meet Aretas, the inhabitants entreated him to take another route on account of the figures which they observed on his standards (Antiq. xviii. c. 6, § 3). Origen, A.D. 230, even asserts of the Jews in general that "there was no maker of images among their citizens; neither painter nor sculptor was in their state" (C. Cels. iv. § 31).

It appears, then, that most of the Jewish converts would enter the church thoroughly imbued with a dislike to all images; and it is probable that many of the heathen would be similarly affected towards them out of mere horror at the idolatry which they had forsaken. There were some also of the latter who, even before their conversion, were prepared by the higher traditions of philosophy to renounce the use of images in connection with religion. Pythagoras, we are told, forbade his disciples to "wear rings or to engrave images of gods on them" (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. c. 5, § 28). Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school, maintained that men "ought not to make temples or images" (Ibid. c. 11, § 77). It was a tradition among the Romans that Numa had "forbidden them the use of any image of God in the likeness of man or in the form of any animal, and that there was among them previously no image of God either painted or fictile; but that for the first 170 years when they built temples and set up chapels they made no images in any shape, on the ground that it was an unholy thing to liken the better to the worse, and impossible to reach God otherwise than with the mind" (Plutarch in Numa, c. viii.). Varro, in a passage preserved by St. Augustine (Civ. Dei, iv. c. 31), also affirms that for the period specified, the Romans "worshipped the gods without an image (simulachro)." He thought that if the law had continued, "the gods would have been more purely worshipped;" and after referring to the example of the Jews, he adds that "they who first set up images of the gods for the people relieved their states (civitatibus, but probably civibus, their fellow-citizens), from a fear, and involved them in an error" (Opp. Varr. Fragmenta, p. 46; Amstel. 1623).

II. That many of the early Christians adopted the Jewish interpretation of the second commandment is evident. Tertullian, A.D. 192, even thought it wrong to make such masks as actors wore; for, if God forbade the likeness of any thing, "how much more of His own image?" (De Spect. c. 23). He thought painting a sin in Hieronigenes (Adv. Herm. c. 1); and he teaches that "the law of God, in order to eradicate the material of idolatry, proclaims, Thou shalt not make an idol; adding also, Nor the likeness of any thing . . . Over the whole world hath it forbidden such arts to the servants of God" (De Idololatr. c. iv.). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, appears to hold the same rigid view: "It has been manifestly forbidden us to practise deceptive art; for, saith the prophet, Thou shalt not make the likeness of any thing that is in heaven or in the earth below." (Protrep. c. iv. § 62.) Origen says that painting and sculpture were disallowed among the Jews, lest the effect on senseless men should be to "draw the eyes of the soul off God on to the earth" (C. Cels. iv. § 31); a reason, which, if valid, ought to debar Christians from the exercise of them also.

III. All held that representations of God, even of the Second Person as man, were unlawful. Thus Clemens Al.: "It were ridiculous, as the philosophers themselves say, for man, who is the toy of God (Plato, de Legibus, vii. § 10) to make God, and for God to be made of sportive art," &c. (Strom. vii. c. 5, § 28). Origen: "The statues and ornaments that become God are not made by handicraft artisans, but are those wrought by the word of God and formed within us, the virtues (to wit) which are imitations of the first-born of every creature" (C. Cels. viii. § 17). Minutius Felix, A.D. 220: "What image should I make of God, when, if you think aright, man is himself the image of God" (Octav. c. 9). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "An image of God, whose spirit and power being diffused everywhere, can from nowhere be absent, must be always superfluous" (Instit. ii. c. 2; see also the Epit. c. 25). Arnobius, A.D. 303, after ridiculing the images of the heathen, says, "So far are we from attributing corporeal features to God, that we even fear to ascribe to so great a being the ornaments of minds, and the virtues themselves in which excellence has been hardly ascribed to a few. For who would say that God was brave, constant," &c. (Adv. Gent. iii.). Eusebius, the historian, in a letter to Constantia Augusta (the daughter of Constantine and wife of Caesar Gallus), who died in 354: "Since thou hast written about some image, it seems of Christ, wishing the said image to be sent to thee by us, what, and of what kind, is this image which thou callest that of Christ? . . . Has this Scripture alone escaped thee, in which God by law forbids to make the likeness of any thing in heaven, or on the earth beneath? Hast thou ever seen such a thing in a church thyself, or heard of it from another? Have not such things been banished throughout the whole world, and driven far off out of the churches; and has it been proclaimed to us alone among all men that it is not lawful to do such a thing?" (Epist. put together from fragments by Boivin, in note to Niceph. Gregoras; Hist. Byzant. tom. ii. p. 130, ed. Bonn). Eusebius proceeds to say he had taken from a woman two pictures of persons dressed like philosophers, which she called portraits of Christ and St. Paul, "lest," he adds, "we should seem to carry our God about in a representation like idolaters." St. Augustine writing in 393: "It is not to be thought that God the Father is circumscribed by human form . . . It is unlawful to set up such an image to God in a Christian temple. Much more is it wicked to set it up in the heart where the temple of God truly is" (De Fide et Symbolo, c. 7; comp. in Ps. cxiii.; Enarr. Sermon. ii. § 1, &c.). Asterius of Amasea, A.D. 401: "Do not depict Christ. For the one humiliation of the Incarnation sufficeth Him, which He took on Himself by choice for our sake. But bear and carry about the incorporeal Word mentally, in thy soul" (Hom. in Div. et Lazar. Auctar. Græc. Combef. tom. exeg. col. 5). A writer quoted as Epiphanius Cyprius (the famous bishop of Constantia) by the council of Constantinople in 754: "Remember, dear children, not to bring images into churches, nor into the cemeteries of the saints; but have God ever in your hearts through remembrance of Him; nor indeed into a common house" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.). Even in the 8th century there were no representations of God the Father, but unhappily not always from principle. "Why," says Gregory II. in 726. "do we not represent and paint the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ? Because we do not know what He is, and it is impossible to represent and paint the nature of God. But if we had seen and known Him, as we have His Son, then should we have been able to represent and paint Him also, that you might call His image too an idol" (Ep. I. ad Leon. Labb. Conc. tom. vii. col. 13). John Damascene in the East at the same period, A.D. 728, who is equally vehement on the general question, says to the same effect: "We should indeed be in error if we made an image of the invisible God" (Orat. de Sacris Imag. ii. § 5).

After the period in which all painting was condemned, it is not so common to find passages, which forbid pictures of saints, or deny that the church used them. There are such, however; although, as we shall see, such pictures were then looked on only as lessons in history. For example, St. John Chrysostom, A.D. 398: "We enjoy the presence of the saints through their writings, having images not of their bodies but of their souls. For the things said by them are images of their souls" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.; sim. Amphilochius of Iconium, ibid.). An author whom the council of Constantinople already mentioned, cites under the name of Theodotus of Ancyra: "Concerning them he teaches thus, that we have not been taught by tradition to form the likenesses of the saints in images out of material colours; but we have learnt, through those things which are written of them, to copy their virtues, which are, as it were, living images of them" (Labb, Cont. tom. vii. col. 492).

IV. There was a consensus against the worship of images, in every sense of the words προσκύνησις and adoratio. At first this extended to material representations of the cross. "We neither worship crosses," says Minutius, "nor wish to do so" (Octav. c. 9). With regard to images of our Lord and the saints, the evidence is ample. Thus Irenaeus, A.D. 167, condemns the error of some Gnostics, who crowned images painted in colours, and of other materials, which they asserted to be likenesses of our Lord (Adv. Haer. i. c. 25, § 6). Epiphanius who repeats this (Haer. xxvii. § 6) says that some of the images were of gold and silver, and that they "set them up and worshipped them." (See also Aug. De Haer. n. 7.) Origen: "We do not honour statues, that as far as in us lies we may avoid falling into the notion that the statues are other gods" (C. Cels. vii. § 66). The council of Eliberis, about the year 305, decreed "that pictures ought not to be in a church, lest that which is worshipped and adored be painted on walls" (Can. xxxvi.). St. Augustine: "Who worships an image (simulacrum) or prays looking on it, that is not so affected as to fancy that he is heard by it, as to hope that what he desires is granted him by it? . . . Against this affection, by which human and carnal weakness can be easily ensnared, the Scripture of God sings [as a nurse waking infants] things very familiar, by which to stir memory, and to rouse, as it were, the minds of men asleep in custom of their bodies. The images of the heathen, it says, are silver and gold" (Enarr. in Ps. cxliii. Serm. ii. § 5). Elsewhere, when he dwells on the feeling excited by images, he speaks also of its contagious nature: "Who doubts the idols being destitute of all sense? Yet when they are set in their places, exalted for honour, so that they may be attentively regarded by those who pray and sacrifice, then through the very resemblance of living limbs and senses, though senseless and lifeless themselves, they affect weak minds, so that they seem to live and breathe; especially when there is besides the veneration of a multitude, by whom a worship so great is paid to them" (Ad Doctr. Ep. cii. quaest. 3, § 18). It is undeniable that the objection here urged is as applicable to the image of a Christian saint as to that of a heathen god. Other testimonies will occur in the following sections.

V. The figures first used among Christians in any reference to their faith were merely symbolical. The earliest was the momentary sign of the cross made by the hand. "At every journey and movement," says Tertullian, "at every coming in and going out, at the putting on of our clothes and shoes, at baths, at meals, at lighting of candles, at going to bed, at sitting down, whatever occupation employs us, we wear our forehead with the sign" (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.; compare Ad Uxor. ii. 5; S. Cyrill. Hier. Cat. iv. c. 10: xiii. cc. 11, 18, and others). The first permanent representation of the cross is probably that set up at Rome beside the statue of Constantine after the defeat of Maxentius in 312 (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ix. 9); but Eusebius tells us also that "the symbol of the salutary passion composed of various and precious stones was set up" by Constantine in a room in his palace (De Vit. Const. iii. 49). The same prince had the arms of his soldiers marked with a cross (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i. 8). Julian the emperor, A.D. 361, says to Christians in reproach: "Ye worship the wood of the cross, making shadowy figures of it on the forehead, and painting it at the entrance of your houses." St. Cyril of Alexandria in his reply justifies the practice of painting "the sign of the precious cross" (Lib. VI. ad calc. Opp. Jul. 194). From St. Jerome we learn that the sign of the cross was made in the 4th century, as it is now, in witness to written documents (Comm. in Ezek. ix. 4). St. Chrysostom: "This shines at the sacred table, at the ordination of priests, and again with the body of Christ at the mystic supper. It may be seen everywhere displayed, in houses, in market-places, in deserts, on roads, on mountains, in groves, on hills, on ships and islands in the sea, on beds, on dresses, on arms, on couches," &c. (Contra Judae. et Gentil. § 9). Severian, A.D. 401, calls the cross "the image of the immortal king" (Hom. de Cruce, inter Opp. St. Chrys. ed. Saville, v. 899). Paulinus of Nola, writing in 403, speaks of "the ensign of the cross," surmounted with the crown of thorns, painted on the walls of his churches at Nola and Fundi (Ep. xxxii. ad Sever. §§ 12-17). Nilus, A.D. 440, recommends Olympiodorus, who was about to erect a martyrion, to "set the figure of a single cross in the sacrum on the east of the most sacred precincts; for by one saving cross is mankind completely saved" (Ep. iv. 61).

Tertullian is the first witness to the use of other symbolical figures: "We may begin from the parables in which is the lost sheep sought by its owner, and brought home on his shoulders. Let the very pictures of your chalices stand forth" (as witnesses). "The Good Shepherd whom thou paintest on the chalice" (De Pudic. 7, 10). Clemens Alex. (Paedag. iii. 11. § 59) mentions several devices which he considered permissible on seals. [GEMS, p. 712.] "Symbols of the Good Shepherd" were placed by Constantine in the fora of Constantinople (Euseb. Vita Const. iii. 49). A mosaic in the church built by Paulinus at Nola represented Christ by a lamb, the Spirit by a dove, while "the voice of the Father thunders from the sky" ("This is My beloved Son" [Matt. iii. 17], being probably in letters). The APOSTLES [p. 107] were figured by twelve doves round a cross, and the church was seen set on a rock from which issued four streams, the doctrines of the four Evangelists (Ep. Paulini xxxii. § 10). At Fundi the picture of a shepherd separating the goats from the sheep suggested the Day of Judgment (Ibid. § 17).

VI. (1) When religious art advanced from symbolism to portraiture, its works of the new type were at first, perhaps in every instance, partly historical and partly ideal. There was, for example, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla at Rome, a picture of the Virgin and Child, accompanied by the figure of a man, whose dress and action (he is pointing to a star) are so clearly suggestive of a symbolical meaning that he is supposed by De Rossi to represent the prophets who foretold the coming of Christ (Marriott's Vestiarium Christianum, p. 234, and pl. x.). Other pictures belonging to this period of transition, being apparently of the 5th century, show our Lord blessing a child, or raising Lazarus, but with "the rod of His power" (Ps. cx. 2) in His hand (Airinghi, Roma Subterr. ii. 33, 37, &c.; De Rossi, Roma Subterr. ii. tav. 14, 24). In one of the same class and probably of the same age, our Lord appears with an open book in His hand, and an Apostle and rolls of writing on either side (Airinghi, ii. 91; Marriott, pl. xii.). The rolls evidently represent the Old and New Testaments; and the Apostles are probably St. Peter, the great converter of the Jews, and St. Paul, whose chief mission was to the Gentiles. The thought conveyed is that Christ is the great teacher. He "opened the Scriptures" to the Apostles, that they might instruct the world. Works of this twofold character are frequent after the strictly historical treatment of religious subjects had quite established itself. See examples in Airinghi, ii. 83, 88, 129, &c.

(2) We come now to pictorial images, which were, so far as appears, of a purely historical character. St. Augustine writing about the year 400, says of some misbelievers who had forged epistles as from our Lord to SS. Peter and Paul, that he supposed those Apostles "occurred to them because they saw them painted together with Him in many places" (De Consensu Evang. i. x. n. 16). He speaks also of the offering of Isaac as a "noble deed sung by so many tongues, painted in so many places" (C. Faust. xxii. 73). A painting on this subject is described by St. Gregory of Nyssa: "I have often seen the image of his suffering in a picture, and passed the sight not without tears, so vividly did the art of the painter bring the story before the eyes" (De Deit. Fil. et Sp. Orat.; compare Greg. II., Ep. I. ad Leon. Labb. Conc. vii. 16). It was a favourite subject, because it symbolised the death of Christ, which as yet men did not venture to represent directly. St. Gregory tells us also that the martyrdom of Theodore in all its circumstances was depicted on the walls of a church built to his memory (Encom. Theodori). The people of Antioch in the time of St. Chrysostom had the figure of St. Meletius "in the besils of rings, on stamps, on bowls, on the walls of chambers, and everywhere" (Chrysost. in St. Melet. § 1). Paulinus, in a poem written about the year 402, describes several scenes from the Old Testament, which he had caused to be painted in his church at Nola. He owns that it was an unusual thing (raro more, line 544), and explains his reason for it at length. It was an experiment by which he hoped to interest and instruct the rude converts of that neighbourhood, and especially to keep them from the excesses which prevailed among them, when they assembled in great numbers on the festivals (Poema xxvii. De S. Fel. Nat. carm. 9). Pictures of Paulinus himself and St. Martin had been placed by Sulpicius Severus in the baptistery of his church at Primuliac, near Beziers. Paulinus, hearing of this, sent him some verses to be set over them, in which he describes St. Martin as an example of holiness to the newly baptized, and himself of penitence (Ep. xxvii. §§ 2, 3). From Asterius we learn that at the beginning of the 5th century some persons had subjects from the New Testament, as Christ and the Apostles and miracles wrought by them, embroidered on their dress, a practice which he strongly condemns (De Din. et Laz. u. s.). The same writer describes at length the martyrdom of St. Euphemia as painted in a church (u. s. col. 207). Prudentius, A.D. 405, saw in the Forum Cornelianum at Rome a picture of the martyrdom of St. Cassianus, a schoolmaster, whom his pupils at the command of the heathen magistrate had stabbed to death with their styli (De Coronis, Hymn. ix. 9). He also describes a picture on the tomb of Hippolytus, in which that martyr was represented being torn asunder by horses (Ibid. x. 126). Heraclides of Nyssa, A.D. 440, wrote two epistles against the Messalianites, in the latter of which was a "testimony to the antiquity of the venerable images" (εἰκόνας, the Greek paintings) (Photius, Biblioth. cod. i.). We have reason to think that the custom of placing in churches the portraits, either painted, or in mosaic, of the patriarchs or other eminent men, was becoming common about this time. St. Nilus advised Olympiodorus "to fill the holy temple on all sides with stories from the Old and New Testament by the hand of the finest painter, that those who did not know letters and were not able to read the Holy Scriptures might by contemplating the picture be reminded of the virtue of those who served God truly," &c. (Epist. iv. 61). An author in Suidas, supposed to be Malchus, A.D. 496, says that in a church at Constantinople there was a mosaic, put up in the lifetime of Gennadius (A.D. 458 to 471), in which that patriarch and Acacius, who became his successor, were represented with our Lord between them, and that the clergy set up pictures of Acacius in the oratories (Suidas in Acacius, i. 76). We find incidentally that the partisans of Macedonius had portraits of him in their churches (Theodorus Lector, Excerpt. ii.). Evagrius, A.D. 594, mentions a picture on the ceiling of a church at Apamia, representing a miracle of which he had himself been witness when at school there (Hist. Eccl. iv. 26). Gregory of Tours, his contemporary, mentions pictures (iconicæ) of the apostles and other saints, which were in an oratory at Arverna (Vitæ P.P. xii. § 2). When Augustine and his companions had their first interview with Ethelbert in 597, they came "bearing a silver cross for banner, and an image of the Lord the Saviour painted on a board" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. 25). But the earliest authentic account of pictures in an English church occurs in Bede's life of Benedict Bishop, his first abbot, who, in 648, "brought from Rome paintings of sacred images, to wit, of the blessed Mary and of the twelve Apostles, besides representations of the Gospel history, and of the visions of St. John the Evangelist, and placed them in his church; so that all who entered the church, even those ignorant of letters, whithersoever they turned their eyes, might contemplate the ever-lovely countenance of Christ, and of his saints, though in an image; or might more heedfully call to mind the grace of the Lord's Incarnation" (Hagiogr. sect. i.). In 685 (Ibid. 720) he brought other pictures from Rome, many of saints and Gospel subjects, as before; but some also illustrating the relation of the New Testament to the Old, as Isaac bearing the wood beside Christ bearing His cross, the brazen serpent on the pole by Christ on the cross. Pictures of this character probably abounded in Rome at this time; for a great number are mentioned as to be seen there by Gregory II. in his first reply to Leo the emperor, A.D. 726 (Lab. Conc. vii. 16).

VII. Scarcely had portraits of holy persons become common, before pictures of fabulous origin were brought forward, and superstitious notions and practices began to abound. For example, Theodoret had heard that the Romans held Symeon the Stylite in such esteem, as to "set up small portraits of him in all the entrances of their workshops, deriving thence protection and safety for themselves" (Hist. Religiosa, c. xxvi.). Theodorus Lector reports that Evdokia, the Augusta, sent to Pulcheria (about A.D. 456) a "likeness of the mother of God which the Apostle Luke painted" (Excerpta, i. prope init.). The same writer relates that a painter of Constantinople in the time of Genadius, had "dared to paint the Saviour as Zeus." For this his arm withered, but was restored at the prayer of the patriarch. The historian adds that "the other representation of the Saviour, with curling short hair, is the more correct" (Ibid. i. 554). When Edessa was besieged by Chosroes, king of Persia, about 544, the mound erected by him against the walls was, according to Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 27), destroyed by fire, the heat and power of which had been miraculously intensified by water that had been sprinkled over a picture of Christ ("the God-made image which the hand of man wrought not"), sent by himself to Abgarus a former king of that city. Evagrius finished his history in 594. It is worthy of note that Procopius (De Bello Persico, ii. 27), who wrote soon after the Persian war, and from whom Evagrius took the rest of his account, does not mention the miraculous picture. In a later war with Persia, A.D. 590, another portrait of Christ, said also to be of divine origin, accompanied the Roman army, and gave courage to the soldiers (Theophyl. Simoc. Historiarum ii. 3, 70, ed. Bekker). At this time imagination readily connected miracles with the icons of the saints. Thus both Evagrius and Gregory of Tours tell the story of a Jewish boy at Constantinople, who, having with others of his age partaken of the remains of the Eucharist according to the custom there, was cast by his enraged father into a burning furnace. The next day he was found in it uninjured. Evagrius (u. s. c. 36) merely says that he declared that "a woman clothed in purple" had appeared to him and saved him; but in the version of Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 10), "the woman seated in a chair and carrying an infant in her bosom, who was in the basilic, where he received the bread from the table, had covered him with her mantle that the fire might not devour him." Another improvement of the same kind in a miraculous story should be mentioned here. Paulus Warnefridi, in his History of the Lombards (ii. 13), relates how the bad eyes of two persons were healed by oil from "a lamp set to give light" near the altar of St. Martin, in a church at Ravenna. When this story is told in France, as it is in some of the manuscript copies of Gregory (De Mirac. S. Martini, i. 15), the lamp stands "under an image of the picture of the blessed Martin." Such variations appear to indicate the growth of a feeling which ascribed to the image a part of the supposed powers of the saint himself. Other stories told by Gregory of Tours are of a picture of Christ, which was said to have shed blood, when maliciously injured by a Jew (Mirac. i. 22); and of another at Narbonne, respecting which our Lord in a vision expressed His displeasure, because it represented Him on the cross, not fully clothed, but "girt with a linen" only (Ibid. c. 23). Such stories were quite as common in the East, e.g. Leontius, bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus, A.D. 590, speaks of the flow of blood from images as of frequent occurrence (Apol. in Act. iv. Conc. Nic. ii. Lab. vii. 240). At Constantinople there was a picture of our Lord "at which many miracles took place." This image Gregory II., writing in 726, calls without any qualification "the Saviour." When the emperor Leo ordered it to be destroyed, the officer sent to execute the decree was murdered by women, whom the pope describes as full of zeal, and honours with a title (μυροφόροι) which antiquity gave to those holy women who "prepared spices and ointments" wherewith to embalm the body of Christ (Epist. ad Leon. I., Lab. Conc. vii. 19). The murder is equally approved by the Greek author of the 'Life of Stephen the Younger' (Analecta Græca Bened. t. i. p. 415).

It is evident that men who had arrived at this stage of superstition were ripe for the practice of direct idolatry. Serenus, a bishop of Marseilles, contemporary with Gregory of Tours, found this so rife among his people that he had the images in his church destroyed. We learn this from an epistle of Gregory I., who concurred with him in principle, while he condemned the deed: "It hath reached our ears some time ago that your fraternity, seeing certain worshippers of images, has broken and cast forth the said images out of the church. And indeed we praise you for being zealous lest aught made by the hand should be worshipped; but we think that you ought not to have broken the said images. For painting is used in churches, that they who are ignorant of letters may at least read on the walls by seeing them what they cannot read in books" (Epist. vii. 111). "It is one thing to adore a picture, another to learn by the story of the picture what ought to be adored . . . If any one wishes to make images by no means forbid him; but by all means stop the worship of images" (Epist. ad eund. ix. 9). In both these epistles now quoted Gregory teaches, and in the second at great length, that pictures were placed in churches "only to instruct the minds of the ignorant" (non ad adorandum, sed ad instruendum solummodo mentes reserendum); but elsewhere he indicates another use which experience has shown to lead rapidly to direct worship: "We do not prostrate ourselves before it ('the image of our Saviour') as before the Godhead; but we worship Him whom by help of the image we call to mind as born, as suffering, or even sitting on His throne. And while the picture itself, like a writing, brings the Son of God to our memory, it either rejoices our mind by the suggestion of His resurrection, or consoles it by His passion" (Ep. ad Secund. vii. 54). In the Greek church, however, we find the worship of pictures already avowed and defended; as by Leontius, above mentioned: "I, worshipping the image of God, do not worship the material wood and colours; God forbid; but laying hold of the lifeless representation of Christ, I seem to myself to lay hold of and to worship Christ through it" (Apol. in Act. iv. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. vii. 237). He compares this worship to that which a Jew pays to the book of the law; but as he dwells much on miracles wrought by images, and, like Gregory, on the emotions which the sight of a cross or picture ought to raise in the beholder, it is clear that in practice the worship of them was very different from the reverence shewn to the law. Indeed it is very probable that the simple plea of instruction for the ignorant, however just when properly applied, was soon so extended as to cover practices which could not be distinguished from idolatry. For as Gieseler notices (Ecol. Hist. per. i. div. i. p. i. § 1) the only reply to the complaint, "This generation has made gods of the images," which a fanatical image-worshipper of the 8th century could offer, was that by which Gregory I. had defended the merely didactic use of them; viz., "You must teach the unlearned people" (Orat. de Imag. Adv. Constantinum Cabal. c. 13; inter. Opp. S. Joann. Damasc.).

VIII. By the beginning of the 8th century the worship of images had become such a scandal in the East that a Mahometan prince, Izid, or Jesid, the son of Omar, thought himself justified in interfering. In 715 he accordingly commanded all pictures to be removed from the churches of his dominion (Theophanes, Chronographia ad a. m. 6215). A little later, Leo the Isaurian, who became emperor in 716, made his hostility to the practice known. He claimed to be influenced by a horror of idolatry, and there is no evidence of any other motive. His sentiments were probably well-known from the first (Theophan. ad ann. 6217); but we gather from the testimony of two adversaries (Greg. II. Epist. ad Leon. Labb. vii. 9; Vita Steph. Jun. u. s. p. 412) that he had reigned ten years before he ventured on any overt act. In the year 726 he issued a declaration against the worship of images, but did not command them to be "destroyed, only placed higher, so that no one might kiss them, and thus bring discredit on that which was otherwise worthy of respect" (Vita Steph. u. s.). However, about the same time he seems to have ordered the image already mentioned, to which miracles were ascribed, to be removed from a public place in Constantinople. He also wrote to the bishop of Rome, who quotes his letter thus: "Thou sayest that the images occupy the place of idols, and that they who worship them are idolaters." "Thou hast written, that we ought not to worship things made by the hand, nor the likeness of any thing . . . and, inform me who hath taught by tradition the reverence and worship of things made by the hand, and I will confess that it is the law of God" (Epist. Greg. II. u. s.). In a most insolent and unchristian reply, the pope dwells much on his own feelings before a sacred picture (coll. 14, 16); but does not meet the complaint that such objects were abused to idolatry. About the same time John of Damascus wrote his three "Orations against those who reject the holy images." In his demand for adoration he does not go further than "worshipping and kissing and embracing the image both with lips and heart; as the likeness of the Incarnate God, or of His mother, or of the Saints." He says that pictures are the "books of the unlearned" (Orat. ii. § 10). Leo, however, persevered. A second letter to the pope (Labb. u. s. col. 23) being met in the same spirit as the former, and Germanus of Constantinople proving equally impracticable, in 730 he ordered all images to be removed out of churches (Theophan. ad an. 6221). Constantine V., his son and successor, published another edict against images in the first year of his reign, 741; and is even said to have exacted an oath from his subjects that they would not worship them (Theophan. ad an. 6233; Vita Steph. p. 444). Such images as had been left were now effaced by scraping or whitewashing the walls (Vita Steph. p. 445); but merely decorative paintings of trees, flowers, birds, &c., were allowed. That the party of the image-worshippers was at this time strong and numerous, is clear from the fact that the rebel Artavasdes won many adherents by declaring himself in their favour, and setting up icons in the cities. Anastasius the patriarch went over to him (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 4; ed. Bonn), and he was recognized by Zacharias of Rome, who dated letters from his assumption of the purple (Ep. iv. v. Labb. vi. 1503-5). From this time image-worshippers would naturally be suspected of disloyalty, and would suffer much in that age of cruelty on the suppression of the revolt in 743. In 754 Constantine convened a general council at Constantinople, at which 338 bishops (Labb. tom. vii. col. 417) were present, but none of the great patriarchs. At this synod it was maintained that the worship of images was in a great measure due to, and that in return it fostered, a tendency to those heresies respecting the nature of Christ which had been condemned by earlier councils (ib. coll. 429-453), their characteristics being either to lower the Divine nature, or to dwell on the human as apart from it, or to confound the two. After a careful review of the scriptural and patristic evidence (ib. coll. 473-504) the following decree was made:—"Whosoever shall from this time present dare to make or worship or set up in a church or private house or conceal an image (εἰκόνα), if he be a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, let him be degraded; if a monk or layman, let him be anathematized and punished by the imperial laws, as contrary to the commandments of God and an enemy to the doctrine of the Fathers" (ib. col. 508; see also 506). At the same time it was forbidden, under pretence of compliance with this decree, to lay hands on sacred vessels, vestments, &c., that had any figure wrought on them, but they might be recast or made up afresh with licence from the patriarch or emperor (ib. coll. 510, 511). This caution was necessary, and only partially effectual. E. g., a fanatical bishop was accused to the council of having "trampled on the holy paten of the undefiled mysteries of God, because it was engraved with the venerable image of Christ, and of His mother, and of the Precursor" (Vita Stephani, u. s. p. 480). We read too that many books containing pictures were burnt or defaced by the "iconoclasts" (Labb. u. s. coll. 372-377); and a general complaint is made by Germanus of Constantinople that they were not content with obeying the order for the removal of images, but must needs destroy "any symbolical ornament on the 'venerable vessels,' and 'defacing altar cloths' embroidered in gold and purple, would put them up in their own houses," &c. (De Synod. et Hæres. § 42, in Maii Spicil. Roman. tom. viii. p. 1; comp. Vita Steph. p. 445). The decree is said to have been carried out with great cruelty, but we cannot believe all the charges brought by his enemies against Constantine; as, for example, that the governor of Thrace, gave them the choice of marriage or the loss of their eyes (Theophanes, ad an. Const. 30). However this may be, it appears certain that from the date of the council no images that could be made the object of worship were permitted in the churches of the East until after the death of Leo IV. (Chazarus), the son of Constantine, in 780.

In 786 the widow of Leo, Irene, who had been brought up an image-worshipper, being regent of the empire in the minority of her son Constantine VI., resolved, in conjunction with her creature Tarasius the patriarch (785-806), to make every effort for the restoration of the icons. A council assembled at Constantinople was dispersed by a tumult among the soldiers who were faithful to the convictions of their former master; but it met again the next year (787) at Nicaea. There were present 375 bishops. Two legates from Rome attended, and two represented jointly the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In the second session a letter was read, addressed by Hadrian of Rome to Irene and her son, in which the pope maintained that a relative worship was due to images (Labb. tom. vii. col. 113). This had been the teaching of his predecessor Gregory II. in his letter to Leo (ὁ λατρευτικῶς, ἀλλὰ σχετικῶς, ib. col. 13), and it appears in several of the authorities read before the council (coll. 304, 353, 356, &c.). The principle was fully accepted by the synod, and stated in the conclusion at which it arrived, viz., that "the venerable and holy images should be set up in the same manner as the figure of the precious and life-giving cross; both those which are in colours or tessellated work, and those of other suitable material, in the holy churches of God, on sacred vessels and vestments, on walls and boards, on houses, and by the wayside; the images, to wit, of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the one undefiled Lady, the holy mother of God, and of the honourable angels, and all saints and holy men. For the more frequently they are seen in their pictured resemblance, the more are those who behold them stirred up to the recollection and love of their prototypes, and to render to them (the images) salutation and honorific worship; not indeed true supreme worship (λατρεῖαν), according to our faith, which is due to the Divine nature alone, but that, as the pious custom of the ancients held, an offering of incense and lights should be made in their honour in the same manner as to the figure of the precious and life-giving cross, and to the holy gospels, and to other sacred ornaments. For the honour of the image passes on to the original, and he who worships the image worships in it the person of him who is therein depicted" (Labb. u. s.

col. 556). If lights and incense had not been mentioned, we should hardly have suspected these words to demand a greater reverence for images than a devout mind naturally feels for a copy of the Bible, or indeed for anything that brings God immediately before it; but to arrive at their full significance, we must also take into consideration the habits of the age, and especially the arguments and testimonies on which the decree professed to be founded. Many pictures were deemed miraculous, and any one, in the belief of the people, might become so, while prayers were already addressed directly to the icons, and many superstitious practices existed in connection with them without rebuke from those who framed this decree. In a passage read with applause at the council from the Limonarium of Sophronius or John Moschus (A.D. 630), worshipping the image of Christ is spoken of as worshipping Christ, and not to do so as a deadly sin (Labb. col. 381). Such indeed was the constant language of the iconolaters. He, says Photius, "who does not worship the image of Christ, does not worship Christ, though he may think he worships him" (Epist. lib. ii. n. 102). In another passage from the Limonarium, also approved by the council, we are told that a certain anchorite, when about to visit any holy place, used to light a candle before a picture of the Virgin with Christ in her arms, and "regarding her picture to say to the Lady, 'Holy Lady, mother of God, seeing I have a long way to go, a journey of many days, take care of thy candle and keep it unquenched according to my intent; for I depart having thy aid on the way.' And having said this to the image he departed." The light burned on till his return (ib. col. 384). (For the direct address compare Greg. II. ad Leon. Ep. i. col. 13, and Germanus of Constantinople, ad Thom. col. 312.) Other important facts are recorded in a letter of Michael Balbus to Ludovicus Pius. "They not only sang psalms and worshipped them, and asked for help from the said images," but many, hanging linen cloths on them, placed their children in them as they came out of the font, thus making them sponsors; and monks receiving the tonsure had the hair held over them so as to fall into their lap. "Some of the priests and clerks, scraping the colours of the images, mixed them with the oblation and wine, and after the celebration of masses gave of this oblation to those who wished to communicate. Others put the Lord's Body into the hands of images, from which they caused those who desired to communicate to receive it. Some despising the church used the flat surface of pictures for altars in common houses and celebrated the sacred liturgy on them; and many other like things, unlawful and contrary to our religion, were done in churches" (Imper. Decr. de Cultu Imag. p. 618, ed. Goldast. Francof. 1608).

In 797 Constantine VI. was deprived of his kingdom and sight by the contrivance and command of his unnatural mother (Cedrenus, tom. ii. p. 27), who after five years of undivided power was supplanted by Nicephorus. He is said to have favoured the iconoclasts (Cedr. u. s. p. 49), but there is no evidence of any action in support of their cause. His death in battle, July 811, was in two months followed by that of his son and successor Stauratius, who had been wounded at the same time. Michael Rhangabe, who deposed the dying Stauratius, seems to have punished with impartial hand both those who worshipped images and those who broke them. Leo the Armenian, who deprived him of his throne in 813, was a decided enemy to image-worship. He thought that the heathen were permitted on that account to obtain victories over the Christians. "I desire," he declared, "to overthrow them (the images). For observe, all the emperors who have received and worshipped them have died, some pursued to death, some falling in battle: and only those who did not worship them have ended their reigns each by a natural death, and been buried with honour," &c. (Narratio de Leone Arm. Imp. auctoris incerti, in Opp. Theopanis, p. 435, ed. Paris). The people generally seem to have been with him; for he is also reported to have remonstrated in this manner with the patriarch Nicephorus:—"The people are scandalized by the images, and say that we do ill to worship them, and that for this reason the heathen lord it over us. Condescend a little, and use management with the people, and let us pare away trifles. But if you are not willing to do this, give us the grounds on which you worship them, for the Scripture is by no means clear on the point" (ib. p. 437). In reply Nicephorus merely asserted the antiquity of the practice. In 815 Leo procured the condemnation of the second council of Nicaea by another, which he convened at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1299). The acts of this council are not extant; but an edict of Leo, issued at the time, is probably in complete accord with its decrees. In that the emperor alleges the unlawfulness and absurdity of image-worship, and the duty of removing the cause of offence (Michael Monach. in Vita Theodori Stud. c. 63; opp. Sirmondi, tom. v.). It is related of Michael II. (Balbus), A.D. 820, that "though he was of the heterodox party (an image-worshipper is speaking) he had nevertheless no wish to trouble those who did not defer to him, but allowed every one to do as he chose" (Vita Theod. Stud. c. 102). He also recalled those who had been banished by Leo. He at first contented himself with forbidding the word "saint" to be inscribed on images, wherever they might be (Cedren. tom. ii. p. 110); but it is probable that he afterwards became more severe (ib. p. 74). A letter is extant addressed by this emperor and his son Theophilus to Louis the Godly, in which he describes the course of action adopted by his predecessors of like mind:—"By common counsel they caused images to be removed from too low situations (in churches), and allowed those set in higher to remain where they were, that the painting might serve for Scripture, lest they should be worshipped by the more ignorant and weak; but they forbade the lighting of lamps or burning of incense to them" (Epist. ad Ludov. apud Goldast. u. s. p. 619). Theophilus, on his accession, required strict obedience to the law, and even forbade the painting of icons (Theophan. Continuat. lib. iii. c. 10; Cedr. tom. ii. p. 110).

On the death of Theophilus in 842, his widow, Theodora, who governed for her infant son Michael III., restored the icons and their worship, notwithstanding an oath that she would not do so, exacted by her dying husband (Cedr.

tom. ii. p. 142). The sanction of the church was obtained through a council held at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1782); and the triumph of images celebrated by the institution of an annual feast on the first Sunday in Lent, thence called by the Greeks ἡ κυριακή τῆς ὁρθοδοξίας (Philothei Serra. in Dom. I. Quadr. in Gretser's note to Cod. nus De Offic. c. xv., and Narrat. de Imaginibus Restit. in Combefis. Auctar. tom. hist. col. 738). From the Typicon of Sabas, c. 42, we learn that the occasion is marked by a procession of crosses and pictures, and the public reading of the decree of Nicaea (Gretser, u. s.). Opposition, however, was not wholly extinguished; for about the year 860 we find Photius, who had usurped the patriarchate of Constantinople, proposing to Nicholas of Rome that another general council should be held to complete the suppression of "the heresy of the iconomachi" (Vita Ignatii a Niceta conscr. in Labb. tom. viii. col. 1204). The council met the next year and pronounced the deposition of Ignatius, whom Photius had supplanted, but its action in regard to images is not recorded. In 869 another council, convened by the emperor Basil especially for the condemnation of Photius, denounced the iconoclasts, upheld pictures as useful in the instruction of the people, and declared that we ought to "worship them with the same honour as the book of the holy gospels" (can. iii. Labb. tom. viii. col. 1360). Here the history of the struggle closes in the East.

IX. The position of the Nestorians and Eutychians with respect to images is interesting and instructive. The former were cut off from the church in 431, before images of any kind were common. Their antagonism to the church would make them keen-sighted to the evil springing up within her, and naturally lead to their entire rejection. We find accordingly that "the Nestorians have no images or pictures in their churches, and are very much opposed to the use of them, even as ornaments, or as barely representing historical facts illustrative of sacred Scripture" (Badger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 132). The Eutychians, condemned in 451, were a very small body until the time of Jacob Baradaeus, who died in 588. They became very numerous, under the name of Jacobites, in the 7th century, and when they left the church they carried with them the custom of image-worship, as it was then understood and practised. At a later period the Greeks observing a difference and not knowing that they had themselves changed, accused the Jacobites of error: "They think it indifferent whether they worship or do not worship them, but if ever they chance to worship, they do not kiss the image itself, but touching it with a finger only, kiss the finger instead" (Demetr. Cyzicen. De Jacob. Haeres. Max. Biblioth. PP. tom. 814). One division of the Monophysites, whom some identify with the Armenians, were called Chatzitzarii, from the Armenian Chatzus a cross, because they revered the cross only (ib.). Of the Armenians Nicon says, "They do not adore the venerable images, and what is more, their Catholicus with the rest anathematizes those who adore them" (De Armen. Relig. Max. Biblioth. tom. xxv. p. 328).

X. We turn now to the West. In 767 Pipin held a council at Gentilly, at which legates from Rome and Constantinople were present. One object was to consider the "cultus of images." The decision was that "images of saints made up (fictas, i. e. mosaics) or painted for the ornament and beauty of churches might be endured, so that they were not had for worship, veneration, and adoration, which idolaters practise" (Constit. Imper. Goldast. tom. i. p. 16). The decree of Nicaea was transmitted by the bishop of Rome to Charlemagne and others, but the French church was not even then prepared to accept the worship, though long accustomed to the sight, of images. In 790 a strong protest appeared in the famous Libri Carolini or Capitulare Prolatum, a treatise in four books, expressly directed against those abuses which the council and the pope had sanctioned. It is not probable that Charlemagne composed it himself, but it is written in his name. The author speaks of king Pipin as his father (lib. i. c. 6), and of legates sent into Greece by his father and himself (lib. iii. c. 3); and Hadrian, in his controversial reply, addresses Charles as the writer (Labbe. Conc. tom. vii. coll. 915, 916, 960). A brief quotation will show the practice of the church in France at that time:—"We do not banish from the basilics effigies set up for the commemoration of events, or for ornament, but we restrain a most strange, or rather most superstitious adoration of them, which we do not anywhere find to have been instituted by the apostles, or by apostolical men" (lib. ii. c. 10). "In the year 792," says Roger Hoveden, our English annalist, "did Charles the king of the Franks send a synodal book to Britain, which had been forwarded to him from Constantinople, in which book were found, alas! many unmeet things and contrary to the true faith; chiefly that it had been defined by the unanimous assertion of nearly all the eastern doctors, and not less than 300 or more bishops, that we ought to adore images, which the church of God altogether execrates. Against which Albinus (Alcuin) wrote an epistle admirably confirmed by the authority of the Divine Scriptures, and presented it, with the said book, in the name of our bishops and princes, to the king" (Chronica ad ann. 792; Sim., Simeon Dunelm. Hist. Regum, and Matth. Paris, Chron. Maj. ad eund. ann.); in 794 a council was held at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, "which rejected with contempt and unanimously condemned the adoration and service" which the synod of the Greeks had declared under anathema to be due to "the images of the saints as to the Divine Trinity" (can. ii.). Thus the matter rested during the life of Charlemagne. In 824 Louis the Godly received from Michael Balbus the epistle to which we have already referred, and was induced by it to convoke a synod at Paris in the following year. Having read the letter of Hadrian to Irene, the bishops assembled declare, in an address to Louis and Lothair, that as the pope "justly reproves them who in those parts rashly presumed to break the images of the saints, so is he known to have acted indiscreetly in that he commanded to give them superstitious worship" (Constit. Imper. tom. i. p. 154). They support their judgments by an ample catena from the fathers. At this time Eugenius II. was pope, and a letter is ascribed to him (the contents of which make the authorship doubtful) in which, after quoting a letter from Louis and Lothair to himself, he expresses disapprobation of pictures of saints altogether, and even blames the Greek emperors Michael and Theophilus, to whom he writes, for "allowing any one who chose to have images painted or chased" (ib. p. 186). Claudius, who became bishop of Turin in 821, by the choice of the emperor Louis, finding the basilics of his diocese full of images superstitiously worshipped, ordered them to be removed (Decreta de Cultu Imaginum, Goldast. p. 763). He even effaced the painted figure of the cross. His argument was, "If you worship a cross because Christ died on one, why not a manger, because he lay in one, and a ship because he taught from one; . . . a lamb, because he is the lamb of God; but those perverse dogmatics will devour lambs that have life, and adore them painted on walls" (ib. p. 767). The Apology of Claudius was published after the council of Paris was held. As he went beyond that, he was opposed by many who approved of the acts of the council. Among these was Jonas the bishop of Orleans, whose work in three books (Adversus Claudii Turinensis Apologeticum) is extant, and has preserved to us whatever remains of that of Claudius. In it he distinctly disallows the worship of images, while protesting vehemently against the extreme opinions and high-handed measures of his opponent:—"Permit the images of saints and pictures of holy works to be painted in churches, not that they may be adored, but rather that they may lend to them a certain beauty, and impart to the senses of the unlearned the history of past events" (lib. i. sig. c. Colon. 1554). A few years later, 823, Dungalus, a monk of St. Denys at Paris, published a violent attack on Claudius. His work (Liber Responsionum adv. Claud. &c.) is printed in the Maxima Biblioth. PP. tom. xiv. A more able production than either of the above is the Liber de Picturis et Imaginibus, written by Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, probably about 840. This author maintains that "the images of the apostles and of the Lord Himself were painted and kept by the ancients rather for love and remembrance than religious honour or any veneration after the custom of the Gentiles" (c. 20); and that "none of the ancient catholics ever thought that they are to be worshipped and adored" (c. 32). He laments the later practice as "near to or like the heresy of idolatry or of the anthropomorphites," and thinks that it was "rightly decreed by the orthodox fathers (in the council of Elvira), in order to put down this kind of superstition, that pictures ought not to be in churches" (c. 33). This was probably the last clear note of warning. Walafrid Strabo, abbot of Reichenau, A.D. 842, gives an uncertain sound. "We know," he says, "that icons are not to be adored or worshipped" (colendas), but he demands for them "seemly and moderate honours" (De Reb. Eccl. c. 8). Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, A.D. 845, at the request of his compatriots wrote a treatise, now lost, to explain "in what manner the images of our Lord and His saints are to be revered" (venerandae; Flodoard. Hist. Eccl. Remens. lib. iii. c. 29). His teaching is not further indicated by our authority; but it may be safely inferred from his contemptuous language with respect to the Greek and Roman practice, which he stigmatizes as "doll-worship" (puparum cultus), and from his open rejection of the second council of Nicaea (Opusc. iv. adv. Hincmar. Lond. c. xv.).

XI. The "images" of which we have spoken were all either pictures, like the modern Greek icons, or mosaics. Some writers, however, to prove that statuary was not unemployd by the early church, allege the image of our Lord which was said to have been set up at Paneas (Cesarea Philippi or Dan) by the woman whom He healed of an issue of blood. (See the Hist. Eccl. of Eusebius, lib. vii. c. 18; Philostorgius, ex lib. vii. § 3; Sozomen, lib. v. c. 21; Asterius Amas. in Photii Biblioth. cod. 271.) If this were indeed a statue of our Lord, the solitary act of a semi-heathen would be no indication of the mind of the apostolic church. But opposite the principal figure was the brazen statue of a woman in a beseeching attitude, kneeling, and with hands raised, not behind and furtively touching the hem of his garment, as in the gospel story. This suggests that the erection of the group was an expression of gratitude to some earthly ruler who had granted a petition. The costliness of the work creates another difficulty (see St. Luke viii. 43). Nor can we build anything on the fact related by Lampridius that Alexander Severus had the images of Christ, Abraham, Orpheus, &c., in his laurarium (Vita Al. Sev. c. 29). It is possible that in the 9th century there was some use of statues among Christians; but we cannot with Mabillon (Praef. I. in Sæc. IV. S. O. B. c. 29) think it a certain inference from these words of Agobard (De Imag. c. 31):—"Whoever adores any picture, or molten or moulded statue, is not giving worship to God, is not honouring the angels or holy men, but showing reverence to (their) images" (simulachra).

IMAGINES CLIPEATAE. The Romans gave this name to the heads painted on the shields usually hung up in their temples (Buonarruoti, Osservaz. sopra alc. medaglioni, p. 9-11). We find in ancient Christian art a similar mode of treatment applied to portraits of our Lord. In some instances the bust of the Saviour is painted on a circular space in the form of a shield. This is notably the case in the vaulting of the chapel in the cemetery of Callistus [JESUS CHRIST], probably the most ancient example of a type that became traditional. Clipeatae of the Good Shepherd as a standing figure are frequently met with in the vaultings of crypts in the catacombs. In the mosaic of the great arch of St. Paul without the walls we find the bust of our Lord in clipeo (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxxviii.). Also in ancient ivory diptychs, such as that of Rambona (Buonarruoti, Vet. p. 262), in which the clipeus is supported by two winged angels. Another diptych exhibits the shield or crown carried in a similar manner by two angels, and bearing in the midst a Greek cross instead of the figure of the Saviour (Calogera's Raccolta, vol. xl. p. 295). That this mode of treatment lasted till the 7th century is proved by a painting in the roof of the oratory of St. Felicitas; there the bust of our Lord appears in clipeo (Raoul-Rochette, Disc. sur les types init., p. 25). Examples may also be quoted in later times (Du Cange, Gloss. s. vv. Scutum, Thoracida).

Many of the sarcophagi found in Roman cemeteries exhibit the effigies of a husband and wife carved within a shield or shell, as in the in-

IMIZILUM (also IMIZINUM, MIZILUM, MICULUM, MYZINUM). This word, variously spelt, occurs several times in the Vitæ Pontificum of Anastasius Bibliothecarius. It appears to denote some material or a silky nature, used for articles of dress of a costly description. The etymology of the word is doubtful; according to one view it is akin to the Italian ermesino, but Ducange (s. v.) rather connects it with camisile (Vitæ Pontificum, Leo III. p. 418; Paschalis I. p. 449; Sergius II. p. 490; Nicolaus I. p. 584). IMMERSION. [BAPTISM, § 49, p. 161.]

IMMUNITIES OF CHURCHES. [CHURCH (1), p. 365.]

IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY. Before the time of Constantine the clergy of the Christian church enjoyed no immunities or privileges. With the conversion of the emperor to the Christian faith, the ministers of what became the state religion began to be exempted from burdens borne by other members of the community, and to have special honours conceded to them. This policy reached its height in the Middle Ages, when its results caused a reaction to ensue which is operating at the present day.

By immunities we understand in the present article exemptions from ordinary burdens, by privileges, extraordinary honours, or prerogatives, whether sanctioned by custom only or by law. Both immunities and privileges may be best reviewed under three heads, as I. JUDICIAL, II. PECUNIARY, III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL.

1. JUDICIAL. Under this head we have to distinguish, 1. Rights maintained and confirmed, 2. Immunities allowed, 3. Privileges granted.

1. Rights maintained and confirmed. (1) Decisions in matters of faith and in ecclesiastical causes.—Christianity had grown up in antagonism to the imperial power of Rome, and managing its own affairs under its own officers, unaffected by any internal interference on the part of the civil authority. It jealously guarded its independence when the worldly power exchanged its attitude of hostility for one of friendship and alliance. In matters ecclesiastical ecclesiastical authority continued supreme. This was no immunity or privilege granted now for the first time as a favour bestowed by a friendly chief magistrate, but a prescriptive right maintained. The right was afterwards impaired by servility on one side, and by the exertion of might on the other; for the co-operation of the emperor was found so useful for enforcing the acceptance of conciliary decrees that it was appealed to by contending factions, and, when appealed to, the civil power naturally enough took upon itself to decide which faction it should support and why it should support it. This led imperceptibly to the civil power being regarded as having a right to judge in things spiritual as well as in things civil. But it was rather in its political than in its judicial character that such claim was made or admitted. Ecclesiastical causes, strictly so called, such as trials for heresy, were never brought before courts taking their authority from the state. This is evidenced by laws of successive emperors, of Constantius, A.D. 355 (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 12, tom. vi. p. 37, ed. Gothofred. Lugd. 1665), of Valentinian and Gratian, A.D. 376 (Ibid. leg. 23, p. 52), of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 399 (Ibid. tit. 11, leg. i. p. 298). These laws are of the same tenor, giving the sanction of law to the already existing custom that in ecclesiastical causes judgment was given by church officers and not by the state courts. "On questions of religion," says the law of Arcadius and Honorius, "bishops are to be judges; other cases must be carried before the law courts" (l. c.).

(2) Trials of ecclesiastical persons for moral offences.—In addition to offences against the faith, those offences against morality on the part of the clergy which were not civil crimes were by prescription under the cognisance of ecclesiastical authority alone. This could not be otherwise, as acts that were not offences against the law could not be carried into the law courts. The bishop was judged by his peers, members of the other clerical orders by their bishop; judgment being in accordance with the canons of discipline promulgated by the recognized authority of church synods. In the continuance of this jurisdiction the state simply permitted the exercise of a right which it found the church already possessed of.

2. Immunities allowed. (1) Exemption of the clergy from the jurisdiction of the secular courts in respect to minor offences.—Hitherto we have not arrived at any novel immunity or privilege granted by the state as a matter of grace. But soon episcopal jurisdiction over the clergy was extended from cases of morality to petty crimes, and at the same time the clergy were withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the state courts in respect to those crimes. There was a recognized distinction, according to the laws of the Roman empire, between great and petty crimes; the first were called atrocia delicta, the last levia delicta. By the imperial favour the clergy became exempted from the jurisdiction of the secular courts in respect to the levia delicta, while subject to them, as much as any other citizens, in cases of grave crime, such as murder, rebellion, and the like. In the reign of Justinian, A.D. 539, this exemption was allowed to apply to monks and nuns as well as to the clergy (Justin. Novell. 79, 83; Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. ii. pp. 166, 174, ed. Beck, Lipsiæ, 1829); and in the reign of Heraclius, A.D. 610, it appears to have been extended from petty offences to all criminal cases (Constitutiones Imperatoriae, ad calc. Cod. Justin.; Const. 3, p. 808, Paris, 1628). When one of the parties was a clergyman and the other a layman, the clergyman's immunity from the jurisdiction of the secular court did not hold good, except by the consent of the layman (Valentin. Novell. 12).

(2) Exemption of bishops from being summoned into court as witnesses.—By Justinian, possibly by Theodosius, it was enacted that no bishop should be required to appear at the tribunal of a secular judge for the purpose of giving his testimony in any case before the court. The judge was required to send his officer to take the bishop's testimony at his own house. The words of Justinian's law are "No judge is to compel bishops to come to a trial to exhibit their testimony, but he is to send to them some of his subordinate officers" (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 7; Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. ii. p. 250).

(3) Exemption of bishops from having to take an oath in giving their testimony.—By the law of Justinian above quoted it was enacted that the word of bishops, given on the holy gospels, should be accepted in place of an oath, an oath being regarded as derogatory to their holy character. "That the bishops having the holy gospels before them may say what they know, as becomes priests" (Ibid.).

(4) Exemption of bishops and presbyters from being examined by torture while bearing testimony.—According to the laws of the Roman empire, witnesses might be scourged and otherwise tortured in order to extract from them the truth (Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. 41; Corpus Jur. Civ. p. 323; Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 9, leg. 2, tom. v. p. 105; St. Aug. Serm. cccv. tom. v. p. 1572, ed. Migne, al. De Diversis, 49; Synesius, Ep. 58, Op. p. 201; Paris, 1631). Theodosius, with some hesitation and ambiguity, exempted bishops and presbyters from this liability. His words are: "Presbyters are to give testimony without being liable to torture, provided, however, that they do not pretend what is false. But the rest of the clergy below them in order or rank, if they have to give their testimony, are to be treated as the laws direct" (Cod. Theod. lib. xi. tit. 39, leg. 10, tom. iv. p. 331).

3. Judicial privileges. (1) Episcopal coercive jurisdiction in civil causes.—It had been the custom of Christians, in accordance with the injunctions of St. Paul (1 Cor. vi. 4), to settle their differences before one of themselves, instead of going to the heathen law courts. Very soon, and very naturally, the office of arbitrator became attached to that of bishop, the bishop being the best qualified person to exercise the judicial function. We find instances of the exercise of judicial power in Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. iii. Ep. 12; lib. vi. Ep. 4, Op. p. 160), Synesius (Ep. 105, Op. p. 247), St. Ambrose (Ep. lxxxii. Ad Marcellinum, Op. tom. ii. p. 1100; Paris, 1690), St. Augustine (Confess. vi. 3, tom. i. p. 720, ed. Migne). Down to the time of Constantine episcopal decisions thus given had not any force in law. Litigants were bound only by their free choice or by contract to abide by the verdicts given. But now coercive jurisdiction was given to the bishop's court. It was still necessary for both parties to the suit to consent to carry it before the bishop, but when it was once carried to him his sentence was final, and was executed by the secular authorities. From Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History (i. 9, p. 21, Cantab. 1720) it would appear that this privilege was granted by Constantine. It is clearly recognized by a law of Arcadius and Honorius (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, leg. 8, tom. ii. p. 33). Valentinian III. carefully distinguishes between religious causes, in which bishops and presbyters had a prescriptive right to judge, and civil causes, in which they had no inherent right to act judicially; but he recognizes their jurisdiction in the civil causes when the free choice of the litigants has selected them in preference to the state judges (Valentin. Novell. 12, ad calc. Cod. Theod.). Thus bishops were made, by virtue of their office, not only arbitrators between members of their flocks, but also magistrates before whom any that pleased might carry their suits to be by them finally and legally settled. The burden of judicial business became so heavy (see St. Augustine, Epistola xxxiii. Migne, al. 147), that it was devolved upon presbyters (St. Aug. Epist. cxxiii. Migne, al. 110), deacons (Concil. Tarracon. can. iv.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1042, Paris, 1714), and laymen (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 37, p. 321; Oxon. 1844); whence probably there arose the existing custom of the bishops appointing lay chancellors to preside in their courts. Episcopal jurisdiction did not, however, extend to criminal causes, but was confined to civil questions and pecuniary suits. Bishops were forbidden by canon law to interfere with criminal cases (see Concil. Tarracon. can. iv.).

(2) Episcopal intercession.—In pecuniary cases bishops were magistrates, in criminal cases they were intercessors. Wherever the arbitrary will of a despotic sovereign has power over life and liberty, a right of intercession is sure to become vested in the ministers of religion, the reason being that the religious character alone invests its possessor with so much awe as to enable him to dare to resist the passionate and capricious fury of otherwise uncontrolled power. Such a right begins in the courageous act of some brave ecclesiastic, and first being recognized by custom, is afterwards confirmed by law. When, at a more advanced stage of civilisation, punishments are calmly meted out by the scales of justice, the right of intercession necessarily ceases. The propriety of the privilege is argued in two letters that passed between Macedonius and St. Augustine (Ep. clii. cliii. Migne, al. 53, 54); the latter, in interceding with the tribune Marcellinus for the fanatics called Circumcelliones, advances very strong claims: "If you do not listen to a friend who asks, listen to a bishop who advises; though, as I am speaking to a Christian, I shall not be too bold if I say that in such a case as this you ought to listen to your bishop that lays his injunction on you, my noble lord and dear son" (Ep. cxxxi. Migne, al. 159). He addresses the proconsul Apringius on the same occasion in the same strain (Ep. cxxiv. Migne, al. 160). Flavian, when the people of Antioch had raised a futile rebellion against Theodosius, proceeded to Constantinople. "I am come," he said to the emperor, "as the deputy of our common Master, to address this word to your heart, 'If ye forgive men their trespasses, then will your heavenly Father also forgive you your trespasses.'" He returned with a message of pardon. Eparchius, a monk who lived in Angoulême in the 6th century, exercised so great an influence over the neighbouring magistrates that the populace rose and compelled a judge, who was about to yield to his intercession, to execute a robber that had been guilty of murder (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vi. 8, p. 379; ed. Migne, 1849). In the 7th century (A.D. 633) a canon of the fourth council of Toledo, repeated in the sixth council of Arles (A.D. 813), enjoins on bishops the duty of protecting the poor, reproofing over-severe judges, and, if necessary, reporting to the king (Conc. Tolet. iv. can. xxxii.; Conc. Arelat. vi. can. xvii.; Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 587; tom. iv. p. 1005).

Closely connected with the privilege of intercession, were the further privileges of protection of the weak, of asylum, of censorship of the public morals; all of which, like the right of intercession, are based upon the character belonging to the minister of religion, not upon the decision of an arbitrary statute.

(3) Interference in behalf of the weak.—This practice, begun at the risk of the bishop, became sanctioned by the laws of the empire. Widows and orphans were counted the especial charge of the bishop, and their property was placed under his guardianship. St. Ambrose tells his clergy that they will do well if through their means the attacks of the powerful, which the widows and orphans cannot resist, are beaten back by the protection of the church. He warns them not to let the favour of the rich have weight with them, and reminds them how often he had himself resisted assault in behalf of the widow, and indeed of any one who required his help (De Officiis Minist. ii. 29. Op. tom. ii. p. 105). Justinian legalized the bishop's right of protection in the case of prisoners, of children stolen from their parents, of lunatics, of foundlings, of minors, of oppressed women (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 24, 27, 28, 30, 33; tom. ii. pp. 35–39). The fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549), decreed that the archdeacon or other church officer should visit the prisons, and see that the prisoners were cared for, and further, that the bishop should provide them with food (Conc. Arel. v. can. xx.; Hard. Conc. tom. ii. p. 1447). Gregory of Tours describes a good bishop as getting justice for the people, helping the poor, consoling the widow, and protecting the minor, as parts of his official duties (Greg. Turon. iv. 35).

(4) Sanctuary.—Out of the rights of intercession and protection there necessarily grew on the one side the right of sanctuary, on the other the right of censure. If the weak and the accused could look to the bishop for help, they naturally fled to him when help was needed; and if the bishop might advocate the cause of the accused and of the suffering, he had to make but one step to censuring the judge and the oppressor. That churches or temples should be places of asylum is founded on natural piety, not on positive law: and until law is all powerful, it is necessary that there should be such refuges from sudden fury. They existed under the Jewish and the various pagan religions, as well as under the Christian religion; and not only Christian churches, but statues of the emperor and the imperial standard originally enjoyed the privilege. We find the custom of sanctuary acknowledged and acted on in the time of St. Basil (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xx. De Laud. Basil. Op. tom. ii. p. 353; Paris, 1630), St. Chrysostom (Op. tom. viii. p. 67, ed. Savil), Synesius (Ep. lviii. Op. p. 201; Paris, 1630). Arcadius abrogated it at Eutropius' instance, A.D. 398 (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 3, tom. iii. p. 361); but when Eutropius had himself to claim sanctuary this abrogation was itself abolished (Socrates Hist. Eccl. vi. 5). Shortly afterwards Theodosius II. enacted a law extending the privilege of sanctuary from the interior of the church to its environs (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45). The persons who were allowed to take sanctuary were by no means all classes of criminals, as afterwards was the case through abuse of the original right. It was intended for the defeated party in any civil affray, for slaves that were in danger of cruel treatment, for debtors, unless they were debtors to the state; in general, for the innocent, the injured, the oppressed, and any whose criminality was doubtful, and for whom intercession might seem likely to be of avail. Such persons, provided they came unarmed, had protection for thirty days. Slaves were protected, at first for one day (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 5), afterwards till their masters gave a promise to spare them corporal punishment (Concil. Epaonense, A.D. 517, can. xxxix.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1051); for breaking which promise the masters were liable to suspension from communion (Concil. Aurelianense v. A.D. 549, can. xxii.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1447). Ordinary criminals, as robbers and murderers, were not admitted till later times, when the privilege of asylum became incompatible with the due execution of the laws, and was abrogated with the applause of all lovers of justice and morality. Charles the Great, A.D. 779, forbid any subsistence being supplied to murderers, though by that time they had made good their right not to be directly delivered up to justice.

(5) Censorship.—The censorship vested in the clergy was partly a right founded on the fact that the church, as a religious body, took cognisance of immorality within its own body, and exacted of its members the discipline of penance; partly it was a privilege recognized by law, arising out of the privilege of intercession, and indeed forming a branch of it. The council of Arles, A.D. 314, instructed bishops to have a special oversight of such civil magistrates as were Christians, and to cut them off from the church if they acted contrary to her laws (can. vii. Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 264). St. Basil very boldly censured so purely a political act as that of separating Cappadocia into two provinces, A.D. 371, because it threw an increased burden of taxes on the poor (Ep. cccclxxxix. ad Martinianum, Op. tom. iii. p. 369; Paris, 1638). St. Gregory Nazianzen declared to rulers and governors (ὀνόματι καὶ ἀρχόντες) that the law of Christ subjected them to his tribunal (Orat. xvii. Op. tom. i. p. 271; Colon. 1690); Synesius excommunicated Andronicus, president of Lybia (Ep. lviii. Op. p. 201); Orestes' hatred of Cyril of Alexandria was not only personal, but also "because the authority of the bishop took away so much from the power of the king's officers" (Socrates. Hist. Eccl. vii. 13, p. 293).

The penance performed by Theodosius I. at the command of St. Ambrose was a conspicuous exhibition of a censorship exerted by a bishop and submitted to by an emperor (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 25, Op. p. 315; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 17, Op. p. 215; Cantab. 1720). These episcopal acts were performed on the principle that every body spiritual or political has an inherent right of exercising discipline on its own members, even to the point of excluding the refractory from its bosom. But the imperial laws were not slow in giving further rights of censorship to the clergy. We have already seen that it was the duty of the bishop to visit prisoners. The same law (A.D. 409) that imposed upon him this duty gave him also the right of admonishing the judges. Justinian required him, further, to report what he found amiss in the prison, that it might be corrected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 23; Corp. Jur. Civ. tom. ii. p. 35). The same emperor likewise empowered bishops to uphold good morals by putting down gaming (Ibid. leg. 25); to see that justice was impartially administered (Ibid. legg. 21, 31); to resist tyranny on the part of the chief lay authorities, and to look after the administration of public property (Ibid. leg. 26).

These rights passed over from the Byzantine empire to the Western nations, and no questions were asked as to whether they were founded in positive law or in prescription. The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, declared bishops to have, by royal command, the charge of seeing how the judges treated the people (Conc. Tolet. iii. can. xviii.; Hard. Conc. tom. iii. 482). The fourth council we have already seen requires bishops to admonish judges, and to report to the king such judges as disregarded their admonition (can. xxxii.). The same charge was repeated by the sixth council of Arles, A.D. 813 (can. xvii.). It was in France that the mystical signification of the "two swords" was discovered (by Geoffrey, abbot of Vendôme, A.D. 1095), and in accordance with the principle involved in that interpretation, ecclesiastical authority was freely exerted over sovereigns. Louis le Debonnaire, Lothaire, and Charles the Bald, three Carolingian princes, were deposed by councils of the Gallican church, while king Robert, Philip I., and Philip Augustus, like Henry IV., Henry V., and Frederick II. of Germany, suffered Papal excommunication. But it was in France too that the secular authority once more revindicated its right in the memorable struggle between Philippe le Bel and Boniface VIII. at the end of the 13th century. A quarter of a century later we find a conference held before Philippe de Valois (A.D. 1329), in which the whole question of lay and spiritual jurisdiction was argued by Pierre de Cugnieres on behalf of the crown, and by the archbishop of Sens and the bishop of Autun in behalf of the church, in which the king's advocate alleged sixty-six excesses of jurisdiction on the part of the ecclesiastical courts. Soon after, the Appel comme d'abus or Appellation tanquam abusu was instituted, which admitted appeal from an ecclesiastical court to the highest civil authority whenever it could be pleaded that the ecclesiastical judge had exceeded his powers or encroached upon temporal jurisdiction. At the council of Trent this right was assailed, but through the influence of the ambassadors of Charles IX. it was maintained, and it continues still in vigour.

II. PECUNIARY. 1. Immunities allowed. (1) Census Caputum or Poll Tax.—The clergy, their wives, children, and servants were exempted by Constantius from paying the poll-tax, which was levied on all citizens between the ages of 14 and 65, except such as were granted immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 10, 14). This was a favour shared by the clergy with the members of other liberal professions. Valentinian exempts the higher class of painters (Picturae professores, si modo ingenui sunt) from the incidence of the tax (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 4, leg. 4). This immunity is alluded to and pleaded by Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. clix. ad Amphilochem, Op. tom. i. p. 873) and by St. Basil (Ep. cclxxix. ad Modestum, Op. tom. iii. p. 272).

(2) Equorum canonicorum adieratic or Soldiers' horses tax; Aurum tironicum or Recruit tax.—The clergy had to pay their property tax (census agrorum) and all burdens on land like other owners and occupiers, but they appear to have been exempted from any local taxation that might be imposed for the supply of horses for the army, or as a substitute for recruits. High-priests of the old pagan religions seem to have shared this immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. vii. tit. 13, leg. 22; cum Gothofredi comment.).

(3) Trading-tax called Chrysargyrum from being paid in gold and silver, and Lustralis collatio because collected at the end of each lustrum. The inferior clergy were permitted to trade without paying this tax, provided their operations were confined within moderate bounds (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, legg. 1, 11; lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 8, 10, 16, 36). This immunity was abused, and clerics were forbidden to trade by Valentinian (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, leg. 16; Valentin. Novell. 12 ad calc. Cod. Theod.). The tax was abolished by Anastasius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 39; Op. p. 371; Cantab. 1720).

(4) Metatum or Entertainment-money.—The clergy were not compelled to receive the emperor, the judges, or soldiers on their circuits or travels. This immunity their houses shared with those of senators, Jewish synagogues, and places of worship (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8).

(5) Superindicta or Extraordinary taxes.—The clergy were exempted from these by Constantius (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8), by Honorius and Theodosius Junior (ibid. leg. 40), and by Justinian (Justin. Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

(6) Ad instructiones reparationsque itinerum et pontium or Highway rate.—By a law of Honorius and Theodosius Junior, A.D. 412, church lands were exempted from paying the road-tax; but this exemption was withdrawn A.D. 423 by Theodosius Junior and by Valentinian III., and it was not regranted.

(7) Cursus publicus, angariae, parangariae, translatio, exectio, or Conveyance-burden.—Constantius exempted the clergy from the burden of having to convey corn and other things for the soldiers and imperial officers (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 10), but in the last year of his reign, A.D. 360, he revoked the concession. The immunity was restored A.D. 382, and confirmed by Honorius A.D. 412 (Cod. Theod. lib. ii. tit. 16, leg. 15; lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 40), but again revoked by Theodosius Junior and Valentinian, A.D. 440.

(8) Descriptio lucraticorum, denarismus, unciæ, or Municipal tax.—If the property of a member of a town-council (curia) passed by will to any one that was not a member of the curia, the new owner had to pay a tax to the curia amounting to the sum previously paid by the curialis. But if the property passed to the church, it was enacted by Justinian that the tax could not be demanded (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 22; Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

2. Pecuniary Privileges. (1) Legacies.—By a law of Constantine (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 4) it was enacted that goods might be bequeathed to the church, no distinction being made between real and personal property. This law was confirmed by Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 13). Moneys or estates left to the church were administered by the bishop for the general welfare.

(2) Inheritance.—Constantine settled the property of confessors and martyrs dying intestate and without near relatives, on the church (Euseb. Vit. Constant. ii. 36; Op. p. 461; Paris, 1659). Theodosius Junior and Valentinian extended the provision, so as to embrace the case not only of martyrs and confessors, but of all clergymen, monks, and nuns (Cod. Theod. lib. v. tit. 3, leg. 1; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 20).

(3) Forfeiture.—Justinian enacted that the property of clergymen or monks leaving the clerical or monastic life should be forfeited to the church or monastery with which they had been connected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 55).

(4) Confiscation.—By laws of Honorius and Gratian some of the property which had belonged to the heathen temples (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 10, leg. 20) and that which was owned by heretics (ibid. tit. 5, leg. 52) was confiscated to the use of the church.

(5) Imperial largess.—Occasionally large sums were bestowed by the emperors for the support of the clergy. Thus Constantine desired his African Receiver, Ursus, to pay over a vast sum (τρισχιλίου φόλλεις) to Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, for him to divide among the clergy of Africa Mauritania and Numidia, and enabled him to draw for more (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. x. 6, p. 722, ed. Burton). On the occasion of an oecumenical council being summoned, the emperor bore the travelling expenses of the bishops.

(6) State allowance.—Constantine passed a law requiring the prefects of each province to make an annual grant of corn to the clergy out of the revenues of the province (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 5). This allowance was discontinued when Julian occupied the throne, but it was restored on a limited scale after Julian's death. It is recognized by a law of Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 12).

Tithes are not to be added to this list, as they did not originate in a state grant, but in the voluntary liberality of individuals, grounded partly on a belief that tithes were due by divine right (see St. Hieron. Com. in Mat. iii. Op. tom. iii. p. 1829, ed. Ben. Paris, 1704; St. Aug. Enarr. in Psal. cxlvi. 8; Op. tom. iv. p. 1911, ed. Migne), partly on the evident need of some such provision for the maintenance of the ministers of religion in modest independence. They became general in the 4th century, not as a legal impost but as a voluntary gift (see St. Chrysos. Hom. iv. in Ephes. s. f.; Op. tom. iii. p. 784). They were made compulsory by Charles the Great, A.D. 778 (see Selden, History of Tithes. Works, vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 1146).

III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL. 1. Immunities.—Public offices not bringing with them their own salary and emoluments were looked upon, though honourable in themselves, as burdens, like the office of high-sheriff of a county among ourselves. Constantine, on embracing Christianity, exempted the clergy from the burden of bearing any offices whatsoever (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 7, vol. ii. p. 724; Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 1, 2, 7). This concession applied to all offices, whether personal (personalia munera) or praedial, i.e. attached to property, whether honourable (honores or curialia munera) or mean (sordida munera). No change was made by subsequent laws in respect to personal burdens or mean offices, but the experience of Constantine taught him to restrain his first liberality as to the burdens belonging to property. For it was found that immunity from bearing office was counted so great a boon that men of wealth, who had no purpose of undertaking the ministry of the Church, solicited and obtained minor ecclesiastical posts solely with the fraudulent purpose of exempting their estates from the services to which they were liable. Constantine therefore enacted that no one qualified by his estate to bear public offices should be allowed "to fly to the clerical name and ministry, and that any who had done so with a view to declining the public burdens should nevertheless be compelled to bear them" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 3). Succeeding emperors modified these laws of Constantine in a manner sometimes more sometimes less favourable to the clergy, the general tendency of the legislation being to exempt the estates of the church from civil burdens, but to preserve the liability of the private property of the clergy—a liability which they had to fulfil either by finding substitutes to perform the necessary duties, or by parting with a portion at least of their lands (Cod. Theod. lib. xii. tit. 1, legg. 49, 59, 99, 121, 123, 163; lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 19, 21).

Official and Social Privileges. (1) Free election.—In the midst of the despotism of the empire the clergy and laity maintained their old right of electing, and the clergy their right of being elected, to the office and dignity of bishop. "Those absolute monarchs respected the freedom of ecclesiastical elections; and while they distributed and resumed the honours of the state and army they allowed eighteen hundred perpetual magistrates to receive their important offices from the free suffrages of the people" (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xx.). By degrees this right has been taken away in almost all parts of the church, partly on the plea that the civil magistrate represents the laity, partly on the allegation that endowments and civil privileges had been granted by the state, sometimes because it was considered that the security of the state required such a precaution, sometimes from apprehension of the evil consequences expected to arise out of the excitement of free elections, sometimes owing to corrupt agreements, termed concordats, made between the bishop of Rome assuming to represent ecclesiastical interests and the king or emperor of a particular country, representing the civil power.

(2) Authority of the higher over the lower clergy.—The position of the bishops of the larger sees was made one of great dignity and importance by the subjection of the clergy and ecclesiastics of all classes to their uncontrolled authority; and this was not restrained by any interference on the part of the state. The bishop of Constantinople presided as lord over 60 presbyters, 100 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 90 sub-deacons, 110 readers, 25 chanters, 100 doorkeepers (Justin. Novell. ciii.), and a guild of 1100 copistae or gravediggers. The clergy, under the immediate control of the bishop of Carthage, were upwards of 500. The parabolani alone, at Alexandria, amounted to 600. All these were allowed by the law as well as by custom to form in each central city a society which recognized the bishop as its head with a devotion which was not equalled by the retainers of any civil officer. Beyond this immediate circle of adherents a less defined authority was vested in the metropolitan, extending over all his suffragan bishops.

(3) Rights of meeting and speech.—Twice every year each metropolitan was commanded by the canons, and permitted by the laws, to call together the synod of his province: occasionally the emperor assembled the synod of the empire. At these meetings, as well as in the pulpit, free speech was allowed by the laws, the doctrine and discipline of the church were regulated, ecclesiastical sympathies were strengthened, and the power of the clergy, by being concentrated, was increased.

(4) Tokens of respect.—It was the custom for the laity, not excluding the emperor, to bow the head to the bishop and to kiss his hand (see instances given in Valesius' note on Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iv. 6, p. 153, Cantab. 1720; and Savaro's note on Sidonius Apollinaris, viii. 11, p. 532, Paris, 1609). It was usual to address the bishop by the title of God-beloved or Most-holy (θεοφιλέστατος, ἀγιώτατος), and by still stronger terms of honour, as "Holy Lord and Most Blessed Pope"—words commonly used by St. Jerome in writing to St. Augustine. "Per coronam" was a common form of beseeching a bishop (see St. Aug. Ep. xxxiii. al. 157, tom. ii. p. 131, ed. Migne; Sidon. Apollinar. cum comment. Savan. vii. 8, p. 440). Its meaning is doubtful, but it is probably equivalent to the phrase "your honour" (see Bingham, Antiquities, ii. 9, 4). Occasionally Hosannahs were sung before bishops and others eminent for sanctity, but this practice is condemned by St. Jerome as savouring of profanity and presumption (St. Hieron. in Matt. xxi. 15; Op. tom. iv. p. 98). The bishop's seat in his cathedral was called his throne.

There is no doubt that the position of the chief bishops was one of great dignity, authority, wealth, and power. Gibbon calculates that the average income of a bishop amounted to 600*l.* a-year (chap. xx.). This does not give an accurate idea of the status held by them, as the value of money is constantly changing, and averages are always deceptive. We may regard the bishops of the chief cities of the empire as maintaining a state superior to that of the imperial officers and lay nobles, while the bishops of lesser sees were comparatively poor and obscure men, though enjoying a spiritual equality with their more prominent brethren. The simple presbyter's position was a humble one, at a time when bishops were comparatively more numerous than now and parochial endowments did not exist: the deacon was regarded as little else than one of the bishop's attendants.

We may note in conclusion how little remains of all the privileges and the immunities granted to the clergy by the fervour of the first faith of a converted world. Their judicial privileges and immunities exist no longer, except so far as the coercive power of the bishop's court be regarded as a shadow of them, though once they were considered important enough to lead an archbishop Becket to enter upon a life-and-death struggle with a Henry II. for their maintenance. Their pecuniary privileges and immunities exist no longer, for the grant made in some countries to the clergy from the national exchequer is rather a substitute for estates confiscated than a free gift of love. Their official privileges and immunities exist no longer, unless the permission conceded to bishops to take part in national legislation, and the exemption of the clergy from having to serve in the army or on juries, be regarded as the equivalents of the honours and immunities bestowed by the Caesars with so ungrudging a hand. The apparent tendency of modern legislation, still affected by a reaction from mediaeval assumptions, is to approve not only of the civil power resuming the privileges that it had bestowed, but of its transferring to itself those powers of self-government in respect to doctrine and discipline, which were not granted to the church as a favour, but were confirmed to her by Constantine and his successors as hers by prescription and inherent right.

IMPLUVIUM seems to be sometimes used to designate the ATRIUM, or court outside the door of a church, in which there was generally a basin or some vessel for performing ablutions [FOUNTAIN; HOLY WATER] (Bingham's Antiq. VIII. iii. 5). [C.]

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (Manus impositio, χειρῶν ἐπιθεσις, χειροθεσία, χειροτονία). [Χειροτονία originally signified election, per suffragia manuum extensione data. An election by the people always in the early church preceded consecration, so that it is not surprising that χειροτονία soon came to signify the whole process of making a bishop, of which it properly denoted only the first stage (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.).]

The origin of this rite is to be looked for in patriarchal times, when it seems to have been a form simply of solemn benediction. Thus Jacob, when blessing Ephraim and Manasseh on his death-bed, laid his hands upon them (Gen. xlviii. 14). The high priest employed practically the same gesture as a part of the public ritual (Lev. ix. 22, 23). So the Lord Himself blessed children (Mark x. 16).

It became also a form of setting apart or designation to important offices, as well secular as religious, e. g., in the case of Joshua (Num. xxvii. 18–23; Deut. xxxiv. 9). And in connection with the consecration of priests (Lev. viii. 22). Jewish Rabbins were set apart by imposition of hands until comparatively modern times. We pass over the use of this ceremony in the Levitical sacrifices, and also in oaths, as having no Christian equivalent. Though this latter somewhat resembles the custom of swearing with the hand laid upon relics, and upon the volume of the gospels even to modern times.

In the New Testament, we find the laying on of hands used by our Lord both in blessing and in healing; and again He promises to His disciples that they too should lay hands on the sick and they should recover. The apostles laid their hands as the outward sign of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, both on ordinary Christians after baptism (Acts viii. 17; xix. 6), and on those set apart for a special office (Acts xiii. 3; and probably 1 Tim. iv. 14; and 2 Tim. i. 6); at the time when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, the doctrine of the "laying on of hands" was one of the elements of Christian teaching (Heb. vi. 1). [DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, vol. iii. p. xc.]

The imposition of hands is used in the following ceremonies:—

1. In Ordinations to the higher Orders. The 4th council of Carthage had canons directing imposition of hands in the ordination of a bishop, priest, or deacon (cann. 2, 3, 4). But another form was provided for the subdeacon, "quia manus impositionem non accipit." Similarly for the other minor orders (cc. 5–10). See also Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 16. These were ἀχειροτόνητος ὑπερείς, an inferior ministry, and the holders insacratum ministri. They were not allowed to enter the diaconicon, nor handle the vasa Dominica or sacred vessels (Conc. Agathen. c. 66; Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 51; Bingham, iii. 1). "Manus impositio docet, eos qui sacris ordinibus mancipantur, sacras omnes actiones, quasi sub Deo efficere, utpote quem habeant operationum suarum in omnibus ducem ac rectorem" (Pseudo-Dionysius, De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 5, par. 3). "Hæc manuum impositione significatur illapsus Spiritus Sancti, quem ordinans precatur dari ordinando: ejusque regimen, directio et protectio, ut scilicet Spiritus Sanctus ordinandum quasi manu suâ regat et dirigat" (Amalaricus de Eccles. Offic. lib. i. c. 12).

Deaconesses also received the impositio manuum; and their ordination is expressly called both χειροτονία and χειροθεσία in the 15th canon of Chalcedon. [ORDINATION.] [S. J. E.]

2. In the restitution of holy orders, as in the original conferring, the imposition of the hands of the archbishop formed an essential portion of the rite (Martene, Rit. Ant. III. ii.).

3. In baptism the laying-on of hands, with unction, followed in the most ancient times immediately upon the washing of water [BAPTISM, § 13, p. 157]; nor was the custom obsolete in the West in the 13th century (Martene, R. A. I. ii. 1 § 3), while in the East it is practised still. This is however to be understood, in the West at least, to refer to baptisms at which the bishop himself was present, as was generally the case when baptism took place—except in cases of extremity—only it certain solemn seasons. When baptism was frequently celebrated in the absence of a bishop, while the laying-on of hands and chrismation on the forehead was a privilege of the episcopal order (R. A. I. ii. 3, § 2), the custom arose of the baptized being presented to the bishop at some convenient season separate from that of baptism. [CONFIRMATION.] The Arabic canons, called Nicene (c. 55), desire the chorepiscopus in his circuits to cause the boys and girls to be brought to him, that he may sign them with the cross, pray over them, lay his hands upon them, and bless them. Bede tells us that Cuthbert used to journey through his diocese, laying his hands upon those who had been baptized, that they might receive the Holy Ghost (Vita Cuthberti, c. 29, in Migne's Patrol. xciv. 769 D). Ancient authorities, however, give at least as great prominence to the chrismation on the forehead which was reserved for the bishop, as to the laying-on of hands. See on the whole subject Martene, De Rit. Ant. lib. i. c. ii.; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 206 ff.

4. In the reception of a heretic into the church, whose baptism was recognised as valid, imposition of hands was the form of conferring those gifts of the Holy Spirit which he could not have received in a heretical community [CONFIRMATION, p. 425; HERESY, p. 768].

5. In benedictions the laying-on of hands is constantly used; as, in the benediction of an abbat (R. A. II. i. 3); of a virgin dedicated to a religious life (ib. II. iv. 16); of a king (ib. II. x.), as when St. Columba, who was an abbat and not a bishop, laid his hands on the head of Aidan and consecrated him as king (Cumineus Albus, Vita S. Columbae c. 5, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. 1).

6. In the visitation of the sick the priest and the faithful who are with him are directed to lay hands on the sick (Martene, R. A. I. vi. 4, Ordd. 4, 5, 14, etc.), with the prayer that the Lord would vouchsafe to visit and relieve His servant.

7. In absolution the laying-on of hands accompanied the prayer for the remission of the sins of the penitent (Martene, R. A. I. vi. 3, Ordd. 3, 9, etc.). [C.]

IMPOTENT MAN, CURE OF. Guénebault mentions (s. v. "Boiteux," p. 164) a fine bas-relief of the cure of the lame man at the gate of the Temple, with apparent reference to Acts iii. 2, as published in Monumenta cryptum Vaticanum, Angelus de Gabriellis, fol. pl. lxxix. no. 3. Notice of the universally-treated subject of the healing of the paralytic man will be found under the heading PARALYTIC. [R. St. J. T.]

IMPRISONMENT OF THE CLERGY. Seclusion of criminous clerks, generally in a monastery, appears to have been resorted to as a disciplinary measure as early as the 6th century. Justinian (Novellae, cxiii. c. 20) orders "that if any presbyter or deacon were convicted of giving false evidence in a civil cause, he should be suspended from his function and confined to a monastery for three years." Laymen were scourged for this crime. So the 2nd council at Seville (can. 3), in the case of vagrant clergy: "Desertorem tamen clericum, cingulo honoris atque ordinationis suae exutum, aliquo tempore monasterio relegari convenit:

sicque postea in ministerio ecclesiastici ordinis revocari." A similar canon directing deposition and relegation to a monastery to be inflicted upon clerks guilty of certain crimes, passed at the council of Agde (c. 1). A distinction was drawn by the first council of Mâcon between the inferior clergy (junior) and the higher orders (honoratior). The former were to receive forty stripes, save one, whilst the latter were imprisoned thirty days for the same offence (Conc. Matiscon. I. can. 8). Pope Gregory the Great seems to have laid down (Epp. vii. 50) an intelligible principle: that such crimes as were by the Mosaic law punished with death, when committed by clerics, incurred the penalty of deposition without hope of restoration (desperationem sacramentum dignitatum). To these he added some others, fornication, adultery, perjury, and such like: all these incurred irregularity. Other offences were expiated by penitentialia in a monastery for a longer or shorter time (Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 59). Individuals would sometimes segregate themselves of their own accord to expiate some fault. The same Gregory praises (Epp. vii. 12) Saturninus, bishop of Jadera (= Zara, in Dalmatia, for so doing in order to atone for communicating with the excommunicated archbishop of Salona (ib. c. 59). Joannes Defensor, whom Gregory had sent into Spain to execute a sentence of six months' relegation to a monastery upon a certain bishop who had driven an unoffending neighbour from his see, pronounced the sentence far too lenient. The same punishment was inflicted upon certain bishops who had condemned an innocent person. When Gregory imprisoned clerics he was in the habit of making an annual payment for their maintenance to the monastery that received them (Thomassin, u. s. III. lib. ii. c. 29), but whether derived from the offender's benefice, or the property of the pope himself, does not appear. The tendency was perhaps to bear more lightly on crimes of the kind mentioned above; but incontinence was always heavily punished. Hincmar, and after him Flodoard, tell the story of Genebald, bishop of Laudunum (Laon), who for a crime of this kind was condemned to seven years' penitence, and even put into fetters by his metropolitan, Remigius, bishop of Rheims (Hincmar, Vita S. Remig.). And for capital crimes the incarceration was for life, and included a sentence of perpetual lay-communion (Conc. Epwim. can. 22).

But during the reign of Charlemagne a somewhat milder rule prevailed. Hincmar, and also Rabanus, archbishop of Mentz, were inclined to distinguish between secret crimes, and those which caused open scandal, and to treat the former more leniently upon confession and repentance. Probably the general declension of morals at that period forced them to make some abatement from the rigid rules of a purer age. Accordingly, canonical punishments were generally lightened from this time (Thomassin, u. s. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 60; Bingham, bk. xvii. c. 4).

The larger churches had sometimes prisons in their precincts as well as monasteries [DECANTA].

IMPROPRIATION is the assignment of ecclesiastical tithes to a layman, and is to be distinguished from appropriation, which is the assignment of them to a college or other corporation, some of whose members are in orders. The practice seems to have sprung up only about the beginning of the 9th century.

Very soon after the payment of TITHES (see the article) became general, the alienation of them by the laity began. Thus a council at Ingelheim (A.D. 948) in its 8th canon protests against this new form of robbery: "Ut oblationes fidelium, quatenus altari deferantur, nihil omnino ad laicalem potestatem, dicente Scriptura, 'Qui altari serviunt, de altario participantur.'" (So Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Discip. III. lib. i. c. 7, n. 8), who interprets this canon as referring to tithes. Louis IV. of France, and the emperor Otho, were present at this council. To the same effect a council of Metz in its 2nd canon, quoting Mal. iii. 8-10. It was not uncommon for the lay lords to seize the opportunity of the vacancy of a bishopric or a parish, to make these depredations (Vid. Thomassin, tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 53, for instances of this). And we find even that the monks of St. Denis had got possession of some tithes (it does not appear how) and wanted to sell them. This seems to be a distinct case of appropriation, and we learn the facts from a letter to them of Hincmar of Rheims, who protests against their selling what they ought to restore to the parish priest.

But any instances we find in these times are exceptional, and apparently the result of violent and illegal seizure by laymen of ecclesiastical dues. As Thomassin observes: "Necdum tunc in mentem quidquam venisse de decimis infeedatis. Involaverant decimas Laici, necdum pacifice possidebant, necdum obducere potuerant huic rapinae vel colorem legitimae possessionis. Quin identidem comonebantur profani depravedatores, ut ecclesiae restituerent, quae jure retinere non possent" (tom. iii. lib. i. c. 7).

It is in the next and succeeding ages that we must look for impropriation as a legally recognised condition of ecclesiastical property.

IN PACE. [INSCRIPTIONS, p. 854 ff.]

INCENSE. There is no trace of the use of incense in Christian worship during the first four centuries. On the contrary, we meet with many statements in the writings of the early fathers which cannot be reconciled with the existence of such a custom. Thus Athenagoras, A.D. 177:—"The Creator and Father of the universe does not require blood nor smoke, nor the sweet smell of flowers and incense" (Legatio, § 13). Tertullian, A.D. 198, comparing certain Christian customs with heathen, says, "It is true, we buy no frankincense; if the Arabians complain of this, the Sabeans will testify that more of their merchandise, and that more costly, is lavished on the burials of Christians, than in burning incense to the gods" (Apol. c. xlii.). "I offer Him a rich sacrifice . . . not one pennyworth of the grains of frankincense," &c. (ib. c. xxx.). Clements of Alexandria, A.D. 192, contrasting the reasonable service of Christians with that of the heathen says, that "the truly holy altar is the just soul, and the perfume from it holy prayer" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vi. § 32). "If then they should say that the great High Priest, the Lord, offers to God the incense (θυμία) of sweet smell, let them not suppose that the Lord offers this sacrifice and sweet smell of incense, but let them understand that He offers on the altar the acceptable gift of charity and spiritual perfume" (Paedag. lib. ii. c. 8, § 67). Arnobius, A.D. 298, says of the use of frankincense among the heathen, "It is almost a new thing, nor is the term of years impossible to be traced since the knowledge of it flowed into these parts . . . But if in the olden times neither men nor gods sought after the matter of this frankincense, it is proved that it is vainly and to no purpose offered now" (Adr. Gentes, lib. vii.). Lactantius, A.D. 303:—"It follows that I show what is the true sacrifice of God . . . lest any one should think that either victims, or odours, or precious gifts are desired by God. . . . This is the true sacrifice, not that which is brought out of a chest, but that which is brought out of the heart" (Divin. Instit. Epit. c. 2). He also quotes with approbation a saying of the Neo-Platonists, that "frankincense and other perfumes ought not to be offered at the sacrifice of God" (Divin. Instit. lib. vi. § 25). St. Augustine, 396:—"We go not into Arabia to seek for frankincense, nor do we ransack the packs of the greedy trader. God requires of us the sacrifice of praise" (Enarr. in Ps. xlix. § 21). The above are brief extracts from passages, often of considerable length, all bearing on the subject; and not a single author makes the least allusion to any Christian rite of incense, or any reservation from which we could infer that such a rite existed. Their language precludes the supposition.

It is probable, however, that incense was very early employed in Christian places of worship as a supposed disinfectant, and to counteract unpleasant smells; and that this was the origin of that ritual use of it, which began in the 6th or possibly the 5th century. Tertullian, who, as we have seen, denies by implication the ritual use, yet says, "If the smell of any place offend me, I burn something of Arabia; but not," he adds, "with the same rite, nor the same dress, nor the same appliance, with which it is done before idols" (De Cor. Mil. c. 10). The following is a benediction of incense, used in the days of Charlemagne and later, in which no other object than that which Tertullian had in burning it is recognized:—"May the Lord bless this incense to the extinction of every noxious stench, and kindle it to the odour of its sweetness" (Martene, De Eccl. Ant. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, Art. 12, ordd. 5, 6). There is no mention of incense in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, which is supposed to represent the offices of the 4th century; nor indeed in the Apostolical Constitutions with which it is incorporated. Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520, but possibly somewhat earlier) is the first who testifies to its use in religious ceremonial:—"The chief priest (bishop) having made an end of sacred prayer at the divine altar, begins the censuring with it, and goes over the whole circuit of the sacred place" (Hierarch. Eccles. c. iii. sect. 2; comp. sect. 3, § 3). A thrible of gold is said by Evagrius to have been sent by a king of Persia to a church in Antioch about 594 (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. 21). The most ancient Ordo Romanus, which Cave supposes to have been compiled about 730, and which may belong to the 7th century, orders that in pontifical masses a subdeacon, bearing a golden censer, shall go before the bishop (of Rome) as he leaves the secretarium for the choir, and two with censers before the deacon gospeller as he proceeds with the gospel to the ambo (§§ 7, 11, in Musae. Ital. tom. ii.). These rules are also given in the next revision of the Ordo, which may be a century later (ib. §§ 4, 8). This latter document says also, "After the gospel has been read . . . the thuribles are carried about the altar, and afterwards taken to the nostrils of persons (hominum), and the smoke is drawn up towards the face by the hand" (§ 9). This probably originated in its earlier natural use as a means of sweetening and (as they thought) purifying the air; but we see in it the probable origin of the strictly ritual censuring of persons in the West. In the same Ordo, which was certainly in use before Amalarius wrote (about 827), is a direction that after the oblates and the chalice have been set on the altar, with a view to their consecration, "the incense be put on the altar" (§ 9). Here we have the probable germ of the later "censing of the gifts." It is probable, however, that such ritual practices were for some time confined to Rome. We do not observe any reference to the use of incense in the Gallican Liturgies which were in use down to the time of Charlemagne, nor is it mentioned by Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, in his explanation of liturgical rites (Martene, u. s. ord. 1), nor by Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, in his book on the offices of the church. We may also infer its rarity within our period, and the little importance attached to it throughout the 9th century, from the fact that it is not mentioned by Florus of Lyons, Rabanus of Mentz, or Walafrid of Reichenau, in works largely devoted to questions of ritual.

The so-called Missa Illyrici (Martene, u. s. ord. 4) preserves the Scriptural symbolism by directing the priest to say, when the incense is burnt, "Let my prayer be set forth in Thy sight as the incense" (Ps. cxli. 2). But in the same and later ordines [ORDO] it represents divine influence on the soul, according to the following explanation of Amalarius:—"The thurible denotes the body of Christ in which is fire, to wit, the Holy Spirit, from whom proceeds a good odour, which every one of the elect wishes to snatch towards himself. The same odour is a token that virtue (bonam operationem) goes forth out of Christ, which he who wishes to live passes into his own heart" (De Eccles. Offic. lib. iii. c. 18). The reader will observe the allusion to the mode of inhaling the smoke above described.

This notice would be imperfect without a reference to certain passages from early writers, which have led some to suppose that notwithstanding the authorities above cited, the ritual use of incense was known in the Christian church from the beginning. As the earliest testimony we often see alleged the third apostolical canon, which forbids that "beside honey and milk, and new ears of corn and bunches of grapes in their season [see FRUITS, OFFERING OF], anything else shall be offered on the altar, at the time of the holy oblation, than oil for the lamp and incense" (Bever. Pandect. tom. i. p. 2). The Arabic paraphrase has more generally, "in the time of the sacraments and prayers" (ib. tom. ii.; Annot. p. 16). It will be seen that this canon does not mention the ritual use of incense, nor can it be shown that the incense mentioned was designed for such use. It was without doubt often used as a perfume, and in the caves and catacombs in which the first Christians often worshipped, and in which their dead were frequently buried, would sometimes be thought almost as necessary as the lamp-oil, on behalf of which a similar exception was made. We must add too that the whole of the clause above cited looks like a late addition to the very simple code which is assigned, with probability, to the middle of the 3rd century, though the first mention of it occurs in 394 (Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 76). Pseudo-Hippolytus, alleged as the bishop of Portus, 220, but in reality some centuries later:—"The churches lament, with a great lamentation, because neither the oblation nor the (rite of) incense is celebrated" (De Consumm. Mundi, c. 34). Here we have nothing more than imagery borrowed from well known rites of the Mosaic law. The language was probably suggested by that of the following passage in St. Basil, 370, which has been brought forward with the same object:—"The houses of prayer were cast down by unholy hands, the altars were overthrown, and there was no oblation nor incense, no place of sacrifice, but fearful sorrow, as a cloud, was over all" (In Gordium M. rt. Hom. xix.). St. Basil here is merely in part citing and partly paraphrasing, with reference to the church under persecution, what Azarias in the Song of the Three Children says of the state of Jerusalem during the captivity (Sept. Vers. v. 14). St. Ambrose says, with reference to the appearance of the angel to Zacharias "on the right side of the altar of incense" (St. Luke i. 11), "Would that an angel might stand by us also as we burn (or rather heap, adolentibus) the altars" (Expos. Evang. S. Luc. lib. i. § 28). Incense is not mentioned here, and "adolere" does not necessarily imply the use of fire, so that no allusion to incense may have been intended. It is probable, however, that the thought of incense was suggested to St. Ambrose by the mention of "the altar of incense." We therefore further point out that if he was thinking of material incense, as used in the Christian church, it must in his time have been burnt on altars, which no one asserts; and, moreover, that St. Ambrose explains himself by a paraphrase of his own words, "as we heap the altars, as we bring the sacrifice." The incense in his mind was "the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." The testament of St. Ephrem the Syrian, a spurious document of uncertain date, is also quoted with the same object:—"I exhort you not to bury me with sweet spices . . . but to give the fumigation of sweet-smelling smoke in the house of God . . . Burn your incense in the house of the Lord to His praise and honour" (Test. S. Ephr. in Serii Vitae Sanctorum, Feb. 1). The actual use of incense during the funeral ceremony appears to be intended here; but the evidence of a late forgery is worth nothing. We may add that there was an obvious natural reason, such as the first Christians would have recognized with Tertullian, for burning incense at a funeral; and it is probable that the custom of using it then contributed not a little to the introduction of the practice as a purely religious rite.

INCEST (Incestus) is defined by the Decree of Gratian (causa 36, qu. 1, c. 2, § 4) thus: "Incestus est consanguineorum vel affinium abusus," where we are of course to understand affinity or consanguinity such as would be an impediment to matrimony (Van Espen, Jus Eccles. P. iii. tit. iv. cc. 48, 49).

Christian morality extended the range of "prohibited degrees" within which it was unlawful to contract matrimony, and consequently the conception of incest, much beyond that of the heathen world. The apologists, as Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 31) and Origen (c. Celsum, V. p. 248, Spencer) speak with horror of the licence given to Persians and Egyptians of marrying persons near in blood; and Augustine (De Civitate, xv. 16) insists upon the natural loathing which men feel at connexions of this kind. Gothofred (on the Theodosian Code, lib. iii. tit. 12) gives many instances of marriages among the Romans—as of uncle with niece—which the feeling of Christendom universally condemns. [AFFINITY; PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

Basil the Great (ad Amphiloichum, c. 67) holds incest with a sister to be a crime of the same degree as murder. He who commits incest with a half-sister, whether by the father's or the mother's side, during the time that he continues in his sin, is to be absolutely excluded from the church; after he is brought to a sense of his sin, he is for three years to stand among the "Flentes" at the door of the church, begging those who enter to pray for him; then he is to pass another seven years among the "Audientes," as still unworthy to pray with the rest; then, if he show true contrition, and on his earnest entreaty, he may be admitted for three years among the "Substrati;" then, if he bring forth fruits meet for repentance, in the tenth year he may be admitted to the prayers of the faithful, but not to offer with them; then, after continuing two years in this state, he may at last be admitted to holy communion (c. 75). The same punishment is prescribed for one who commits incest with a daughter-in-law (c. 76). He who marries two sisters, though not at the same time, is subject to the penalties of adultery, i.e. two years among the Flentes, two among the Audientes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes, before he can be admitted to communion. And generally, he who marries within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity (τῆς ἀπειρημένης συγγενείας) is liable to the penalties of adultery (c. 68). The council of Elvira (Conc. Elb. c. 61), A.D. 305, allotted to a marriage with a deceased wife's sister the penalty of fifteen years' excommunication; that of Neo-Cæsarea (c. 2), A.D. 314, decreed the excommunication of a woman who married two brothers for the whole of her life, except that in peril of death she might be admitted to communion, on promising to renounce the connexion if she recovered (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. xi. 3).

The Penitentials, as might be expected, provide penalties for incest; those, for instance, of Theodore, of Bede, and of Egbert assign to different forms of this sin periods of penance varying from five to fifteen years (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 179, 328, 420). [C.]

INCLUSI. Monks living in detached cells within the precincts of the monastery ("intra septa") were termed "inclusi." These were monks either of long experience or of delicate health (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 38). They were subject to the control of the abbot, but not to the ordinary rules of the monastery (Martene, Reg. Comm. c. 1; Menard, Concord. Regul. c. 3, § 6). See HERMITS and HESYCHASTÆ.

INDALECIUS. [HESYCHIUS (1).]

INDICTION. From the middle of the 4th century a new note of time begins to appear in dates; Indiction, followed by an ordinal number, from I. to XV., as a character of the year, is appended to its customary designation; e.g., Coss. M. et N. (or Anno ab Incarnatione—) Indictione—. In respect of its origin, "Indictio" is a term of the Roman fiscus, meaning "quidquid in praestationem indicitur," notice of a tax (on real property, Cod. Justin. x. 6, 3), "assessment," ἐπιμέμνησις: thence it came to denote the year on which the tax was assessed, beginning 1st September, the epoch of the imperial fiscal year. It seems that in the provinces, after Constantine, if not earlier, the valuation of property was revised upon a census taken at the end of every fifteen years, or three lustra (Ideler, Hdb. 2. 347 sqq., from Savigny, über die Steuerverfassung unter den Kaisern, in the Transactions of the Berlin Royal Academy, 1822, 23). From the strict observance of this fiscal regulation there resulted a marked term of fifteen years, constantly recurrent, the Circle of Indictions, ἡ ἐκαὶ δεκαέτηρις τῶν Ἰνδικτιῶνων (or Ἰνδικτῶν), which became available for chronological purposes as a "period of revolution" of fifteen years, each beginning 1st September: which (except in the Spanish peninsula) continued to be used as a character of the year irrespectively of all reference to taxation. The Indictions (like the "solar cycle" of Sunday letters, twenty-eight years, and the lunar cycle, nineteen years, of "Golden Numbers," beside which this circle has obtained place in chronology) do not form an era: the annexed ordinal number is reckoned from the epoch of the circle then current: it is not expressed how many circles have elapsed since any given point of time. It is certain that September 1st is the original epoch of each indiction (St. Ambros. Epist. ad Episc. per Aemil. 2,256, Indictio cum Septembri mense incipit; and de Noe et Arca, c. 17. A Septembri mense annus videtur incipere, sicut Indictionum praesentium usus ostendit). From any given date of a known year to which its indiction is added, as e.g., "3 id. August. Symmacho et Boetio Coss. [= 11 Aug., A.D. 522] in fine Indictionis XV." (Reines. Inscript. Vet. 978), it results that a circle of indictions began 210 (= 14 × 15) years earlier, i.e., A.D. 312. Now as it is only since Constantine that an "Indiction" makes its appearance as a note of time, and as with the defeat and death of Maxentius in the autumn of that year Constantine attained to undisputed empire, the date, A.D. 312, 1 Sept., is accepted as the epoch of the first circle of indictions. Hence the technical rule for finding the indiction of each year. To the ordinal number of the given year A.D. (beginning with 1 January) add 3: divide the amount by 15: the remainder denotes the indiction; if there be no remainder,

the year is Indict. 15. Thus, in respect of the above-cited date, A.D. 522 (August 11th), the division of 525 by 15 gives no remainder; therefore Jan. 1st to Aug. 31st of that year lie in Indiction 15, beginning at 1 Sept. of A.D. 521. The author of the Paschal Chronicle (probably a man of Antioch) makes the circle of Indictions begin much earlier, viz. at the epoch of the Antiochene era, 1 Gorpiaeus = 1 Sept. U.C. 705 = B.C. 49; at which year he notes: "Here begins the first year of the 15-year circle of indictions, with the first year of C. Julius Caesar:" and thenceforward he adds to each year its indiction. Twenty-four complete circles ($24 \times 15 = 360$) end therefore at 1 Sept. A.D. 312: and at Ol. 273, 1, Coss. Constantino III., Licinio III., U.C. 1066, beginning 1 January, A.D. 313, he notes: 'Ἰνδικτιῶνων Κωνσταντινιανῶν ἐντάνθα ἀρχή—to be understood as meaning that the first eight months of that consulship belonged to that first year. (So, throughout, the Indiction in Chron. Pasch. is attached, not to the year in which it began, but to the following year, beginning 1 January, which contains eight months of it. Comp. Clinton, F. R. Append. 1 and 2.) Although there is no trace elsewhere of this earlier system of indictions, it does not follow, in Ideler's judgment (2, 351), that the statement of the Paschal Chronicle is entirely without foundation. A fiscal regulation, proceeding by periods of fifteen years may, he thinks, have obtained in Syria and other Eastern provinces: and the assumption would serve to explain the circumstance, else unaccounted for, that in the reckoning of Antioch, the year (of the era of the Seleucidae) begins 1 September, not at the old 1 October. Some later writers, misled by the merely technical rule above given, have assumed that the Indictions actually had their beginning three years before the Nativity, i.e. before our A.D. 1, with the "decree of Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed" (St. Luke iii. 1). So says Duranti—a writer of the 13th century (Speculum Juris, t. i. pt. 1, p. 281): "Caesar Aug. decretum proposuit, ut describeretur universus orbis; i.e., ut quilibet aestimaret bona sua, describens orbem sub tributo sibi singulis quindecim annis reddendo, quod quidem tempus divisit per tria lustra," &c. And the rule concerning three years to be added to the year-date (A.D.) rests, he adds, on the fact, "quia tot praecesserant de indictione quando Christus natus fuit, vel quia praemissum edictum Caesaris tribus annis praecepit Nativitatem Christi."

It is only in the latter half of the 4th century that the indictions first appear in dates. St. Athanasius, in a fragment of his work de Synodis, opp. t. i. pt. 2, p. 737, gives "Indiction XIV." with the date (= A.D. 341) of the council of Antioch; but that work was written towards the close of his life (ob. 371), at which time this method of dating was in common use. The earliest clear instance is the date of a decree of Constantius (Cod. Theod. xii. 12, 2), of the year 356, or rather (for the text needs correction) 357. From the earliest years of that century the yearly appointment of consuls became irregular, and from time to time the designation of the year, instead of Coss. M. et. N., became post consulatum M. et N. There was even an uncertainty in the numbering of a set of post-consulate years: for instance, some would designate the first vacant year anno post consulatum M. N. i.; others, after the old fashion of numbering, anno ii. (Pagi, Dissert. Hypat. p. 319; Ideler, 2, 345 note). A further source of uncertainty was the difference of epochs of the year. But the fifteen-years' circle of indictions once established throughout the empire provided a correction for all such uncertainty, so long as it continued to be understood, that the year of indiction began on the 1st of September (preceding the 1st of January of the year found by the rule above given). And, in fact, this was the established practice during the greater part of the period with which we are concerned in this work. In the Codex Theodosianus, indeed, its learned annotator, Gothofred, finds indications of four distinct reckonings of the indictions, viz. the Italica, A.D. 312; Orientalis, 313; and two of Africa, 314 and 315. As regards the supposed Orientalis, Cardinal Norris (De Anno et Epochis Syro-Maced. Dissertat. IV. c. iv.: Opp. t. ii. col. 422 sqq.) has shown that its epoch is the 1st September, A.D. 312. Concerning the two supposed different African reckonings, see Ideler (Hdb. 2, 354 sqq.; Lehrb. p. 409). Apart from these inferences from the Theodosian Codex, we find no trace, except here and there in corrupt texts and negligent dates, of a different reckoning: Dionysius Exiguus knows no other than that which is expressed by the usual rule (Argumenta paschalia, ii.). To trace the history of the use of the indictions through the different provinces of the Roman empire would, as Ideler remarks, require extensive disquisition. In respect of France, Mabillon has shown (de re diplomat. ii. 24, 26) that this note of time does not appear in public acts before Charlemagne, but in acts of councils, and in writers, it is found earlier. But far down into the middle ages its use became so general that it is rarely absent from dates attached to civil or ecclesiastical documents in Italy, France, Germany (in the Pyrenean peninsula it seems never to have been established). Duranti, writing in the 13th century, testifies (u. s.): "Tantae fuit auctoritatis indictio, ut nullus sine eâ fieret contractus, nec privilegium, nec testamentum, nec alia scriptura sollemnis: et etiam hodie eandem obtinet auctoritatem."

With the desuetude of the Imperial fiscal regulation, with which the indictions originated, the original epoch, 1st September, ceased to be significant—except in the Eastern empire, where that day was established as the first day of the year: wherever in the Corpus Historiae Egentinae the indictions occur, they are those of 1st September, 312. Even in the West, beyond the limits of our period, they are still occasionally met with: thus, a writing of Gregory VII., A.D. 1073, bears the subscription, "Datum Capuae, Kalend. Sept., incipiente Indictione XII." But in process of time the indiction, detached from its original epoch, came to be dated from the new-year's day, as received at the time, December 25th, or January 1st, or March 25th. Distinct from these indictions used by various popes in their bulls, and by other writers, is one which has been called "Caesarean," of which the first notice occurs in Bede, de temp. ratione, c. 46: "Incipiunt Indictiones ab viii. Kalend. Octobris, ibidemque terminantur." This, of which there is extant no earlier indication (but which, so great was the authority of the writer, may have influenced the practice of the Imperial chancelleries), is probably due to an assumption of Bede, that the old epoch of the Byzantine year, September 24th, was accepted by Constantine as the epoch of the indictons established by him. [H. B.]

INDULGENCE. (I.) The use of the word Indulgentia by ecclesiastical writers is derived from that of the juriconsults, who employ it to designate a remission of punishment or of taxes, especially such a general amnesty as was sometimes proclaimed by an emperor on an extraordinary occasion of rejoicing. Thus the Theodosian Code has a title De Indulgentiis Criminum (Van Espen, Jus Eccles., P. II. sec. i. tit. 7). Hence the word passed into ecclesiastical usage in a double sense. First, it designates remission of sins, as in what Reticus, bishop of Autun, according to St. Augustine (c. Julian. i. 3), observed of baptism as early as the Roman synod under pope Melchides, A.D. 313: "It can escape nobody that this is the principal indulgence known to the church, where we lay aside the whole weight of our hereditary guilt, and cancel all our former misdeeds committed in ignorance, and put off the old man with all his innate wickednesses." In this passage, indulgence stands immediately for remission of sins, and that alone. But we are more immediately concerned with it in a second sense, that in which it designates such a lightening of ecclesiastical penalties, in consideration of the state of the offender, as St. Paul practised in the case of the incestuous Corinthian (2 Cor. ii. 6-11). This question of the advisability of such a relaxation first comes prominently before us in the case of those who had "lapsed" or denied Christ to avoid persecution, and for whom martyrs had in many cases interceded. St. Cyprian tells us, in his letter to Antoninus, how it had been discussed and decided by his colleagues in Africa. They held that the church should not be closed irrevocably to such of the lapsed as were desirous of returning to it: nor yet opened indiscriminately till they had undergone their full penance, and had their particular case taken into consideration. "Et ideo placuit . . . examinatis causis singulorum: libellaticos interim admitti, sacrificatis in exitu subveniri: quia exomologesis apud inferos non est, nec ad penitentiam quis a nobis compelli potest, si fructus penitentiae subtrahatur" (Ep. lii.). The bishops, he adds, already made distinctions between other crimes, according to their discretion, and therefore might be left to deal with this similarly. No canons for regulating penances of any kind had as yet been passed. It rested accordingly with the bishops to use greater or less indulgence in dispensing them all as they thought fit. It was disputed by Novatian whether they could remit as well as bind: and he maintained that only God could remit. But this was not the doctrine of the church. The fifth of the canons of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (Mansi, ii. 516) gives the bishops power to mitigate (φιλανθρωπεύειν) or to increase the length of an offender's penitence; so the twelfth Nicene canon gives the bishop power to deal more gently with penitents who have shown true repentance (Mansi, ii. 673). The merciless rulings of the Elviran canons 1, 2, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 17, 19, 63-66, 70-73, and 75, which forbid certain offenders to be readmitted to communion even on their death-beds,* were neither imitated elsewhere nor maintained in Spain itself (Mansi, ib. 5-19). St. Ambrose, speaking for the West, says: "Our Lord must have meant the powers of loosing and binding to be coextensive, or He would not have bestowed both on the same terms" (De Poen. i. 2). St. Gregory Nyssen deposes, on behalf of the East, to what had been customary: Τοῖς ἀσθενεστέροις ἐγένετό τις παρὰ τῶν πατέρων συμπεριφορά, which is the Greek equivalent for "indulgentia" (Ep. ad Letoi. c. 4).

Usually there were four stages or degrees through which offenders had to pass before regaining communion: (1) weepers, (2) hearers, (3) kneelers, (4) bystanders; and usually several years had to be spent in each. Now the bishop, according to St. Gregory, might, in proportion to their conversion, "rescind the period of their penance; making it eight, seven, or even five years instead of nine, in each stage, should their repentance exceed in depth what it had to fulfil in length, and compensate, by its increased zeal, for the much longer time required in others to effect their cure" (ib. c. 5).

So matters went on till about the end of the 7th century. The office of PENITENTIARY presbyter, abolished by Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, three centuries earlier, is not supposed to have produced any change, so far as they were concerned (Soc. v. 19 and Soz. vii. 16). But they were changed materially when the system of commutations laid down in the Penitential of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, had begun to work: according to which a rigorous fast of days, weeks, or years, might be redeemed by saying a proportionable number of psalms, or by paying a proportionable fine (c. 3-10, in Migne's Patrol. xcix. 937 sqq.). Several of the offences stigmatised in the canons of the synod of Berghamstede, A.D. 697, are dismissed with a fine (Mansi, xii. 111 sqq.). The synod of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, protests in its 26th and 27th canons against the neglect of discipline to which this "new device" and "perilous custom" had led (ib. 493-96). But the Penitential of Egbert, archbishop of York, not only re-enacts all the commutations authorised by Theodore (ib. 433), but adds to them in a subsequent chapter (ib. 456), voluntary exile from home and country being one of the new kind allowed. Similar permission is given in the Penitential of Bede, as it is called (ib. 519). After this the extension of indulgences to pilgrimages and holy wars was a pure matter of time; and these, from the ardour inspired by both, threw everything else into the shade. The climax was reached when, to make them more attractive, it was formally declared of the one, "iter illud pro omni penitentiâ reputetur" (Concil. Claramont. c. 2, ap. Mansi, xx. 816), and popularly believed of the other, "pro stipendio erat indulgentia peccatorum proposita" (ib. pp. 827 and 890). On this point see Morinus, De Poenit. x. 22, 1-6, and Bingham, Ant. xviii. 4, for earlier times. Goar (Euchol. pp. 680-88)

* It is to be observed that the reading "nec in fine," or "nec in finem," is changed in some later recensions—as in that of Burchard—into "non nisi in fine," so as to bring it into harmony with the Nicene canon (13) which forbids such total excommunication.—[Ed.]

attempts in vain to detect affinity between papal indulgences and the συγχωροχάρτια of the Greek church (comp. Ducange, Gloss. Gr. s. v.).

[E. S. Ff.]

(II.) Indulgences, or relaxations of the strict letter of the law, are however by no means confined to penitential cases; such relaxations are found in relation to almost all points of conduct. The laws of God, whether known by revelation or by natural light (Augustine, Quæst. 67 in Exod.), are of course always binding; but under positive human enactments cases may and do occur, in which the rigid enforcement of a law may be a greater evil to the society concerned than the suspension of its operation. Hence, in all states and societies, either the law-giving power or some other has exercised the right of suspending the operation of a law upon occasion. A familiar instance of such a dispensing power is the commutation by the sovereign of this country of sentences passed by the judges in the ordinary course of law. As a law is necessarily rigid, while the real character of human acts cannot be rigidly defined, such a dispensing power seems necessary for the equitable administration of justice.

And this principle is just as true of the church as of other societies; here too we find the strict letter of the law mitigated by authority in special cases from an early period. Such indulgences, or concessions to human weakness, commonly called dispensations, have received various names—remissio, venia, clementia, misericordia, dispensatio; συγγνώμη, συμπάθεια, φιλανθρωπία, οίκονομία (Suicer, Thes. s. v.)—all implying something of the nature of occasional indulgence or ἐπιείκεια in the administration of a law, the law itself remaining unchanged. A constant exemption of a person or body corporate from the operation of a particular law is called a privilegium. The canonists generally limit the use of the word dispensatio to the case in which a future transgression of a law is permitted.

Thomassin (Eccl. Discip. II. iii. 24, § 14) holds that in the early ages of the church, when few or no councils were held, such dispensations were granted by the bishops; that afterwards, from the end of the 3rd century, councils decided on the cases in which some relaxation of the law of the church was to be allowed; then, as provincial councils frequently referred such matters to the judgment of the see of Rome, that see gradually claimed and exercised a dispensing power independent of councils. The twenty-seventh canon of the (so-called) fourth council of Carthage supplies a good instance of a dispensing power applied to a canon. The council recognises the general prohibition of the translation of bishops from an inferior to a better see “per ambitionem,” yet goes on to provide that “if the good of the church requires it,” such a translation may be made on the certificate of election being produced in the synod itself. Here a dispensing power seems to be given to the synod; for it must be presumed that it was to decide whether in a particular case “utilitas ecclesiæ fiendum poposcerit.” Penitents, digamists, and husbands of widows were by the general law of the church incapable of holy orders; yet pope Siricius (Epist. 1 ad Himerium, c. 15) permits such persons, once ordained, to exercise the functions of their order, though without hope of promotion to a higher. Pope Innocent I., A.D. 414, allows (Epist. 22, c. 5) that the bishops of Macedonia might, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, admit to the exercise of their functions those who had been irregularly ordained by Bonosus, a heretic, while he insists strongly on the general maintenance of the rule which for once is violated; it is only “pro necessitate temporis” that such relaxations of canonical strictness can be allowed, and “quod necessitas pro remedio invenit, cessante necessitate debet utique cessare”; such liberties cannot be permitted when the church is restored to its normal state of peace. We have another kind of dispensation in Gregory the Great’s letter to Augustine of Canterbury (Epist. xi. 64; in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 21), in which he permits persons who had married in ignorance within the prohibited degrees to be admitted to communion, though the general law of the church excommunicated such persons.

Of such a nature were the relaxations of strict law permitted in the early church; the numerous dispensations in matrimonial cases, in plurality of benefices, and in some other matters, which were so great a scandal in the mediæval church, do not fall within our period; nor within the same period had the baneful practice arisen of granting dispensations for wrongs to be committed. It was (as Thomassin observes, u. s. § 20) “in more recent times, when the discipline of the church had grown feeble and languid, that permission was sought for future violation of the canons, that license was asked and granted for sinning against sacred rules; men would fain sin without risk of penalty, and draw even from the laws themselves cover and authority for their contempt of the law.”

INDULGENTIAE HEBDOMAS. [HOLY WEEK.]

INDUS. [DORONA.]

INFANT BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 95, p. 169.]

INFANT COMMUNION. The practice of communicating infants was universal throughout the period of which we treat. For the east, where it still flourishes, we have the testimony of the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, in which little children (παῖδια) are ordered to receive immediately after all who have any special dedication, “and then all the people in order” (Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 13). Pseudo-Dionysius, possibly of the 5th century, but more probably of the 6th, says that “children who cannot understand divine things are yet made partakers of divine generation, and of the divine communion of the most sacred mysteries” (De Eccl. Hierarch. c. vii. § 11). Evagrius, who completed his Church History in 594, proves the continued observance of the rite, where he mentions “an ancient custom” at Constantinople, “when there remained a good quantity of the holy portions of the undefiled body of Christ our God, for uncorrupted boys from among those who attended the school of the undermaster to be sent for to consume them" (lib. iv. c. 36). There is a story told by John Moschus, A.D. 630, of some children who imitated among themselves the celebration of the Eucharist, as they had witnessed, and taken part in it themselves (Pratum Spirit. c. 196).

The earliest witness in the Latin church is St. Cyprian, who writing in 251, relates how the agitation of an infant to whom the cup was offered, led to the discovery of its having been taken to a heathen sacrifice (De Lapsis). He also represents the children of apostates as able to plead at the day of judgment, "We have done nothing; nor have we hastened of our own accord to those profane defilements, forsaking the meat and cup of the Lord" (ibid.). St. Augustine:—"They are infants; but they are made partakers of His table, that they may have life in themselves" (Serm. 174, § 7). "Why is the blood, which of the likeness of sinful flesh was shed for the remission of sins, ministered that the little one (parvulus) may drink, that he may have life, unless he hath come to death by a beginning of sin on the part of some one?" (Contra Iuvenum, Op. imperf. l. ii. c. 30)? It is evident from these passages (and see especially to the same effect, De Peccat. Mer. lib. i. c. xx. § 26; c. xxiv. § 34) that St. Augustine considered this sacrament to be generally necessary to the salvation of infants; but it is desirable to mention that some passages often cited from his works, which appear to imply or maintain that view are not really to the purpose. He argued against the Pelagians, that if infants were not born in sin, our Lord's words, "Except ye eat the flesh," &c. (St. John vi. 53), would not be true in reference to them: they would have life without eating of that flesh (see Contra Duas Epp. Pelag. lib. i. c. xxii. § 40); but then he taught also that "every one of the faithful is made a partaker of the body and blood of Christ, when he is made a member of Christ in baptism." This is carefully shown from his writings by Fulgentius, who had been questioned by Ferrandus, on the hope that might be entertained for a young man who had died immediately after baptism (see the note of the Benedictine editors on Aug. De Pecc. Mer. lib. i. c. 20, § 26). The same remark must be made on a saying of Innocent I., A.D. 417 (Ad Patres Syn. Milcr. § 5, Ep. 182, inter Epp. Aug.), which Augustine himself interprets of the necessity of Baptism (Ad Paulin. Ep. 185, c. viii. § 28). See also Gelasius of Rome, Epist. 7, ad Episc. per Picenum. Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495, gives the following direction with regard to the reception of some of those who had been baptized by heretics in schism. "But if they are infants (parvuli), or so dull as not to take in teaching, let those who offer them answer for them, after the manner of one about to be baptized; and so, fortified by the laying on of hands and chrism, let them be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist" (De Eccl. Dogm. c. 22). We call attention to the word "parvulus" when it is used in this connection, because "infans" was sometimes applied even to the newly-baptized adult, as being newly born to a higher life. In 585 the council of Mâcon, in France, in imitation, as we may suppose, of the Greek custom lately mentioned, ordered that on Wednesdays and Fridays innocent (children) should be brought to the church, and there "being commanded to fast, should receive the remains of the sacrifices" (can. 6). The council of Toledo, 675, found it necessary to reassure anxious minds by a declaration that the sick who found themselves unable to swallow the eucharist, and others who had failed to swallow it "in time of infancy," did not fall under the censure of the first council of Toledo (can. 14), against those who having received did not consume it (can. 11). The Gelasian Sacramentary (lib. i. n. 75) provides for the immediate communion of an infant (infans) baptized in sickness. The earliest extant copy of the Gregorian has the following rubric referring to all baptized at Easter. "If the bishop be present, it is fit that he (infans) be forthwith confirmed with chrism, and after that communicated. And if the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. ii. col. 158). It will be observed that previous confirmation was not an indispensable condition of the first communion. A MS. Sacramentary of the 8th century preserved at Gellone and a Rheims pontifical of the same age expressly contemplate the probability of some of the "infantes" baptized being nurslings, but make the same provision for the communion of all (Ordd. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 1, art. 18. Comp. ord. 15). The little children were also to communicate daily throughout the octave with the rest of the newly-baptized. See Ordd. 6, 8, 9.

There is an English canon ascribed to Egbert, A.D. 740, but probably somewhat later, which says, "They who can, and know how to baptize, faithful monks especially, ought always to have the eucharist with them, though they travel to places far distant" (Johnson's Engl. Canons, vol. i. p. 235). Jesse, bishop of Amiens, A.D. 799, in an epistle on the order of baptism, says, that "after trine immersion the bishop should confirm the child (puerum) with chrism on the forehead, and that finally he should be confirmed and communicated with the body and blood of Christ, that he may be a member of Christ" (see note to Regino De Eccl. Disipl. lib. i. c. 69; ed. Baluz.). The epistle of Jesse was written in reply to some questions of Charlemagne respecting baptism. In the Capitularies of the latter we find the following law notably framed in express accordance with the answers of Jesse and other bishops:—"That the presbyter have the eucharist ready, that when any one shall be taken sick, or an infant (parvulus) be ailing, he may communicate him at once, lest he die without communion" (Lib. i. c. 155; Sim. lib. v. c. 57). This is in the collection of Walter of Orleans (c. 7); Regino (u. s.); Burchard (lib. v. c. 10); and Ivo (Decr. P. ii. c. 20).

Infants were during a period of uncertain length required to be kept without food between their baptism and communion, when the latter followed as a part of the day's rites. Thus in the earliest Ordo Romanus, supposed by Usher to be written about the year 730, care is enjoined that the little ones (parvuli) baptized on Easter Eve "take no food, nor be suckled, after their baptism before they communicate of the sacrament of the body of Christ" (§ 46; Musæ. Ital. tom. i. p. 28). There are rubrics to this effect in several ancient orders of baptism, three or which were compiled or copied in the 8th century (Ordd. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, u. s. For later examples, see Ordd. 9, 15). In one copy of the Gregorian Sacramentary, the rule is thus relaxed. "They are not forbidden to be suckled before the sacred communion, if it be necessary" (Inter Opp. S. Greg. tom. v. col. 111; Antv. 1615). The prohibition seems to have been generally omitted from the rubric after the 8th century; but the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamia in Syria, which was written in the 12th, retains it, though speaking of confirmation and communion immediately after baptism only as "the custom of some churches" (Ord. 15; Martene, u. s.).

There can be no doubt that infants were at first communicated in both kinds; but there is little clear evidence to that effect. Passages which speak of their eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ are not conclusive. The council of Toledo before cited, after mentioning the occasional rejection of one element by the sick, "because except the draught of the Lord's cup, they could not swallow the eucharist delivered to them," proceeds to the case of others "who do such things in the time of infancy." The inference appears good that the eucharist was offered to both in bread as well as wine. We are however in a good measure left to infer the practice of the first ages from that of the later church. Because the cup only is mentioned in St. Cyprian's story of the infant who had partaken of a heathen sacrifice, some have argued that they were communicated in the blood only. Had it been so, they would hardly have been permitted to receive in both kinds at a later period; as they certainly did, when for a time the custom of intinction prevailed in the West. Even in the 12th century, when Paschal II. suppressed that practice at Clugny, he made an exception in favour of "infants and persons very sick who are not able to swallow the bread." All others were to receive the bread by itself (Epist. 32; Labb. Concilia, tom. x. col. 656). In a manuscript Antiphonary that belonged to an Italian monastery, written about the middle of the same century, after directions for a baptism, is the following rubric: "Then follows the communion, which is ministered under these words; 'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ steeped in His blood, preserve thy soul unto everlasting life'" (Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medææ, tom. iv. p. 843). About the same time, however, we find Radulphus Ardens saying, in a sermon on Easter Day, "It has been decreed that it be delivered to children as soon as baptized, at least in the species of wine; that they may not depart without a necessary sacrament" (Zaccaria, Biblioth. Rit. tom. ii. p. ii. p. clx.). How infants were communicated in the one species then, we may learn from the pontifical of Apamia already cited. "But children who as yet know not how to eat or drink are communicated either with a leaf or with the finger dipped in the blood of the Lord and put into their mouth, the priest thus saying, 'The body with the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee unto everlasting life'" (Martene, u. s.). Robertus Panchus, A.D. 1175, in a work De Sacramentis, long ascribed to Hugo de S. Victore, says, "The said sacrament is to be ministered with the finger of the priest to children newly born in the species of the blood; because such can suck naturally" (Lib. i. c. 20).

As the Greeks and Orientals generally used intinction before the age of Charlemagne, it is to be presumed that they communicated infants in the same manner as adults; i. e., in both kinds with a spoon. Now "in practice, though the rule is otherwise, the eucharist is given to infants under the species of wine alone" (Goor in Annot. Nihusii ad Allatii Dissert. de Missâ Præsanct. ad fin.; Allat. De Oec. et Or. Consent. col. 1659). The Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians and Maronites, are said to have fallen into the same practice (Gabriel Sinaita, ibid. col. 1667). The Greeks use a spoon, but from conflicting statements before us (see Martene, u. s. art. 15, n. 15), we infer that the rest use the finger or a spoon indifferently. [W. E. S.]

INFIRMARY (MONASTIC). In his enumeration of Christian duties Benedict specifies that of visiting the sick (Bened. Reg. c. 4); and elsewhere he speaks of it as a duty of primary and paramount obligation for monks ("ante omnia et super omnia," c. 36), quoting the words of Christ, "I was sick, and ye ministered unto Me." Beyond, however, saying, that the sick are to have a separate part of the monastery assigned to them (cf. Aurel. Reg. c. 37, 52; Caesar. Reg. c. 30), and a separate officer in charge of them (cf. Reg. Tarnat. c. 21), that they are to be allowed meat and the luxury of baths, if necessary, that they are not to be exacting ("ne superfluitate suâ fratres contristent"), and that the brethren who wait on them are not to be impatient, he gives no precise directions (ib.). Subsequently it was the special duty of the "infirmarius," the "cellerarius" (house-steward), and of the abbot himself, to look after the sick (Martene, Reg. Comm. c. 4; Caesarii Reg. ad Virg. c. 20, Reg. Casusid. ad Virgines, c. 15); no other monk might visit them without leave from the abbot or prior (Mart. l. c.). Everything was to be done for their comfort, both in body and soul, that they should not miss the kindly offices of kinsfolk and friends (cf. Fructuos. Reg. c. 7; Hieronym. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.); and, while the rigour of the monastic discipline was to be relaxed, whenever necessary, in their favour, due supervision was to be exercised, lest there should be any abuse of the privileges of the sick-room (Mart. l. c.; cf. Reg. Pachem. c. 20). The "infirmarius" was to enforce silence at meals, to check conversation in the sick-room ("mansio infirmorum, intra claustra," Com. Aquisgran. A.D. 816, c. 142) at other times, and to discriminate carefully between real and fictitious ailments (Mart. l. c.). The sick were, if possible, to recite the hours daily and to attend mass at stated times, and if unable to walk to the chapel, they were to be carried thither in the arms of their brethren (ib.). The meal in the sick-room was to be three hours earlier than in the common refectory (Reg. Mag. c. 28). The abbot might allow a separate kitchen and "buttery" for the use of the sick monks (Aurelian. Reg. ad Monach. c. 53, Reg. ad Virg. c. 37). The rule of Caesarius of Arles ordered, that the abbot was to provide good wine for the sick, the ordinary wine of the monastery being often of inferior quality (cf. Mabill. Disquis. de Cass. Glosse, vi. 70, 71; Mabill. Ann. in. 8, Par. Congr. Glosse, lxxv. lxxvi.). [L. G. S.]

INFORMERS. (Calumniatores, Delatores. Tertullian [adv. Marcion. v. 18] fancifully connects "diabolus" with "delatura.") This class of men originated before the Christian era, and indeed before the establishment of the Roman empire. [DICT. OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s. v. Delator.] When persecution arose against the church, the delatores naturally sought gain, and probably some credit with the civil authorities, by giving information against those who practised Christian rites, since the secret assemblies of Christians for worship came under the prohibition of the Lex Julia de Majestate (Tac. Ann. i. 72, p. 3; Merivale, Hist. Rome, c. xlv.). Tertullian states that Tiberius threatened the accusers of the Christians—"Caesar . . . comminatus periculum accusatoribus Christianorum" (Apol. c. 5), but the story rests only upon his statement. He also (l. c.) claims M. Aurelius as a protector of Christians. Titus issued an edict against delators, forbidding slaves to inform against their masters or freedmen against their patrons. Nerva on his accession republished this edict. "Jewish manners," i. e. probably Christianity, is specially mentioned as one of the subjects on which informations were forbidden (Dion lxxviii. 1, quoted by Merivale). In Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (x. 96 [al. 97]) we find the delatores in full work. The Christians who were brought before him were delated (deferebantur), and an anonymous paper was sent in containing a list of many Christians or supposed Christians. Trajan in his answer (ib. 97 [98]), though he forbade Christians to be sought out (i. e. by government officials), did not attempt to put a stop to the practice of delation; those who were informed against, if they continued in their infatuation, must be punished. See Tertullian's comment on this (Apol. c. 2). And in the subsequent persecutions a large part of the suffering arose from unfaithful brethren who betrayed their friends to the persecutors. It is not wonderful that during and immediately after the days of persecution the delator was regarded with horror. Thus the council of Elvira (Conc. Eliv. c. 73), A.D. 305, excommunicated, even on his death-bed,^a any delator who had caused the proscription or death of the person informed against; for informing in less important cases, the delator might be re-admitted to communion after five years; or, if a catechumen, he might be admitted to baptism after five years. The first of Arles, A.D. 314, reckons among "traditores" not only those who gave up to the persecutors the Holy Scriptures and sacred vessels, but also those who handed in lists of the brethren (nomen fratrum); and respecting these the council decrees, that whoever shall be discovered from the public records (acta) to have committed such offences shall be solemnly^b degraded from the clerical order; but such degradation, if the offender was a bishop, was not to vitiate the orders of those who might have been ordained by him. Charges against traditores were not to be admitted unless they could be proved from the "acta publica." This decree is highly interesting, as following immediately upon a period of persecution, and showing that the edict of Milan (A.D. 313) had brought about a great change in Gaul, and that Christians were admitted to consult the public records of the recent proceedings against them. The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. c. 317, in Baluze, i. 977) cite the 73rd canon of Elvira with the reading "nec in fine." So lib. vii. c. 205, and Additio Quarta, c. 34, in Baluze, i. 1068, 1202. The same capitularies (Add. Quarta, c. 35) enjoin bishops to excommunicate "accusatores fratrum;" and, even after amendment, not to admit them to holy orders, though they may be admitted to communion. Any cleric or layman who brings frivolous charges against his bishop (calumniator extiterit) is to be reputed a homicide.

The canon of Elvira is cited in the decree of Gratian (p. ii. cau. v. quae. 6, c. 6) with the reading "non nisi in fine." The same decree (u. s. c. 5) attributes to pope Hadrian I. a decree, "let the tongue of a delator be cut out (capuletur), or, on conviction, let his head be cut off;" a decree probably taken from the civil legislation, for nearly the same provision is found in the Theodosian code (lib. x. tit. x. l. 2), and precisely the same in the Frank capitularies (lib. vii. c. 360; Bal. i. 1102). INFULA. 1. The infula was in classical times the band or fillet which bound the brow of the sacrificing priest and the victim.

Virg. Aen. ii. 430.

Servius (on Aeneid. x. 538) tells us that it was a broad fillet or ribbon, commonly made of red and white strips. Isidore (Etymol. xix. 30) describes the infula of the heathen priest in similar terms. The infula of the victim is mentioned in

"stans hostia ad aram

Lanea dum niveâ circumdatur infula vittâ."

Virg. Georg. iii. 487.

And the term seems to have been early transferred to the head-covering of Christian priests. Hence Prudentius (Peristeph. iv. 79) speaks of the "sacerdotum domus infulata" of the Valerii of Saragossa, when he is evidently speaking of the "clerus." So Pope Gelasius (Hardouin's Concilia, ii. 901), wishing to say that a certain person ought to be rejected from the Christian priesthood, says that he is "clericalibus infulis reprobabilis" (Hefele's Beiträge, ii. 223 ff.). See MITRE.

2. For infula in the sense of a ministerial vestment, see CASULA, PLANETA. [C.]

INITIAL HYMN.—A name for the hymn which in the Eastern liturgies corresponds to the

^a According to the reading "Nec in fine;" some MSS. read "non nisi in fine." It seems probable that "nec in fine" or "finem" was the original reading, and that it was altered to bring it into accordance with the decree of Nicea (c. 13), which provides that the Holy Communion is in no case to be refused to a dying man.

^b "Non verbis nudis;" another reading is "verberibus multis."

Introit of the Roman mass. In the eastern liturgies the term Introit (εἰσοδος) is applied to the two ENTRANCES of the liturgy, the little entrance (ἡ μικρὰ εἰσοδος) i. e. that of the Book of the Gospels, and the great entrance (ἡ μεγάλη εἰσοδος) i. e. that of the elements.

In the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom this hymn takes the form of three antiphons, called the first, second, and third antiphons, each of which consists of a few verses called "stichi" (στίχοι) from the Psalms; each verse of the first antiphon being followed by the clause "At the intercession of the Theotocos, save us, O Saviour;" each verse of the second and third by an antiphonal clause of the same nature, varying with and having reference to the festival. That of the third antiphon is sometimes one of the troparia of the day. Each antiphon is followed by an unvarying prayer, called generally the prayer of the first, second, and third antiphon,* and which are the same in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.^b

The first and second antiphons are followed by "Glory &c. (δόξα καὶ νῦν), after which the antiphonal response is repeated.

The third antiphon by short hymns or troparia in rhythmical prose under different names, and which vary with the day. These antiphons are considered to symbolise the predictions of the prophets, foretelling the coming and incarnation of our Lord.^c As a specimen the three antiphons for Easter Day are:—

Antiph. I.

- Stich.* O be joyful in God all ye lands. (Ps. lxi. 1.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* Sing praises unto the honour of His name. (Do.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* Say unto God, O how wonderful art Thou in Thy works. (verse 2.)
At the intercession, &c.
- Stich.* For all the world shall worship Thee. (verse 3.)
At the intercession, &c.
Glory, &c.
At the intercession, &c.

Antiph. II.

- Stich.* God be merciful unto us. (Ps. lxvii. 1.)
Save us, O Son of God, Thou that art risen from the dead.
- Stich.* And show us the light of His countenance. (Do.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
- Stich.* That Thy way may be known upon earth. (v. 2.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
- Stich.* Let the people praise Thee. (v. 3.)
Save us, O Son of God, &c.
Glory, &c.
Save us, O Son of God, &c.

Antiph. III.

- Stich.* Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered let them also that hate Him flee before Him.
(Ps. lxviii. 1.)
- Christ is risen from the dead, having trodden down death by death, and given life to those that are in the grave.

* There are variations between the two liturgies, as to whether the prayer of the antiphon should be said before or after its antiphon, which it is unnecessary to particularise.

^b The prayer of the third antiphon is "A Prayer of St. Chrysostom" of the English Prayer-book.

^c Vid. Cassi de Vet. Sacri. Christi. Rit. cap. xvi.

Stich. Like as the smoke vanisheth so shalt thou drive them away: and like as wax melteth at the fire. (v. 2.)

Christ is risen, &c.

Stich. So let the ungodly perish at the presence of God, but let the righteous be glad. (vv. 2, 3.)

Christ is risen, &c.

Stich. This is the day which the Lord hath made: we will rejoice and be glad in it. (Ps. cxviii. 24.)

Christ is risen, &c.

On Sundays as a rule, in the liturgy of St. Basil the Typica^d for the day are said instead of the first two antiphons; and in those of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom instead of the third antiphon, the Beatitudes (οἱ μακαρισμοί).

These are the Beatitudes from the Sermon on the Mount, and are thus said. They are introduced by the clause "Remember us, O Lord, when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom." The first five Beatitudes are then said consecutively; after the fifth and each following one is interposed a short troparion, differing in each case, and all varying with the day. After the sixth of these follows "Glory, &c." and then two more troparia, the latter of which is a Theoticon.^e

In the liturgies of St. James and St. Mark the initial hymn is the same, and unvarying. It is of the ordinary form of Greek hymns, beginning "Only begotten Son and Word of God," &c., and containing prayers for salvation through the mysteries of the incarnation, which it recites. [See ANTIPHON].

INNOCENTS, FESTIVAL OF THE. (ἡμέρα τῶν ἁγίων ἰδ' χιλιάδων νηπιῶν; festum Innocentium [ann], Natiles Sanctorum Innocentium, Natide Infantum, Necatio [Allisio] Infantum. The old English Childermas and the German Kindermesse may also be noted.)

1. History of festival.—The Holy Innocents of Bethlehem, the victims of Herod's jealousy of our Lord, are at an early period commemorated as martyrs for Christ, of whom indeed they were in one sense the first (see Irenaeus adv. Haer. iii. 16. 4; Cyprian, Epist. 56, p' d' Thibauri consistenti, § 6). Subsequent fathers continually speak in the same strain, e.g. Gregory of Nazianzum (Serm. 38 in Nativitate, § 18; vol. i. 674, ed. Bened.); Chrysostom (Hom. 9 in S. Matt. vol. vii. 130, ed. Montfaucon); Augustine (Interpretatio in Psal. 47; vol. iv. 593, ed. Gaume; Serm. 199 in Epiphania, § 2, vol. v. 1319; Serm. 373 in Epiph. § 3, vol. v. 2178; Serm. 375 in Epiph. § 2, vol. v. 2183); Prudentius (Cath. vii. de Epiph. 125). Augustine also distinctly refers (de Civ. Dei iii. 68, vol. i. 1035) to a commemoration of their martyrdom by the church. Some writers, as Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 304), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirchen, v. 1. 549) and others, refer to a homily of Origen as affording evidence on this last point. The writing in question, however (Hom. 3 de diversis, vol. ii. p. 282; ed. Paris, 1604), is universally rejected as spurious, and Huet sums up concerning it (Origenis Opp. vol. iv. 325, ed. De la Rue) that it is a work originally written in Latin, and later than the time of Jerome.

^d These terms will be explained in their place.

The commemoration of the Massacre of the Innocents was at first combined with the festival of the Epiphany. Thus the passage of Prudentius above referred to speaks of them in the hymn on the Epiphany; Leo, in not a few of his homilies on the Epiphany, speaks of the Innocents (see e.g. Sermm. 31-33, 35, 38; Patrol. liv. 234 sqq.), as also Fulgentius of Ruspe in a homily de Epiphania, deque Innocentum nece et mactationibus mayorum (Patrol. lxxv. 732). Subsequently a special day was set apart for the festival of the Innocents, a day in close proximity to that on which the Lord's Nativity is celebrated being chosen; not that we have any definite knowledge as to the time when Herod put the children to death, but from the special association between the two events. Hence we find December 28 in the Western and December 29 in the Eastern church set apart for the commemoration of the Innocents. The date of the origin of the separate festival cannot be very closely defined. It is however mentioned in the Calendarium Carthaginense, to whose date we can approximate from the fact that the latest martyrs commemorated are those who perished in the Vandal persecution under Hunneric, 484 A.D. Here the notice is, "V. Kal. Ian. Sanctorum Innocentum, quos Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). It may be added that Peter Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna (ob. 450 A.D.), has left among his sermons, two de Infantum nece, quite apart from several others on the Epiphany (Sermm. 152, 153; Patrol. lii. 604). It is needless to give here a list of later calendars and martyrologies, in which the festival of the Innocents uniformly occurs, but it may be noted that it subsequently acquired a considerable degree of importance, for in the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz (ob. 766 A.D.), the "festivitas Infantum" is included among the "solemnitates praeceptuae" (Reg. Chrodeg. c. 74; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1009).

2. Liturgical notices.—The earliest of the Roman Sacramentaries, the Leonine, contains two masses for the festival of the Innocents, which follow immediately after that for St. John the Evangelist, and are headed In Natali Innocentum (Leonis Opp. vol. ii. 155, ed. Ballerini). We may call attention to the curious reference in the Preface of the second mass to the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxxi. 15), "Rachel plorans filios suos, noluit consolari, quia non sunt," where the mother's grief is explained as arising not from the death of her children, but because infants held worthy of receiving so great a renown were born not from her line, but from that of Leah. Elements from the Leonine Sacramentary are found embodied in the service for the day in the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1060) and Gregorian Sacramentaries (col. 12, ed. Menard), in the latter case including a slightly modified form of the Preface,^a which also appears in the service for the day in the Ambrosian liturgy (Pamelius, Liturgg. Latt. i. 308). In the ancient Roman church a special degree of mournfulness was associated with this day, for we find in the Gregorian Liber Antiphonarius (col. 659, ed. Menard) the notice that the Gloria in Excelsis and Alleluia are not sung, "sed quasi prae tristitia dies illa deducitur." Of this we may derive an illustration, though of much later date, from the Ordo Romanus (x. 26), which remarks that on this day, except it fell on a Sunday, the Romans abstain from flesh and fat. See also Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. i. 41; Patrol. cv. 1074), and the Micrologus (de Eccl. obs. c. 36; Patrol. cli. 1005), which mentions the further omission on this day of the Te Deum and Ite, missa est. He subjoins as a reason for the sadness attaching to this day, that the Innocents, though martyrs for Christ, "non dum tamen ad gloriam, sed ad infernalem poenam discesserunt."

In the ancient lectionary of the Gallican church, the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel were respectively Jer. xxxi. 15-20, Rev. vi. 9-11, Matt. ii. 1-23 (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 112; see also the service in the Gothic-gallic missal, lib. iii. p. 198). In the Mozarabic liturgy, however, they are respectively Jer. xxxi. 15-20, 2 Cor. i. 2-7, Matt. xviii. 13-15, 1-6, 10, 11 (Missale Mixtum S. Isidori, p. 48, ed. Leslie).

The Micrologus (supra) refers to the octave of the festival of the Innocents as generally observed ("eodem modo ut aliorum Sanctorum celebratur"). It would seem, however, that this is of comparatively late date as a matter of general observance, for according to Binterim (Denkw. v. 1. 552), it is wanting in many calendars of the 9th century. A curious mistake must be mentioned here into which several have fallen in connection with the octave of the festival of the Innocents. In the Indiculus operum S. Augustini by Possidius, is an entry "de die octavarum Infantum; duo" (Patrol. xlii. 16). This has been taken by Baronius (Martyrologium Romanum, Dec. 28 and Jan. 4, not.) and others as showing the existence of an octave of the festival of the Innocents in Augustine's time. The two sermons, however, of Augustine refer to the first Sunday after Easter, the octave of the day on which the sacrament of baptism had been received, "hodie octavae dicuntur infantum, revelanda sunt capita eorum" (Sermm. 260, 376; Patrol. xxxviii. 1201, 1669).

Attention has already been called to the proximity of the festival of the Innocents to that of the Nativity, in consequence of the association of the two events commemorated. These two indeed, with the commemorations on the two intervening days of Stephen the protomartyr and John the disciple whom Jesus loved, may be supposed to form one combined festival, all centering in the idea of the Incarnation. Thus we have a homily of Bernard of Clairvaux de Quatuor continuis solemnitatibus, scilicet Nativitatis Domini ac Sanctorum Stephani, Johannis et Innocentium (Patrol. clxxxiii. 129).

The day for the commemoration of the Innocents in the Eastern church is December 29, but we find in the Armeno-Gregorian calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 799) June 10 associated with them: this same calendar being one of those which gives from what original cause does not appear, the amazing number of 14,000 for the infants slain. This is also the case with the pictorial Moscow calendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. lxxii.).^b Numerous Eastern calendars, however, do not contain this absurd addition (see e.g. Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 16; Selden, de Synedriis veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 214, 231, ed. Amsterdam, 1679).

For further details on the subject of the festival of the Innocents, reference may be made to Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, v. 1. 549; Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 304 sqq.; Assemani, Kalendarium Ecclesiae Universae, v. 519. INSACRATI. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS, § 1.]

INSCRIPTIONS. In strictness of speech every inscribed monument falls under this category, unless the writing be upon skin or upon paper; and accordingly the great collections of Greek and Latin inscriptions recently published at Berlin include every kind of monument which is inscribed, coins only excepted. These are somewhat arbitrarily but at the same time profitably excluded, as belonging to a special department of study. But in common parlance, by Inscriptions, the larger monuments in stone are intended, and in the following article comparatively little notice will be taken of any others.

In treating of this vast subject it is proposed to take into account—(1) The literature of the subject, which is indeed the only division which can be treated at all comprehensively in an article like the present. (2) Technical execution. (3) Symbols. (4) A selection of inscriptions, with notes on some matters arising out of them. (5) Their language and style. (6) The modes of dating them. (7) An enumeration of the abbreviations which occur on them.

(1.) Literature of the Subject.—This matter is ably treated of by M. De Rossi in the first thirty-six pages of his preface to the *Inscriptiones Christianae Urbis Romae Septimo Saeculo Antiquiores (Rome, 1857–1861 fol.). The principal facts are as follows. The earliest collections of Christian inscriptions of which we have any knowledge belong to the age of Charles the Great, and were made, as De Rossi thinks, by scholars of Alcuin. The most ancient of these is contained in an Einsiedeln MS. written in the age of Alcuin: about a third of the whole collection is Christian, sepulchral examples however being wholly wanting. Various compilations of inscriptions were also now made, in which many of the epitaphs written by pope Damasus, among other Christian authors, were included; and the small remaining stone fragments of some of these can be completed with certainty by their aid. The collectors of these inscriptions cared little for their historical value, and commonly omitted all mention of their age or authors; they rather designed them to be models, after which similar verses might be composed. The others now remaining in whole or in great part are—(1) The Palatine MS. of the 11th century (now in the Vatican), edited by Gruter, Thes. Inscr., pp. MCLXIII.—MCLXXVII., who has omitted a few profane epigrams, which are interspersed. None of the Christian inscriptions seem to be later than the 9th century, and they were probably collected by some one who visited Rome and various other places in Italy about the close of that century. (2) A MS. of Kloster Neuburg, about the 11th century, consisting of Christian inscriptions exclusively, which were copied from Italian originals about the 8th century; they are almost all historical, many being by Damasus. (3) A Verdun MS. of the 10th century, containing thirty-one Roman inscriptions; a collection independent of either of the preceding, made in the 8th or 9th century.

^b A still wilder estimate, however, is found in an Auctarium to the martyrology of Usuardus, which fixes the number at 144,000 (Patrol. cxxiii. 848), probably with reference to Rev. vii. 4.

* Le Blant's catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy, published at the end of his Manuel, is a useful supplement to this, and brings the bibliography down to 1869. De Rossi is less careful to notice printed books than MS. collections, as being better known. After the publication of Martigny's papers by Mai in 1801 he ceased altogether.

"Hae tres antiquissimae syllogae omnes trans Alpes servatae nobis sunt; neque quidquam his simile in Italiae nostrae bibliothecis uspiam inveni Primi ergo veterum inscriptionum amatores transalpini omnes fuisse Ab Alcuiniana aetate ad saeculum usque decimum quartum antiquis inscriptionibus colligendis nemo videtur operam navasse" (De Rossi, u. s. pp. x.* xi.*).

The 15th century saw the revival of epigraphic studies, but among the inscriptions collected by Poggio, Signorili, Cyriaco, Feliciani, Marcanova, Pehem, Schedel, and others, those which are Christian "apparent raree," and are not separately classed. The earliest collector of purely Christian inscriptions, who lived in the age of the Renaissance, is Pietro Sabini, who in 1495 presented his work, in MS., comprising those which he had copied in Rome and out of it, both from the originals and from MSS., to Charles VIII., king of France. The MS. has been found in the library of St. Mark at Venice by De Rossi, who affirms that some of the inscriptions are very valuable, and have been copied by no other scholar; many however belong to a late period. A volume of inscriptions from the ancient churches of Rome, made by Giovanni Capoti in 1498, seems to have been of much the same character. The other collectors of inscriptions who lived from this time to the middle of the 16th, added scarcely anything (vix mediocre incrementum) to Christian epigraphy. Aldus Manutius the Younger however applied himself diligently to the collection of Christian inscriptions among others, and twenty volumes of these formed by various members of this illustrious family are preserved in the Vatican, from which De Rossi has derived no small profit. The most important of these was compiled in 1566 and 1567, and is entirely filled with inscriptions contained in Christian churches. The whole number of Christian inscriptions hitherto collected from all parts, from the 8th to the middle of the 16th century, excluding those of very recent date, is considerably less than a thousand; a great many of these being contained in MS. only.^b At present more than 11,000 Christian inscriptions earlier than the 7th century are known to have been found in Rome alone. With the exception of a few epitaphs by Damasus copied in tombs of the martyrs by the scholars of Alcuin, no subterranean inscription had hitherto been deciphered. But the discovery of the catacombs of Rome in 1578 marks a new era in the study. Ciaccone, L'Heureux or Macarius, Winghius, Ugone, and somewhat later in time, but first and foremost in diligence and success, Antonio Bosio, were among the earliest explorers, and all were more or less addicted to the study of Christian inscriptions. Soon after this time the Christian inscriptions occupy a distinct place in Gruter's Corpus Inscriptionum, published in 1616; but besides the Palatine Collection mentioned above, all the others together reach only about 150, although many more had been now copied in Rome by several of his friends. There can be no doubt that Gruter cared comparatively little about this class of inscriptions. The extensive and accurate transcripts of Bosio were transferred, after his death in 1629, to Severani, who published the Roma Sotteranea in 1632; which was republished in an enlarged Latin form by Aringhi, in two folio volumes, in 1650.^c During the half century that followed the publication of Gruter's great work, many scholars collected additional Christian inscriptions, some of the most important of which are still in MS. Especially to be named are those of J. B. Doni (died 1647), preserved in the Marucelli Library at Florence, "codex inter primaria operis mei subsidia numerandus" (De Rossi); of Sirmond (died 1651), in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (very valuable, containing many still unpublished), and of Peirese (died 1637), whose Inscriptiones Christianae et novae were consulted at Paris by De Rossi, who speaks of their value, more especially for the inscriptions of Gaul. To these should be added the collections of F. Ptolomeo (made about 1666), preserved in the public library of Sienna, of which Muratori made much use, and those of Brutio, in seventeen volumes, finished in 1679, preserved in the Vatican, whose value is scarcely proportional to their bulk. Between Aringhi (1650) and Fabretti, whose folio volume on inscriptions appeared in 1702, Montfaucon alone (so thinks De Rossi) can be regarded as having materially added to the knowledge of Christian epigraphy; his MSS. were examined at Paris by De Rossi, who thence derived some valuable additions to his Roman inscriptions. It deserves however to be recorded that William Fleetwood, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, afterwards bishop of Ely, published in 1691 an Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge (Lond. 8vo), in two parts; the second part, "Christiana monumenta antiqua quae hactenus innotuerunt omnia complectitur:" these occupy nearly two hundred pages, and are occasionally accompanied by brief notes.^d Zaccaria several times notices this work controversially or otherwise (Diss. de Vet. Inscr. usu, pp. 326, 327, 370, 382, 384, 388, 399), and it is frequently quoted by other epigraphists as by Marini, Le Blant, and De Rossi himself, though he has not named it in his introduction. Fabretti's labours are both skilful and accurate; but the types which the printer made use of were inadequate to express the true reading of his inscriptions. Boldetti and Marangoni, who laboured in concert in the same field as Bosio had done, "are

^c Dr. McCaul (Christian Epitaphs, pref. p. iv, note) observes that these volumes "have a reputation far beyond their merits." There is no doubt, he adds, that some forger of inscriptions imposed both on Severani and Aringhi. De Rossi promises a detailed account of this matter, p. xxvi*.

^d We can not less afford to pass it over, though it appears to be little else but a compilation from other authors, as it is almost the only work on Christian epigraphy expressly devoted to the subject, that has appeared in this country till quite lately.

^b The Edinburgh Review for 1864, p. 221, goes so far as to say that "the results of the whole epoch (of the revival of letters) may be summed up in the single statement, that more than a century had elapsed after the discovery of printing before a single inscription of the early Christian centuries had been given to the world."

made especially memorable by one of those catastrophes, which occasionally diversify the monotonous history of student life. They had spent more than thirty years in the exploration of the catacombs and other sacred antiquities of Rome. Boldetti's volume, published in 1720 at Rome [intituled Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri de' Santi Martiri], comprised a portion of the results; but by far the greater part still remained in MS., when in 1737 an unlucky fire destroyed in a few hours the fruit of all these years of toilsome research. The loss, it is melancholy to add, was complete and irreparable. Boldetti's great age precluded all hopes of his being able to repair his portion of the work. Marangoni although grievously depressed resumed his labours with great energy; but M. De Rossi has everywhere sought in vain for the results of his attempted restoration" (Edinburgh Rev. u. s. p. 222). The destruction of these papers has left a void which can hardly be supplied; the chambers which they explored are now "demolita et horrendum in modum vastata" (De Rossi). Boldetti indeed and those whom he employed to copy the inscriptions have been proved to be very inaccurate both as regards the sites of their discovery and the reading of the texts;^e "ei me iratissimum esse profiteor," says De Rossi (p. xxvii.*). Marangoni was much more exact, and his Appendix ad Acta S. Victorini, Rom. 1740, 4^o, is a work of considerable value. P. Lupi, a friend of these scholars, has left, besides various printed works relating to epigraphy, a valuable collection of inscriptions preserved in MS. in the Vatican at Rome; and a similar collection by the celebrated Buonarrotti is preserved at Florence.

It became evident that the time had now arrived when a fresh collection of Christian inscriptions should incorporate the previous discoveries of so many scholars. The industrious Gori projected such a work, in which they should be so arranged as to illustrate the doctrines, the ceremonies, the hierarchy and the discipline of the church. But his other engagements prevented. The MSS. however of his friends Stosch, Ficoroni and others, containing materials for the work, are stored up in the Marucelli Library at Florence, where they were consulted with profit by De Rossi. The task was in some measure executed by the indefatigable Muratori, whose Nodus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum published at Milan in 1739 in four folio volumes, contains, in addition to the profane inscriptions, a larger number of Christian ones than had ever yet appeared, being taken both from printed and from MS. sources: but the work was very uncritically executed, and his conjectural additions are not distinguished from the actual readings of the broken inscriptions. Maffei, who has been called the founder of lapidary criticism, had undertaken in conjunction with Séguier a great body of inscriptions, in which there should be a purely Christian division; but both these and various other scholars, who had cherished like good intentions, bore no fruit to perfection.

It now also again entered into the minds of more than one divine to turn the extant mass of Christian inscriptions to theological account; and with somewhat better success. The learned Jesuit A. F. Zaccaria contemplated a very extensive work, in which the more interesting Christian inscriptions should be arranged under the following heads: (i.) Religio in Deum; (ii.) Religio in Sanctos; (iii.) Tempia; (iv.) Templorum ornamenta, vasa sacra, idque genus caetera; (v.) Dies Festi; (vi.) Sacramenta; (vii.) Hierarchia ecclesiastica ac primo Romani Pontificis; (viii.) Episcopi; (ix.) Presbyteri; (x.) Ordines majores; (xi.) Ordines minores; (xii.) Monachi; (xiii.) Laici; (xiv.) Laici dignitate praestantes; (xv.) Artes atque officia minora; (xvi.) Leges ecclesiasticae (De Rossi, u. s. p. xxx.*). This magniloquent announcement however was never carried out; but a kind of first fruits were put forth in 1762 in a treatise entitled De veterum Christianorum in rebus theologicis usu.^f In this work he brings together with a considerable amount of industry and learning such inscriptions as bear or seem to bear upon the doctrines of his church; "quae non ultra septimum nostrae aerae saeculum progrediuntur, ne haereticis cavillandi detur occasio" (Thes. Theol. Diss. p. 325). Martigny however calls it "un livre mediocre," and speaks of his friend and imitator, Danzetta, as having written "avec moins de succès encore" (Ibid. p. 365). The bearing of inscriptions upon doctrinal or disciplinary controversy is "a perfectly legitimate use of the subject," and indeed its true ultimate end, but one for which from the insufficiency of the data the time had not [in the 18th century] fully arrived." (Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 224.) Nor can it be said to have fully arrived now. In a few years' time it will probably be otherwise.

Zaccaria in his later years encouraged a rising young scholar, Gaetano Marini, to undertake the task which he had found to be too much for himself. Marini set about the work with great spirit, and from 1765 to 1801 worked at it, not exclusively indeed, but yet so as never to allow his labours to be wholly intermitted. An ample account of his preparations and of the merits and defects of his performances is given by De Rossi (u. s. pp. xxxi.-xxxii.). By help of his friends in Italy and his own labour he had amassed about 8600 Christian inscriptions in Latin, and about 750 in Greek from all parts of the world, of the first ten centuries. But these were in a confused, imperfect and uncritical state. "Marini's labours were interrupted by the French Revolution; and at his death he bequeathed to the Vatican Library the materials which he had compiled, and which, having ^f Published in the Theologiae Dissertationum vol. i. pp. 325-396, Venet. 1762, 4^{to}; apparently for the first time (see Præfatio generalis). Le Bant in his Bibliographie gives 1761 as the date. It has been republished by Migne in his Curiosus Theolog. completus.

* It would seem from De Rossi's remarks (p. xxxi.*) that his Theologia Lapidaria exists only in MS. (in the Vatican). He gained from it a few unpublished inscriptions which Danzetta had taken from the papers of Marangoni.

^h For the ecclesiastical historian inscriptions of all periods will of course have their own value; and many of them yield up a great deal of information and furnish "illustrations of almost every branch of Christian literature, history and antiquities" (Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 231).

^e De Rossi (under his Inscr. Urb. Rom. n. 17, p. 24) calls him a man "cujus in id genus apographis excipiens imperitiam et incuriam non centena, sed milia exempla testantur."

recently been put in order by M. De Rossi are found to fill no fewer than 31 volumes. Among these, four volumes had been partially prepared for publication, of which the first was in a comparatively forward state. This is the Inscriptionum Christianarum pars prima, which is printed in the fifth volume of Mai's Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio, in 1831. And perhaps it may be said that it is to the incomplete and unsatisfactory condition of the remaining portion of Marini's papers that we are indebted for much of the far more critical and scholarly work of M. De Rossi, entitled Inscriptiones Urbis Romæ Septimo Saeculo antiquiores (Rom. 1857-61, fol. pp. 619+123 prol. +40 praef.) This publication was undertaken at the express solicitation of Cardinal Mai, who finding the task of preparing for the press the rest of Marini's materials entirely incompatible with his other engagements, transferred to his young and learned friend the undertaking for which his tastes, his studies, and his genuine love of the subject pointed him out to Mai as eminently fitted." (Edinburgh Rev. u. s. pp. 224, 225, slightly altered.) The first volume of this great work, the only one known to the writer, and perhaps the only one yet published, contains those Roman inscriptions only whose precise or approximate date is positively known.¹ The number of these is 1126; among which we have one belonging to the first century, two to the beginning of the second (all very brief and unimportant), and twenty-three to the third; the fourth and fifth centuries have between four and five hundred each, and the sixth century a little more than two hundred. Fragments and additional inscriptions contained in the appendices bring the number up to 1374.

The second part of his work is intended to include select inscriptions interesting for their theological and historical worth; and in the last place he will include all the remaining inscriptions arranged according to the localities where they were found; and also the Jewish inscription found in Rome.²

We can afford no more space to notice this masterly performance, which every one who desires to become acquainted with Christian inscriptions must necessarily study; an interesting account of it, and also of the work following will be found in the Edinburgh Review for July, 1864.

The impulse given to Christian epigraphy by De Rossi's great work, and by his other works of smaller dimensions³ has been manifested by the publication of other books relating to the subject, among which those which comprise the Christian inscriptions en masse of particular countries hold the first rank. And among these we must place at the head the Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule antérieures au VIII^{me}. Siècle, edited and annotated by M. Edmond Le Blant, in 2 vols 4to., Paris, 1856, and 1865, comprising 708 inscriptions, nearly all Latin, but a few Greek, and a few also written in Runes.^m The earliest dated inscription belongs to the year 334, and the latest to 695; but only four of these are as early as the 4th century. Of the rest that are dated about 50 belong to the 5th century, nearly 100 to the 6th, and 13 to the 7th century. A few which are undated are certainly before the age of Constantine (Manuel, p. 124).

² Under each inscription mention is made of the place where it was found, where it has been edited, if at all, or from what MSS. it has been copied by the editor, if he have not himself transcribed it. Plates are in most cases added. If the inscriptions were more frequently written out in common minuscules, besides being figured, they would be more easily read by the non-antiquarian scholar or student.

The same learned author has likewise more recently, in 1869, written a Manuel d'Épigraphie Chrétienne d'après les marbres de la Gaule, accompagnée d'une bibliographie spéciale, i.e., a catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy generally, Paris, sm. 8vo. pp. 267. Although this valuableⁿ work refers more especially to Gaulish inscriptions, there is a great deal about others also; in particular his enumeration of formulae (Greek and Latin) which occur in different parts of the Christian world, in Europe, Asia and Africa, where different provinces have their own styles of epigraphy, is peculiarly instructive (pp. 76-81), and a translation will be found below. The Christian inscriptions of Spain have very recently been edited by one of the most eminent living epigraphists, Prof. E. Hübner, of Berlin. His Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae was published at Berlin in 1871, and includes 209 inscriptions, besides 89 others of the medieval period comprised in the appendix. Of the earlier ones two or three only can be referred to the 4th century; the others are of the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th centuries; about half of them are dated, the earliest being of the year 465, and the latest being 782. Nearly all are in Latin; a very few only in Greek. A splendid publication commenced in 1870, entitled Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language, chiefly collected and drawn by G. Petrie, LL.D., edited by M. Stokes, Dublin, printed at the University, 4to. Four parts have now (1874) been published. Those of Clonmacnois (above 100 in number) range from valuable information for inscriptions among other antiquities. Other works of his (some unknown to the writer) on this subject are enumerated by Le Blant in his Bibliographie at the end of his Manuel d'Épigraphie.

^m Both this and Hübner's work (see below) give details for each inscription in the same exact and comprehensive manner as De Rossi, and are accompanied by numerous plates. M. Le Blant has subsequently obtained additional inscriptions from various parts of France and Switzerland, which will one day, he hopes, form a rich supplement to his former work (Manuel, p. 1).

ⁿ It is notwithstanding to be regretted that so useful a book was not put together with a little more fulness and precision: it is divided into nineteen chapters, but nothing is said either at the beginning of the work or at the head of each respecting the contents of the chapters; the list of books placed at the end of the volume scarcely satisfies the requirements of the bibliographer, as it almost invariably omits the Christian name or initials of the authors mentioned, and the number of volumes in each work. At the same time it will be found very helpful without being by any means complete, particularly as regards English books.

the 7th to the 12th century in a regular series; and by their help it is hoped that a key to the approximate date of such works in other parts of the country as well as in other parts of the British Islands may be obtained. They occupy the first part of the work. All the above works are beautifully illustrated with figures. There are also other recent books which deal with the Christian inscriptions of particular regions. Among them are to be named C. Gazzera, Delle iscrizioni cristiane antiche del Piemonte discorso, Torino, 1850, 4to. (also in Mem. Accad. di Torino, 1851); J. B. De Rossi, De Christianis titulis Carthaginiensibus (in Pitra's Spicil. Solesm. vol. 4); and (along with the Pagan inscriptions) L. Renier, Inscriptions Romaines de l'Algérie, Paris, 1858, fol.

The Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, whose publication is still going forward at Berlin, includes, with specified exceptions, all Latin inscriptions, both Pagan and Christian, which can be placed with certainty or reasonable probability before 600 A.D. (see pref. to vols. ii. and iii.). The Christian inscriptions are distinguished in the indices by a dagger prefixed.*

A great number of Welsh inscriptions, the earliest being probably about the 7th century, will be found in the numerous volumes of the Archæologia Cambrensis, 1846, sqq. 8vo., mostly described by the well-known palæographer Prof. Westwood. But a conspectus of the whole of the early Christian inscriptions of Great Britain and Ireland[†] will, it is to be hoped, in process of time be included in Messrs. A. W. Haddan and W. Stubbs' Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain, of which the first volume appeared at Oxford in 1869, 8vo., part of the second in 1871, and the third in 1873. The very scanty inscribed Christian remains of the Roman period will be found at vol. i. pp. 39, 40;[‡] vol. ii. p. xxii. (Addenda)

* It is astonishing how small a number of Latin Christian inscriptions (or, at any rate inscriptions known to be Christian) occur in some countries. In vol. iii. edited by Mommsen, which includes Egypt, Asia, Illyricum, and the provinces of European Greece, there are only about thirty inscriptions which can be counted upon as Christian out of 6574. Of these several were found together at a place in Dalmatia.

† The books where the inscriptions are described and figured are fully detailed under each inscription in the same complete manner as in De Rossi's, Le Blant's, and Hübner's works already mentioned. It is hardly necessary therefore to say much of any of them here; many of them are periodicals, others are monographs on particular classes of monuments, particularly Stuart's Sculptured Stones of Scotland (printed for the Spalding Club, Edinb. 1856-1867, 2 vols. fol.); G. Stephen's Old Northern Runic Monuments (London and Copenhagen, 2 vols. fol. 1866-1868); Munch's edition of the Chron. Manniæ (Christian. 1860). A great number also of topographical and archaeological works by Lysons, Hodgson, Nichols, C. Roach Smith, Horsley, Borlase, &c. are brought under contribution.

‡ The Lincoln inscription is considered by Hübner (Inscr. Brit. Lat. n. 191) to be of the 16th century. If so, perhaps the only Roman Christian inscription which deserves the name must be struck off. The chrisma, however, has been found on six or seven monuments of different kinds (without counting coins), once with the α and ω (Haddan and Stubbs, u.s.). The chrisma occurs also on a lamp in the Newcastle museum, published by Hübner (u.s. p. 240, n. 27), who likewise gives two rings with the Christian acclamation, "VIVAS IN DEO," found and p. 51. To these will perhaps be added a Roman inscription found at Sea-mills, near Bristol, in 1873, seen by the writer, but whether it be Christian or no "adhuc sub judice lis est."[§] The sepulchral Christian inscriptions in Celtic Britain, A.D. 450-700, mostly in Latin, but one or two in Welsh, vol. i. pp. 162-169; some few of the Latin inscriptions being accompanied by Ogham characters. The same class of inscriptions in Wales, A.D. 700-1100, vol. i. pp. 625-633 (Latin); the inscriptions of Scottish and English Cumbria (A.D. 450-900, vol. ii. pp. 51-56), some Latin, some (at Ruthwell near Dumfries, and at Bewcastle in Cumberland) Runic. The inscribed monuments (very few) in the Pictish and Scottish kingdoms (A.D. 400-900), partly Latin, partly in Runes and Oghams, are in vol. ii. pp. 125-132; those of the Isle of Man, nearly all Runes, of Norwegian origin (one may be Gaelic), and inscribed on crosses, whose date is not given, will be found in vol. ii. pp. 185-187. There still remain to follow the Saxon inscriptions of the period of the Heptarchy and the Monarchy.[§]

A work has yet to be mentioned, which is perhaps of greater importance to the student of Christian epigraphy than any which has been already named, De Rossi's only excepted; viz., the Christian inscriptions, which are contained in Böckh's Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum (vol. iv. fasc. 2, Berlin, 1859, fol., plates). They are collected and edited by Prof. A. Kirchhoff, the same great epigraphist who has just been occupied upon the Corpus Inscriptionum Atticarum. The Christian inscriptions begin at No. 8606 and terminate at No. 9893, besides a few in the Addenda; thus making a total of nearly 1300 inscriptions of all ages and in almost all parts of the Roman world, down to the fall of the in England (pp. 234, 235), as well as other rings which seem to be Christian. The Romano-Christian remains in Britain are so extremely rare that it seems to be worth while to make these slight additions to what will be found in Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs' work. Mr. Wright's statement (Celt. Roman and Saxon, p. 298) that "not a trace of Christianity is found among the innumerable religious and sepulchral monuments of the Roman period found in Britain," cannot be safely contradicted. The Westminster and Bristol monuments may possibly be exceptions. So much can hardly be said of one or two others which have been suspected to be Christian. See Dr. McCaul's remarks on the Chesterholm stone in the Canadian Journal for 1874.

¶ Until these appear, it may be useful to indicate some of the principal sources of information. In addition to the books already referred to, among which Professor G. Stephen's Runic Monuments is the principal, Pegge's Sylloge and Camden's Britannia, with the additions of Gibson and Gough, may be consulted. Among the periodicals, the Yorkshire Archaeological and Topographical Journal and the Proceedings of the West Riding of Yorkshire Geolog. and Polytechnic Society are more especially to be mentioned, where the Runic and other early inscriptions of Yorkshire are described by the Rev. D. Haigh and the Rev. J. Fowler. Professor Hübner informs the writer that he hopes his Inscriptiones Britannicæ Christianæ will appear in the course of 1875, which will be analogous in all respects to the Inscr. Hæp. Christ. It includes all Latin inscriptions down to about 500 p.c. "As there are in Wales some few in Oghams only, while the rest is in part bilingual, I do not," he says, "exclude those few merely Celtic ones."

Byzantine empire. To these are to be added about sixty already included in the earlier parts of the book, which are evidently of Christian times ("quos Christianae esse aetatis apparet"). They are divided into three classes, (1) Tituli operum publicorum et votivi, the first division of which is arranged chronologically, the second comprising those whose age is uncertain. Of the former division there are 175, but none is earlier than the 4th century, a copy of a letter of St. Athanasius, the only authority for the Greek text, being perhaps the earliest of all; there are only six or seven others which can be referred to the 4th century. The fifty-eight which follow these comprise all which are of the fifth and following centuries, several of them being in verse, to the death of Charlemagne, of which number about twelve belong to the age of Justinian (A.D. 527-565). The most important of these perhaps is a copy of the paschal canon of St. Hippolytus, which appears to have been engraved in the reign of Theodosius; most of the others are inscriptions on various kinds of buildings, such as churches, monasteries, hospitals, towers, and there are two or three which are invocations of the Virgin and the saints, or prayers for the welfare of the persons mentioned.

(2) The second class comprises 156 inscriptions on mosaics, fictile and other vessels, glass, lamps, triptychs or other wooden tablets, "et variae supellectilis sacrae et profanae, ponderum, sigillorum, annuletorum, gemmarum" (Nos. 8953-9109). About seventy of these are on seals (nearly all lead); a few are as early as the 7th and 8th centuries. Some of those however on gems and glass are much earlier, and some notice has been taken of these in the articles on those subjects in this Dictionary.

(3) The remaining class contains no less than 783 inscriptions, all sepulchral, and these are arranged by the regions in which they are found. Those which bear dates are comparatively very few. (a) Egypt, Nubia, and the rest of Africa (Nos. 9110-9137); (b) Syria (Nos. 9138-9154); (c) Asia Minor (Nos. 9155-9287); (d) Greece and Illyricum (Nos. 9288-9449, of which 114 are from Athens); (e) Sicily and Malta (Nos. 9450-9540); (f) Italy and Sardinia (Nos. 9541-9885); (g) Gaul and Germany (Nos. 9886-9893).

Various other Greek Christian inscriptions have been since published; in particular, it may be observed that a few have been found in Spain and Algeria, countries from which Kirchoff has not given a single example (Hübner, u. s. p. v. praef.; Rénier, u. s. pp. 255, 349).

From what has now been said, it must be apparent how utterly hopeless and impossible it is to give within the limits of an article in a dictionary a satisfactory account of this immensely numerous class of Christian antiquities. The most important aid which such an article can render must be to indicate the principal sources of information; and these, if De Rossi's labours are carried out, will be very largely increased in the course of a few years.

A little work however has been published at Toronto in 1869 by the Rev. John M'Caul, LL.D., in which a judicious selection of a hundred "Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries" (Greek and Latin from various parts of the world, especially from Rome) has been brought together and ably commented upon. They occupy sixty-eight pages, and an introduction relating to the language, names, and dates employed fill up twenty-eight more. Besides these we have a brief preface pointing out the necessity of caution in using uncritical books, like those of Aringhi and Boldetti, and giving amusing examples of forgeries of Christian inscriptions, which have deceived some learned writers even of the present century. To those who cannot give any great amount of attention to the subject, this little work may be heartily recommended, as it bears every mark of conscientious care and of strict honesty.

(ii.) Technical Execution and Materials employed.—The modes of writing employed have much the same variations as in all ages: the letters are most commonly engraved with a chisel below the surface of the stone, and then occasionally coloured (red) or gilded; sometimes the letters are scratched with the point of some instrument, a nail or the like (fig. 1); on some gems the letters are in relief (camei). More rarely the letters are drawn in paint (vermilion) (fig. 2) or in gold upon the flat surface of the marble, or cut in gold leaf (upon glass), or written in ink upon sepulchral tablets or vases, or in white

2. Letters (Latin words in Greek characters) painted in vermilion on the flat (not incised) surface of the marble; they are of mixed forms, uncial and minuscule. Leaves and points introduced capriciously. A.D. 269. (Rome. The famous epitaph of St. Severa.)

colour on frescoes, &c. In the catacombs the inscriptions were occasionally, by reason of the unhappiness of the times, smeared in charcoal, in hope that when persecution had passed away, they might be recorded in a more permanent form. Sometimes also old tombstones of the pagans were used over again, and the Christian inscriptions were written on their backs, or on their obliterated faces (fig. 5). Points are also frequently found, sometimes to distinguish words (fig. 3), sometimes scattered capriciously (figs.

2, 4); likewise a variety of other marks, particularly cordate leaves, common to pagan and graved, sometimes painted on the marble. There are also many Christian inscriptions as well as Christian inscriptions (figs. 2, 5, 6). Some of the above remarks are illustrated by the inscriptions figured above and below, to be more fully described under TOMB. The reader may see more on this subject in Martigny's Dict. s. v. Inscriptions, §§ II., III.; but it can only be studied to advantage by examining the plates in such works as De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea

(coloured plates) and Inscr. Urb. Rom., and the other books named above in which the letters and accessories are figured. The same remark must be made of the palaeography. The letters have the same varieties of form, such as uncial, minuscule, rustic, and ligated, which are common to MSS. and monuments of all kinds, and their execution varies from extreme neatness (figs. 6, 10) and even beauty to extreme ugliness and carelessness (litterae rusticae) (figs. 1, 8). Of the former sort the characters employed by pope Damasus in the 4th century are the most remarkable, their apices being ornamented with little hooks (fig. 7). They are called after him

u. s. p. 116; De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 18.

(iii.) Symbols.—Of the symbols which are found with some Christian inscriptions, the principal are the following: the fish, the anchor, the dove, the Good Shepherd, the chrisma, the α and ω, and the cross in various forms. These will be found described under their respective heads (also noticed under GEMS and MOSAICS), and they may be regarded as either exclusively or principally Christian symbols. The palm which is also found, and that very commonly, is, like the phoenix, Christianised; but it occurs also on pagan and Jewish inscriptions. It must be sufficient to refer to a table indicating the symbols on the early Roman and Gaulish sepulchral inscriptions (by far the most complete series), and the observed dates of their introduction and disappearance, given by M. Le Blant (Manuel, p. 29). For symbols generally see Raoul Rochette, Tableau des Cimetieres de Rome, pp. 229 sqq., Paris, 1853, and the authors named at the beginning and end of the book.

(iv.) Select Inscriptions.—These consist of such examples, arranged chronologically, in prose and verse, as are connected with churches or their furniture or adjuncts, and they have mostly some further interest of their own. No uniform system of printing has been followed. Sometimes the mere transcript of the letters seems to be sufficient; sometimes the words have been written out (corrected and at length) below these; sometimes a translation has been added; also such notes as seemed desirable.

M. Rénier reads the end of the last line but one titulum marmorcum anno primo Severiani, viri clarissimi. If this be right, as seems very probable (though De Rossi feels some doubts, Prod. Inscr. Urb. Rom. p. xi.), the mode of dating is very unusual. Other Mauretanian inscriptions are dated by the era of the province, i.e. 40 A.D. when it was reduced by the Romans (McCauley, Christ. Epit. p. 37).

The words ecclesia fratrum indicate the restoration of the inscription to be "assai antico" (De Rossi); the original was probably broken during the tumults against the Christians, A.D. 258-304, as De Rossi thinks; and the restored marble tablet would seem to have been put up in the first year of Severianus, probably the Roman governor of Mauretania. One of the earliest Christian inscriptions, not being an epitaph, which have come down to us in any form.

The date of this consulship of Gratian with Merobaudas is A.D. 377, the earliest date of any public monument yet known, bearing the chrisma. The next earliest is A.D. 390, on a column of St. Paul's basilica, extra muros, Rome. It is wonderful that the former church should be spoken of as old so early as A.D. 377; it can hardly be doubted that it was a Christian or a Christianised building. Le Blant's observation that this church-restoration is precisely contemporaneous with the greatest abundance of Mithraic monuments and those of Cybele is worthy to be noted. The abbreviations at the end are probably for vir praepositus praetorio dedicavit. Tales, i.e. men like Asclepiodotus. De Rossi, however (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 25), who evidently considers Asclepiodotus to be the author of the verses, refers tales to aedes ("che li dedicò alla repubblica"). He takes the building to be "il palazzo dei presidi imperiali," the chrisma and decolio notwithstanding.

IN HONOREM S. IOANNIS BAPTISTAE
HILARIVS EPISCOPVS DEI FAMVLVS OFFERT.

Hilarius was pope from A.D. 462 to 467; and the inscription has the appearance of being contemporary. The ancient baptisteries were commonly placed under the patronage of St. John the Baptist; and both they and the fonts which they contained were frequently inscribed. Ciampini gives both kinds of inscriptions from the Baptistry of the Lateran, which are said to have been there in the 5th century; but this edifice has been often remodelled. (See Ciamp. de Sacr. Edif. c. iii., Mart. Dict., p. 321; Hubsch, Arch. Christ. p. 5, Guerber's French transl. 1866.)

For this class of inscriptions generally see the posthumous papers of Marini published by Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Collect. t. v., pp. 167-177.

Diction barbarous, as frequently in these Spanish inscriptions. The church seems to have been completed under the auspices of a nun, named Marispalla: probably the text really is per Marispallam Deo votam, the last letters having a stroke above them, which may have been obliterated or accidentally omitted. The inscription is interesting as being doubly dated, both by the Spanish era and by the reign of the Visigothic king. The Spanish era, whose origin is uncertain, but which appears to commence B.C. 38 (see Hübner, praef. p. vi.), is the era most commonly used to mark the time of the Spanish Christian inscriptions: about 100 of these are thus dated (Hübner, p. 109), the earliest appears to be A.D. 466, and the latest A.D. 762. Both the proper names in the inscription are Gothic (see Hübner, praef. p. vii., who gives several others); the remark of M'Caul (u. s., p. xxi.) that Gothic names are "very rarely" found in inscriptions does not apply to Spain.

The motive of the founders is here sufficiently clearly expressed, that they may enjoy eternal rest through the prayers of the saint. They do not, however, actually invoke him.

Holy Mary, God-bearer (Deipara), guard the kingdom of the Christ-loving Justinian and his faithful servant Victorinus with them that live godly in Corinth.

Sixth century, between A.D. 527 and 565. Other and even stronger invocations of saints occur about this time. In one, too long to quote at length, Demetrius is invoked by Justinian to aid him against his enemies, in the capacity of a mediator with God (ὁ μεγαλομάρτυς Δημήτριε μεσίτευσον πρὸς θεὸν ἵνα, κ.τ.λ. n. 8642). Another inscription, mutilated, from Thera (San-torin), of uncertain date, not later than the 4th or 5th century at latest according to Ross, begins—ἄγιε καὶ φοβέρε Μιχαὴλ ἀρχάγγελε.

CHRIST. ANT

βοήθει τῷ δούλῳ σου Ἀρίμῳ (n. 8911). Votive tablets were also erected to saints; one from the cemetery of Cyriace in Rome runs thus: Petrus et Pancratia votum posuerunt (sic) martyre Felicissimi. (Marini, u. s., p. 15.) In another, found near the baths of Diocletian, Camasius and Victorinus pay their vows (votum reddunt) Domnis Sanctis Petro et Marcellonem martiris (Id. p. 14).

The expression, μήτηρ Θεοῦ (Mother of God), the usual title of the Virgin on the early mediæval camei (see GEMS) had not yet come into common use in the Greek church, as appears from Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch, a contemporary of Justinian. See Pearson On the Creed, Art. III.

This is considered by Martigny to be in all appearance the "ministerial" (sacramental) chalice given by St. Remigius himself to the church of Rheims; see also Archæol. Journ. 1846, p. 134. The magnificent chalice of gold which goes by the name of Remigius, formerly at Rheims, now in the Paris Library, is of the 12th century (Arch. Journ. u. s.). For other inscriptions on chalices, see Marini, u. s. p. 197.

DEVSDEDIT EPS INDI NVS FIERI IVSSIT HANC ARAM.

Deusdedit is supposed to have been bishop of Rodez about the end of the 6th century: the inscription is doubtless a contemporary composition, but the letters and the sign of contraction æ are suspected of having been restored.

The name Deusdedit occurs also on a gem (see GEMS); the form Deusdet is likewise found more than once in inscriptions (Le Blant, u. s. p. 433); for similar instances, see Names below. For the altars of Christian churches ara (though as old as Tertullian) is less commonly used than altare, especially in prose. For other inscriptions on altars see Marini (u. s. pp. 74–80). This and the altar at Ham of the 7th century are among the earliest that are inscribed (Le Blant, n. 91).

10. Camden, Britan. § 9 Brigantes," ed. 1690: "Accepimus crucem hanc (at Bowsbury, Yorkshire) exsistisse, in qua inscriptum fuit:

BRAVIT."

Paulinus was bishop of York, A.D. 625–664.

The inscription upon it is among the earliest that we have in England, which are not sepulchral. Fragments of the ancient cross itself, probably broken at the Reformation, which Leland, in his Itinerary, mentions having seen, bearing the above inscription (temp. Henr. VIII.).

have been built up against the church there. The miracles of Cana and the multiplication of five loaves and two fishes were represented thereon, and a few Latin words of the Gospels in Runesque characters can still be read. (Figured and described by the Rev. J. T. Fowler, in a recent number of the Yorkshire Archaeol. and Top. Journal.)

The most remarkable cross of the same kind as the present is that at Ruthwell, near Dumfries (then part of Northumbria), with Scriptural and other scenes, and Latin legends from the Gospels, &c.; also having extracts from a poem by Cædman, entitled A Dream of the Holy Rood, written in Runes, near the edges. It is between seventeen and eighteen feet high, and appears to be of the 8th century. For a full account of it see Stephens, Runic Mon., vol. ii., pp. 405-448, with figure.

It is now over the nave-arch of the church, "and may be original" (Fowler, in litt.). The forms of the letters O and C, and their inconsistency, quite favour this supposition.

DEDICATIO BASILICAE
SCI PAVLI VIII KL MAI

Q. ECCLES DO AVCTORE
CONDITORIS ANNO IIII.

The date is A.D. 685, determined by the reign of Egfrith, king of Northumbria. One of the very few early English inscriptions which bear a date.

The basilica or chapel of the monastery has been converted into the parish church, some remaining parts of which "are generally supposed to be of ante-Norman date" (G. G. Scott's Report). For the history, see Flor. Wigorn. s. a. 682. Benedict Biscop should rather be called the founder than Ceolfrið, whom he appointed as the first abbot.

The above scanty selection must suffice for this place. More is to be sought in other articles under AMPULLA, GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, MONEY, MOSAICS, SEALS, and TOMBS.

(v.) Language and Style of the Christian Inscriptions.

A. Orthography, Inflections, and choice of Words.—While some of the Christian inscriptions are composed with correctness and even with elegance both in prose and verse, there are others which are written barbarously as respects the letters, the forms of words, the declensions, the genders, the conjugations, the syntax, and the prosody.

It would scarcely fall within the province of this article to enter into the grammar or rather non-grammar of the language of the latter sort. It partakes of the barbarisms with which various non-Christian inscriptions are more or less disfigured,[†] and which have even found their way into literature in their most aggravated shapes, if the Formularies of the monk Marculfus (circa 660 A.D.) can be called literature. In the Greek Christian inscriptions the frequent and various changes of vowels and diphthongs are the most noticeable particularity. Thus κείται is written κιτε, or κιτη, or κητη, Ἡράκλειος becomes Ηρακλος or Ηρακλιος, κοιμητήριον is changed into κυμετεριον, τελειωθείς becomes τελιοθείς, ἐτών is written ετον, νικά is simply νικα, and the ι adscript of the dative is generally omitted. The change of consonants, as κόλπος for κόλπος, ταυμασία for θαυμάσια, γληγορει for γρηγορεί, κωριω for χωρίω, is more rare. There is also an occasional tendency to abbreviate words, so as to substitute μνηθητι for μνήσθητι, διακων for διάκωνος, &c., or to enlarge them, as κολλαιπτις or κολλποσι for κόλποις. Sometimes Coptic influence is discernible; sometimes uncouth late forms as μεγαλότατος, make their appearance (Böckh, passim).

In the Latin the changes are much more remarkable." From the selection of inscriptions (including the notes) given above and under TOMB, also under GEMS and GLASS, and from a few others we obtain such changes as Agustas for Augustas, eclesia or aeclesia for ecclesia, quere for quære, que for quæ, hec for hæc, vixit or vixit or vicrit or visit or bissit or visse for vixit, posute, posuent for posuit, posuerunt, bobis for vobis, botum for votum, vibi for vivi, stavilis for stabilis, provata for probatâ, omnebus for omnibus, quesquas, gesquet, and reqviescit, for quiescas, quiescit, requiescit, specit for spectat (expectat), jacit for jacet, annus for annos, huc for hoc, epytajum for epitaphium, marturibus for martyribus, ozza for ossa, ed for et, es for ex, in pace for in pace, anathema for anathema, chanones for canones, tinta for tincta, pelem for pellem, meses or misit for menses, zaconus for diaconus, Istephanus for Stephanus, slinarius for linarius, Zesus for Jesus, Zenuaria for Januaria, Gerosale for Jerusalem, and various other words which contain barbarous substitutions of consonants and vowels and also of diphthongs. Again, neuter substantives are sometimes treated as masculines, e. g. hunc templum, and conversely masculines as neuters, e. g. hoc tumulum. The regimen of the cases is frequently violated in the use of prepositions (see below), and also in such expressions as vixit annis (or even annus or annorum) and the like. See more in Martigny, Dict. pp. 309-311; and McCaul, u. s. pp. xii. and xiii.; the latter of whom observes: "The student should beware of regarding what may be new to him in Christian epitaphs, as peculiar to them. Very many of the variations from classical usage are to be found in Pagan inscriptions, and some of them in authors that are not commonly read."

The actual words also vary little from the Pagan ones; requiescit, refrigerat, and even depositus^x (about which Cardinal Wiseman in his

at the end of the volumes of the Corp. Inscr. Latine, now being published at Berlin, under Res grammatica, will be found still more useful. They go far to establish the truth of Martigny's remark.

[†] M. Le Blant refers to a work by A. Fuchs, Die Romanischen Sprachen in ihrem Verhältnisse zum Lateinischen, which the writer has not seen.

^x It was not after all so very common in the earliest Christian times. "La formule depositus—deposito caractérise particulièrement les inscriptions des quatrième

[†] Martigny (ibid. p. 309) calls them "communs aux inscriptions chrétiennes et aux romaines," referring to Hub. Goltzius (Theat. Bib. Ant. § 23) and R. Fabretti (Inscr. Lat. expl.) for further information. The indices

Fabiola (p. 145) has written so prettily, as implying a 'precious thing, intrusted to faithful, but temporary keeping') and some others which seem Christian in their tone occur sometimes in Pagan inscriptions (see McCaul, u. s. p. xiv. 4, 29; Tertull. De Test. Anim. c. 4, commented on by Fleetwood, Inscr. Ant., Index, p. 6, who is deceived, however, in thinking that no Christians of Tertullian's age "refrigerium mortuis suis comprecatos esse." See De Monag. c. 10). And conversely some words and expressions which are not Christian, find their way occasionally from Pagan into Christian inscriptions, as domus aeterna, percipere (baptisma sc. said primarily of the rites of Mithras and Cybele), contra volem, Dicis (said of emperors deceased); and even occasionally D. M., or in full Dis Manibus, so usual at the head of Pagan inscriptions (see TOMB, and McCaul, u. s. p. 54, and his Index, s. v. Pagan usages). In fact there is a very small residuum indeed of mere words, i. e. not necessarily involving peculiar doctrines or religious distinctions^a which are exclusively Pagan, or exclusively Christian.^a Dr. McCaul remarks that there is scarcely one of the designations of the place of burial used in Christian epitaphs, that is peculiar to them, so far as he remembers, although he has not observed quadrismus (locus) in any Pagan epitaph. Likewise he does not remember seeing sepultus in any Christian inscription of the first six centuries, and but rarely in Pagan ones; but yet sepulcrum occurs in both not rarely.^a Again he says praecedo is characteristically Christian, while abscedo he thinks occurs only (and that rarely) in Pagan epitaphs (u. s. pp. xiv. xv. 53). But who does not see that any new discovery may upset the supposed distinction? There are indeed phrases which appear to have an exclusively Christian meaning, such as Deo reddere spiritum sanctum, agrat Deum acceptus, decessit or exiit de saeculo, absolutus de corpore, receptus ad Deum, or cessit ab angelis, and a few others of the same kind.^b (Mart. Dict. p. 315; McCaul, u. s. p. xv.). The expression, in pace, is derived from the Jewish epitaphs, and passes over, both as an acclamation and otherwise, to the Christian inscriptions; its occurrence is generally considered to be a certain proof that the monument is not pagan. (See, however, MONEY.) "Dictio illa In Pace Christiana tota est" (Morcelli, De Stil. Inscr. Lat. ii. p. 77; and so Martigny Dict. s. v. "In Pace," q. v.).

Upon the whole, it will perhaps be thought enough to give the following extract from the Edinburgh Review relative to the Latinity of the Christian inscriptions, with the addition of a few notes.

"The reader at once recognises in the Latinity of these epitaphs [of Italy and Gaul]^c the germ of that total change in the government of prepositions, which is one of the great sources of distinction between the ancient and the modern languages of Italy.^d The old distinction of government between the ablative and the accusative has evidently begun to disappear. Many of the prepositions are used indiscriminately with both those cases. Thus we read (De Rossi, Ins. Urb. Rom. p. 82) that Pelegrinus, "lived in peace cum uxorem suam Silvanam;" and in another place (p. 108), Agrippina erects a monument to her "sweetest husband, cum quem exiit sine lesione animi, annis tres et menses d. xvi."

p. 145) "The word to bury is unknown in Christian inscriptions." It occurs even at Rome, which he had more particularly in his eye, in an inscription thought to be of the third century: εταφη ωδε ΕΙΡΕΝΗΣ (Bäcker, n. 3612). At the same time, for whatever reason, the word appears to be decidedly rare. But as it seems to be not much more common in Pagan inscriptions there is no great force in the cardinal's remark.

^b There are also various expressions relating to light, as lumen clarum, præsent lucis, lux nova, &c. occurring in Christian epitaphs which contrast remarkably with the lucē caret, jaceo in tenebris, &c. of the Pagans. See Mart. Dict. p. 380. But this is a difference of feeling rather than of language. There are other similar contrasts which we can hardly discuss here. See McCaul p. xii.; Edimb. Rev. u. s. p. 242. But some of the earliest Christian inscriptions express no feeling of any sort. See De Rossi, nos. 3, 6, 12, 13, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, all of the first three centuries.

^c Much the same remarks may be made of the sepulchral inscriptions of Britain and of Africa. See TOMB.

^d And of France. We have this interesting inscription of Beze, Maria ergo minister de templo (the temple of the temple) Genesio (J. Mansueti), Le Blant, n. 542. A. The same author points out various other links of connection between the epigraphical Latin and the French language. Thus qui, which is invariable for both genders in French, is twice found on the epitaph of a nun, A.D. 431. (In an inscription of Piedmont qui in like manner agrees with Maria. Genesio, Maria, Beze, p. 191.) In the fifth century we have also santa, which prepares the way for the modern sainte, transparere (because they attend closely aux offices de villages), omnes agunt (Manuel, p. 194).

et cinquième siècles, bien qu'on en ait quelques exemples antérieurs." Martigny, Dict. p. 319. Neither is the word universal, being very rarely found in Gaul.

^y Thus the words resurrectio, resurgo, baptidatus, redemptor, perhaps also sanctionialis, as well as the combinations dies iudicii, puella Dei (a nun), and perhaps famulus Dei, applied in very many epitaphs to the pious dead, but in a few other inscriptions to the living (see §iv. n. 4) have no place in Pagan inscriptions, nor costa as applied to a wife (see De Rossi, n. 151). It might be thought that Deo aeterno magno, and in aeternum renatus would equally be absent; yet both occur, the former in connexion with goddesses (deabusque), the latter in relation to the mysteries of Mithras. (Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vol. v. p. 3 (note); Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, vol. ii. p. 72). Christian influence may be suspected in these instances.

^a At the same time it is undeniable that deposuit (=sepultus) and depositio occur in a very large number of Christian inscriptions, but only in a very small number of Pagan ones (Orelli, n. 4555, is a clear example); while elatus, the classical expression for being carried out to burial, is so rare in Christian inscriptions that De Rossi can find no parallel to his single example (n. 1192). There may perhaps be some few other instances of the same sort of each kind.

^a Since this sentence was penned, the writer has discovered an example of sepultus in an ancient Christian epitaph of Mauretania (Rénier, n. 4026). It is very possibly as early as the third century, to which several Pagan inscriptions in that region certainly belong. There is a second example in the same region, A.D. 416 (n. 3675), and a third, A.D. 389 (n. 3710). We have another instance occurring in an epitaph of Rimini, A.D. 523 (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 15). The word is found also in Christian epitaphs of Spain, dated and undated, but perhaps in no case before the seventh century (Hübner, p. x. and the references). We have in fine in a Perugian inscription of Roman times (Vermigli, Inscr. Perug. t. ii. p. 442) in qua (basilica sc.) sepelliri non debet. Cardinal Wiseman therefore is not strictly accurate in saying (Fabiola,

A third monument is erected pro caritatem (Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. Gaul. vol. i. p. 400). In a fourth, a mother is entreated to pray for the child she has left behind, "pro hunc unum ora subolem" (De Rossi, p. 133). Conversely, we find de sua omnia (De Rossi, p. 133) and decessit de saeculum (p. 103). And although an occasional solecism of this kind might be explained by the rude and illiterate character of the individual author of the inscription, the frequency of the occurrence clearly indicates the settled tendency of the popular usage of the prepositions towards the abolition of all distinction in the government of cases.* We may add that the same confusion of case is found in the inscriptions of the Jewish catacombs published by Father Garrucci, among which we read, on the one hand, cum with the accusative, as cum virginum (p. 50), and cum Celerinum (p. 52); and on the other, inter with the ablative, as inter dicacis.

"It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to advert to such solecisms as pauperorum for pauperum (although it is plain from the recurrence of the same form in other words, as omniorum for omnium, that the change is not an accidental error); or to the occasional use of forms rare, but not entirely unexampled, in classical Latin, as nectus (Le Blant, p. 15) as the participle of neco, or utere (De Rossi, p. 233) as the ablative of uter, a rare form following the third, instead of the second declension.[†] But it is impossible not to discern a foreshadowing of the modern idiom of Italy in such words as pulla, and still more Pitzinnina, which is the direct prototype of the Italian Piccinina. The same may be said of the orthography, which, in many cases, points clearly towards the modern pronunciation. The form santa for sancta already appears; and the x, as in series for sesties, begins to give place to the modern s. This tendency goes, however, beyond individual words, and seems to indicate certain general principles of usage. We do not mean those broad characteristics which distinguish Italians and foreigners generally from ourselves, in the sounds of the vowels and diphthongs of the ancient languages, although in all these the interchanges of the characters of the two languages which the inscriptions frequently exhibit, and the characters employed in each to represent equivalent sounds of the other,

* Martigny (Dict. p. 320) thinks that if an inscription has cum or de followed by an accusative, it must be placed in the fourth or fifth century. This seems very doubtful. We have certainly inter sanctis in an inscription of 268 A.D., and perhaps cum cum in another of 279 A.D. (see De Rossi, pp. 16, 21). Before this cum soales occurs at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 221).

† Dr. McCaul notes some very singular instances of inflection, as the datives Niceni, Agapeni, Leopardeti, Ireneti (also Ireni), Mercuraveti from Nico, Agape, Leoparde, Eirene, Mercurane (Mercuriane); also ispeti for spei; likewise Victorietas for Victoriat (u. s. p. xiii. and 18, 19). The same forms, as was to be expected, occur in Pagan inscriptions. Thus we find Glycenti, Staphyleni, &c. in Spain (C. I. L. ii. Index, p. 779). We have also Januarias for Januarias, at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 2233), and several similar examples; and Ampliatas in Spain (C. I. L. ii. n. 4975, 60). Professor Hübner, in fine, observes in a few Christian inscriptions of Spain, Joanni, Pastori, &c. as the genitives of Joannes, Pastor, &c. (p. xlii.), and conversely we have Saturnis, Mercuris as the genitives of Saturnus, Mercurius (De Rossi, nos. 172, 475).

are quite decisive against the English usage. We refer rather to certain peculiarities of Italian pronunciation, which are regarded as defects even by the Italians themselves, and which nevertheless find their counterpart here. One of these is the well-known codu or additional vowel sound, which Italian speakers often attach to words ending with a consonant. Of this there are numberless examples in De Rossi's volume; as posuete for posuit (p. 18). In like manner we find a type for the vowel sound prefixed to words; as ispiritus for spiritus, iscribit for scribit (p. 228); and the actual Italian sound of h (ch or k) between two vowels, which has long been the subject of ridicule, is found directly expressed in these inscriptions, in which michi is one of the forms of mihi.

"It is amusing too, to meet in the Roman catacombs, or among the Christians of ancient Gaul, the prototype of the cockney aspirate and its contrary. Thus we find upon the one hand (Le Blant, vol. i. p. 2-3), Hossa (for ossa), Hordine, Hoctobres, Heterna; and upon the other oo for hoc (Le Blant, p. 93), ic for hic, Ilarus, ora, Onorius, &c." (Edinb. Rev. 1864, pp. 234-5).

The Index Grammaticus added at the end of Hübner's Christian Inscriptions of Spain, gives a rich harvest of similar barbarisms. Nearly all the vowels are blundered in one way or other, and no small number of consonants; without dwelling on them we have the following: hunc edijcium; in annibus; post funere; in hunc tumulum requiescit; cum operarios vernolos; offeret (for offert;) besides other less heinous sins against inflections. For the Saxon forms which occur in inscriptions in England the reader is referred to Stephens' Runic Monuments, and for the Celtic forms in the Irish inscriptions to Petrie and Stokes' work thereon (see above).

Examples of bilingual inscriptions (Greek and Latin) and of Latin inscriptions in Greek characters, also of double rendering of words into Runic and Roman characters, as well as Celtic words in Ogham characters, will be noticed under TOMB.

B. Proper Names used in Christian Inscriptions.

—For the proper names used in Christian inscriptions see careful and interesting notices in De Rossi, I. U. R. Prol. cxii.-cxiv.; McCaul, u. s. pp. xix.-xxi.; Hübner, u. s. pp. vi. vii., and the references.

The Edinburgh Reviewer has treated this matter so well for the Latin inscriptions of Italy, Gaul, and Africa, taking also some slight notice of the Greek inscriptions, that his words are set down with little abridgment. The account has been supplemented by a few words about the Spanish, British, and Irish names which occur in the early Christian inscriptions of those countries.

"The small proportion of patrician families among the early Christians will hardly suffice to explain the rapid disappearance among them of the use of the three names, which had hitherto been the peculiar privilege of the aristocratic class. Not a single inscription after Constantine presents three names; and of the ante-Constantinian inscriptions, there are but two [rather, is but one] in which the three names occur * * *. After Constantine, except Flavius, which continued in partial use, praenomina may be said entirely to disappear. The old distinctive Gentile name too, quickly followed. The inscriptions before Constantine abound with Aurelii

Cornelii, Claudii, Antonii, &c. * * * * Thus, in the Aurelian age, we find Aurelius or Aurelia repeated seven times; and under Constantius and his sons, Constantinus. Constantius and Constans, have their turn of popularity. The Gentile name, however, was quickly displaced by new forms terminating in ntius as Lactantius, Dignantius, Crescentius, Leontius; or in osus, as Bonosus. A favourite form in the third and succeeding centuries was some laudatory epithet, as Benignus, Castus, Grata, Castula. Often, especially in Africa, in the superlative degree; as Dignissimus, Felicissimus, Acceptissima. Sometimes similar adjectives appear in the comparative degree, as Dignior, Nobilior; and occasionally the abstract quality itself, as Prudentia, Ἀγάπη, &c., is found as the name. The names of the fourth, fifth, and later centuries would be found on examination to furnish the type, if not the exact equivalent of most of the fanciful appellatives of the palmy days of puritanism. We meet, not merely with simple forms such as πίστις, ἐλπίς, ἀγάπη, Decentia, Prudentia, Dignitas, Ikonitas, σωφροσύνη;² or Renatus, Redemptus, Refrigerarius, Projectus; or the more self-abasing appellatives, Stercorius or Contumeliosus, but compound names of the true Puritan stamp, such as Deus Dedit, Servus Dei, Adeodatus, Quid vult Deus * * *

"In a few instances occasion is taken from the name to introduce into the sentiment of the epitaph some playful allusion to the etymological import of the name; and although this practice is more consonant with the tastes of the later times, yet the inscriptions of the classic period, present examples of a similar play upon words, of which we may instance the sentence from the very pretty epitaph of Claudia given by Orelli (vol. i. p. 547).

"HIC EST SEPULCRUM HAUD PULCRUM PULCRAI FEMINAE." [Pulcher was a cognomen of the gens Claudia.] These allusions in the Christian epitaphs are commonly very simple. Thus we meet INFELIX FELICITAS, and INFAUSTUS FELIX. A monument is erected to Innocentius in recognition of his innocence, PRO INNOCENTIA SUA. GLYCO (γλυκύς, sweet) is described as "sweeter than his name." The sorrowing friends of ANTHUS bemoan his years "stript of their flowers:" and even in a very tender poetical epitaph, addressed to the memory of Verus, by his wife Quintilla (whose grief for his loss proclaims itself so extreme that it is only the fear of God that restrains her from following him to the grave, and that she vows to remain a widow for his sake), room is found, in the midst of all the writer's passionate expressions of sorrow, for a pun upon the name of "HIC VERUS, QUI SEMPER VERA LOCUTUS,"^h a pun exactly similar to that contained in the epitaph of the emperor Probus, which Vopiscus has preserved—"HIC PROBUS IMPERATOR, ET VERE PROBUS, SITUS EST" (u. s. pp. 235-237).

The proper names which occur on the Christian inscriptions of Spain (Hübner, praef. pp. vi. sqq.) are more varied. The old Roman nomina gentilicia are rare, and generally occur alone, as Aurelius, Julius, Licinia, &c., but with a provincial cognomen occasionally added, such as A. (Aurelius) Vincentius. We have also numerous examples of old Roman cognomina, as Avitus,

SoRoRI DVL
FECIT. (Dove.)

But it ought to be remembered that Spes is a name not unfrequent in Roman Pagan epitaphs, so that the now famous fragment of the Bristol inscription which contains it is not on that account presumably Christian: apart from the symbols, dog, cock, and asp, and the portrait (?), it now reads only SPES C. SENFI (Billa).

^h This Christian epitaph is published by Fabretti, iii. 630.

Dexter, Felix, Crispinus, Camilla. Of the more modern names are those which are of truly Latin origin, as Aeternalis, Amator, Asella, Dominicus, Februarius, Honorius, Sanctus, which seem to be generally diffused in the provinces of the empire; also the following, which appear to be peculiar to Spain (including of course Portugal: Braccarius, Cerevella, Cuparius, Gran-niola, Lilliolus, Salvianella, &c. There are also many which come from the Greek, as Arcadius, Basilia, Glaucus, Leontius, Macarius, Theodosius, Zenon, &c. Others are still more modern, such as Agilo, Ermengond, Froila, Gulfinus, Huniric, Oppila, Reccisvinthus, Reswentus, Sonnica, Marispalla (fem.), Swinthiliuba (fem.), all which are probably Gothic; also "Anna Gaudiosa sive Africa" (n. 71) and Maurus, which are of course both African; and Bacauda and Camuelates, which appear to be Gaulish. The origin of others, as Istorna, Locuber, Macona (fem.), Quintia, Quistricia, and Rexina, is unknown. To these must be added Scriptural names, as Emmanuel, Johannes, Maria, Sallomon, Susanna, Thomas, &c.; those of the puritanical type mentioned above appear to be wanting.

With regard to Great Britain we find (for the British period) some Latin names, as Viventius and Florentius (in Scotland), also Silius, Paulinus, Saturninus, and Carausius (in Wales and Cornwall), and some of these forms, as Augustinus and Paulinus, were re-imported from Rome in Saxon times. But there are also Celtic names occurring, as Isnioc (in Cornwall), Pascent (or Pasgen), Cadfan, Cyngen, Pabo, Boduoc (in Wales), and Drost, Voret, Forcas (Fergus?) and others (in Scotland); as well as Saxon or Scandinavian names, such as Sinnik (in Scotland), Herebricht, Hildithruth, Wulfhere, and the like (in England). A Saxon name is occasionally Latinised, as Wini into Ovinus. In Ireland the great mass of the names is Celtic, but occasionally a Latin form is Hibernized, as Columbanus into Cholumban: very occasionally a Latin form, as Martinus, survives.

C. Words and Formulae employed in different ages and places.—The words and phrases relating to burial and other matters vary a good deal in different places, and in the same place at different times. M. Le Blant has collected these "formules d'épigraphie chrétienne" with considerable industry; but a good many additions might easily be made. He even takes no notice at all of some provinces, e.g. Dalmatia and Pannonia, which however have some formulae and words of interest.ⁱ

Several of the selected inscriptions (sepulchral and others) have been chosen partly on account of the formulae therein contained, and some remarks upon them are made in their places.

But it is well observed by Hübner that until the Christian inscriptions of all parts of the world have been collected and edited, it is imⁱ E.g. an inscription from Sabaria (Stein an Angar) speaking of a dead child, has "requiem accipit in Deo patre nostro, et Christo ejus" (Corp. Inscr. Lat. t. iii. n. 4221, edited by Mommsen). Another (n. 4220) from the same place begins: "Benedicimus, in Deo vivas, Iodorus Civ. Grace, ex reg. Ladie, q. vix. an. l. &c." (Benedicimus occurs in Gaul, Le Blant, ibid. p. 177. See also n. 6399 sqq. from Dalmatia, where we have hic in pace pœet, depositus, &c.

possible to say what formulae are peculiar to each: those which we consider to be peculiar may turn out to be universal or common to many provinces (u. s. p. vii.).^k

The following is a translation with slight omissions and additions¹ and a few tacit corrections, mostly for the Greek, of M. Le Blant's Manuel d'Épigraphie Chrét. pp. 75-85 (Paris, 1860), omitting the references to his own work for Gaul and to those of others, as De Rossi (Rome), Gazzera (Piedmont), Mommsen (kingdom of Naples), Rénier (Algeria), and (for the Greek) Böckh. To this has been added (besides some Roman phrases) a collection of Spanish formulae derived from Hübner; also a notice of the few formulae which occur in Great Britain and Ireland.

"That which is true for ancient coins, as also for the works of architecture, is not less so in that which concerns the monuments of epigraphy. In each new place which he visits, the antiquary sees variations of the formulae, the symbols, the writing, the disposition, the ornaments of the marbles. Though apparently of little importance, these marked differences are worthy of being studied with care. Arising sometimes from the difference of the times, as well as from that of the places, they are able to serve as guides in the restoration of the texts, to fix the nationality of personages, the age of the inscriptions, and even to furnish materials for the history of ideas.

"I must appeal to the patience of the reader in undertaking to place before him some features of the localisation of the types and formulae of Christian epigraphy. Below are those which seem to me the most remarkable in different provinces:

Germania Prima:

Mayence: IN HOC TITVLO REQVIESCIT FELICITER. Worms: TITVLVM POSVIT.

Belgica Prima:

Treves: PRO CARITATE, and the like; TITVLVM POSVIT; HIC IACET; HIC IACET IN PACE; PATRES (titulum posuerunt).

Belgica Secunda:

Amiens: VBI FECIT NOVEMBER DIES XV, and the like; DEFUNCTVS EST.

Viennensis:

SVRRECIVRVVS IN XPŌ, and analogous formulae. Briord: HVMANITAS; ABSTVTVS (i. e. astutus, in a good sense). Briord and Vienne: VOLVNTAS. Vaison and Arles: PAX TECVM. Marseilles: RECESSIT, retained even when this word has disappeared in other places from the epigraphical formula.

^k Dr. McCaul, usually most accurate, illustrates this remark by a statement that among the many expressions for our "here lies" we have "hic iacet (not often), ἐνθάδε κεῖται (often)," p. xlii. We may safely say of hic iacet that it occurs almost everywhere, being found first in Rome, then in Gaul, Spain, Dalmatia, Algeria, and Britain, in which last country it is almost the only formula. Nor does there seem to be any reason to think it rare in any of those countries. M. Le Blant, however, only notices it under Gaul. The Greek rendering of this, ἐνθάδε κεῖται, or κατέκειται, is also very general, but perhaps not quite so common: it occurs in Rome, Sicily, Gaul; in Egypt, Dalmatia, and Greece; Algeria, and Cyrene; also in Asia Minor, but not everywhere. In truth M. Le Blant's is only a sketch partially worked out, but still very interesting.

Coudes: TRANSIT IN ANNOS.

Narbonensis Prima:

Toulouse: REQVIEVIT IN PACE.

Lugdunensis Prima, Viennensis:

BONAEMEMORIVS (adject.); APTVS (i. e. sympathetic).

Lugdunensis Prima et Secunda, and a good many other (though not all) parts of Gaul:

BONAE MEMORIAE; very uncommon at Rome.

Lugdunensis Prima, Germania Prima, Maxima Sequanorum, Viennensis, Aquitania Prima:

Lugdunensis Prima et Quarta, Viennensis, Prima et Secunda Narbonensis:

OBIIT, in common use (though seldom at Rome).

Lugdunensis Prima, Viennensis, Aquitania Prima:

TRANSIT; not common at Rome.

[Lugdunensis Prima, Viennensis:

FAMVLVS DEI (applied in epitaphs to the dead. See Le Blant, Manuel, pp. 10, 24, and references.)

Spain:

FAMVLVS DEI, or CHRISTI. [Apparently always similarly applied. See Hübner, pp. xi. 111, 112 and references. For the Spanish formulae in general, see below.] This formula does not occur among those of the catacombs registered by Bosio and Boldetti.

^m Spain:—

The formula In peace.—IN PACE (in various connections), with REQVIESCIT, REQVIEVIT, RECESSIT, REQVIESCAT, &c.; DOMINI, CHRISTI, IESV being sometimes added. See Hübner, u. s. p. ix. x.

Consecration formulae.—IN NOMINE DI (DOMINI?) NOSTRI I. C. CONSACRATA EST ECLESIA S. STEPHANI PRIMI MARTYRIS; IN NOMINE DOMINI CONSECrata ECLESIA S. MARIE; EPISCOPVS CONSECRAVIT HANC BASILICAM; IN NOMINE DOMINI SACRATA EST ECLESIA; IX. KAL. IANUARIJ ERA D LXXXX DEDICATA EST HAEC ECLESIA SCE MARIE; DEDICATA EST HEC BASILICA A PIMENIO ANTISTITE; DEDICAVIT HANC AEDEM DOMINVS BACAVDA EPISCOPVS.

Reliquary formulae.—IN NOMINE DOMINI HIC SVNT RECONDITE RELIQVIE SANCTORVM SERVANDI, GERMANI, etc.; RECONDITE SVNT IC RELIQVIE DE CRVORE DOMINI, SANCTI BABILE, etc.

Building formulae.—CEPRIANO EPISCOPVO (sic) ORDINANTE EDIFICATA [est haec ecclesia]; HAEC SANCTA TRIA TABERNACVLA IN GLORIAM TRINITATIS (in unitate?) Votive formulae.—RECESSVINTHVS REX OFFERET (offert) [sc. coronam]; OFFERET MVNVSCVLVM S. STEPHANO THEODOSIVS ABBA.

Spindle formulae (length of life).—VIXIT TOT ANNOS, or ANNIS; or ANNORVM TOT; CVM MARITO ANNIS TOT; PLVS MINVS TOT (without annos); ANNORVM DIERVMQVE TOT; QVI IN HOC SAECVLO CONPLEVERAT LVSTROS TOT

Gallia Cisalpina:

Como: VIXIT IN HOC SAECVLO ANNOS. Como, Alba, Pollenzo, Nice and the environs: DEPOSITVS SVB DIEM XIV KAL., etc. Como, Milan, Aquileja, Florence, Bologna, etc.: B.M. at the head of inscriptions. Turin, Tortona, Milan, Brescia, Civita di Friuli, Aquileja: CONTRA VOTVM POSUIT. Piedmont: HIC REQUIESCIT IN SOMNO PACIS.

Latium:^a

Rome, Ostia: LOCVS, at the beginning of the inscription. Rome: DEPOSITVS, very common form, of which Gaul gives scarcely four examples; REFRIGERIVM, IN REFRIGERIO, REFRIGERET DEVS (once only in Gaul); LOCVM EMIT, or COMPARAVIT, a formula which is completely unknown in Gaul; the mention of a tomb prepared by the living is very rare in Gaul. Ostia: HIC DORMIT, CVM DEVS PERMISERIT, QVANDO DEVS VOLVERIT.

Campania:

Naples: IN AVLA REGNI TVI, INDVC EOS IN CAELESTIA REGNA.

Mirabella, Eclanum, Fontanarosa, etc.: HIC REQUI-

AETATIS SVAE XLIII; DECEDIT E VITA. Sometimes the words ANVS, PVER, VIRGO are introduced.

Formulae of Burial.—DEPOSITIO; HVIC RVDI TVMVLO IACENS; IN HOC LOCO QVIESCENS; IN HOC TVMVLO IACET; HIC RECONDITVM EST CORPVS; DEPOSITVS IN PACE; IN ISTO LOCO SEPLVTVS EST; HIC SITVS EST; ἐταφύθη μετὰ εἰρήνης.

Prayers for the Dead.—DOMINE IESVS CHRISTE, FAMVLE TVE OMNIA PECCATA DIMITTE (A.D. 662); PRECATVS, VT PRO TVO PROMISSO ET SVB-LIBAMINE (sublevamine) MEREAMVR INGRES- PARADISI IANVE (seemingly offered for the dead, but? see n. 96); ΥΠΕΡ ΑΝΑΨΑΥΕΩΣ ΚΑΙ ΚΩΤΗΡΙΑΣ ΤΗΣ ΜΑΚΑΡΙΑΣ ΚΥΡΙΑΚΗΣ ΚΙΤΟΥΡΑΚ.

Acclamations.—CHIONI VIVAS; LVPICVS VIVIT; MARCLANE VIVAS IN CHRISTO (said of the living).

Station of the deceased in life.—The public and private station of the deceased are very rarely mentioned; and then only extending to VIR INLVSTRIS, CLARISSIMA FEMINA, etc. The usual designations are FIDELIS, FIDELIS CHRISTI, FAMVLA or FAMV-LVS DEI or CHRISTI; also BAPTIDIATVS (once).

Ecclesiastical station in life.—ABBA; ANTISTES; DEYOTA VIRGO; PONTIFEX; VIRGO CHRISTI; VOTA DEO.

^a The following formulae (from De Rossi's I. U. R. vol. i. passim) may be added for Rome up to A.D. 400, and from Böckh (C. I. G.).

Formulae of death.—OBIIIT; DECESSIT; DISCES-SIT; RECESSIT; DORMIT; DORMIT IN PACE; MORTVA EST; DEFVNCTA; ΤΕΛΕΥΤΑ; ΕΤΕ-ΑΕΥΤΗCEN; ΕΠΑΥCΑΤΟ; ΠΡΟΑΨΕΙ, ΕΤΕΛΕΘΗ (Böckh); KOIMATE (κοιμάται, id.); EN EPIHNH; DE SAECVLO RECESSIT, or DECESSIT, or EXIBIT (exivit): RECESSIT DE HAC LVCE; IIT AD DEVM; RECEPVS AD DEVM; PRAECESSIT AD PACEM; EXIVIT IN PACE; QVIESCET IN PACE; REQUIESCET IN SOMNO PACIS; ABSOLTVS DE CORPORE; SPIRITVS IN LVCE DOMINI SVSCEP-TVS EST.

Spideheal Formulae. HIC IACET, ENΘΑΔΕ ΚΕΙ-ΤΑΙ, or ΚΑΤΑΚΕΙΤΑΙ (Böckh); HIC SITVS EST; HIC DORMIT; HIC POSITA EST; DEPOSITIO; ΚΑΤΑΘΕCΙC; ΕΤΑΦΗ (Böckh); ΚΑΤΕΤΕΘΗ (id.).

Designation of tomb.—LOCVLVS; BISOMVS, TRI-SOMVS, QVADRISOMVS (with LOCVS expressed or understood); ΤΟΗC, CVBICVLVM, AETERNA DOMVS.

ESCIT IN SOMNO PACIS, DEPOSITIO EIVS III IDVS . . . etc.

D. Acclamations.—There is still one point re-lating to the phraseology of Christian inscrip-tions, on which it may be convenient to say a little more. Many of those on gems and glass, and a large number of the epitaphs contain what are termed acclamations, or short expressions addressed to, or in behalf of, the living, or to or in behalf of the dead. Both one and the other existed for the Pagans, and both one and the other were adopted with various modifications by the Christians.

(1.) To begin with those which concern the living. The sentiment on the inscription AMICI DUM VIVIMVS VIVAMVS (Gruter, p. 609, 3) on the glass IN NOMINE HERCVLIS ACERENTINO (Acherontini), FELICES VIVATIS (Garrucci, Vetri, t. xxxv. f. 1), and on the gem VIBAS (sic) LVXVRI HOMO BONE (King's Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. i. p. 311), was adopted by the Christians in the sense of living in God; and they engraved VIVE or VIVAS IN DEO, and cognate expressions expressive of hope both for time and for eternity on their own gems and glass vessels, and occasionally on a lamp or an amulet. Sometimes a saint is added, as VIVAS IN CHRISTO ET LAVRENTIO, or a saint only is expressed, as VIVAS IN NOMINE LAVRE(N)TI. Sometimes again a married couple, or a man and his family, are the subjects of this kind of good wish. Sometimes, however, the name of God or Christ was omitted, but a Christian symbol, as a palm or a chrisma, was introduced in order to insure the Christian significance. The Christians did not indeed refuse the sense of enjoying this life, when they wrote PIE (πίε) ZESES, or ZESES only on their glass drinking-cups, which were employed in sacred festivities, but the sacred representations which accompanied the legend would be a witness against any intemperate use. A smaller number of acclamations inscribed on glass, prays that the persons addressed may live in the peace of God. Thus one in favor of a married couple: VIVATIS IN PACE DEI (Garrucci, Vetri, t. i. f. 3); on another we have BIBAS (vivas) IN PACE DEI (Id. t. vi. f. 7), or VIVAS IM PACE DEI (Id. t. vii. f. 2).

For the matters here touched on see GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, SEALS. That this kind of acclamation exhorting to live was usually addressed to the living, is clear upon the face of it: but there are a few cases where it is less certain, whether the persons addressed were alive or dead. Thus it has been made a question whether HILARIS VIVAS CVM TVIS FELICITER SEMPER REFRIGERES IN PACE DEI is an acclamation to a living or dead person: Martigny (Dict. p. 8) relying principally on the word expressing a desire for his refreshment, looks on him as dead. Garrucci, probably with greater reason, interprets: sii sempre lieto et ti refrigerera nella pace di Dio, cioè con la grazia di lui, shewing that refrigerium is not rarely used of living persons u. s. p. 126).

On Christian epitaphs the living are sometimes addressed by the living, sometimes by the dead. Of the former are requests to the reader to pray for the soul of the person buried. These are very rare for the earlier periods. Dr. McCaul says, "I recollect but two examples in Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries of the address to the reader for his prayers, so common in mediæval times." In the early mediæval inscriptions of Great Britain and Ireland examples will be seen under TOMB. At other times the readers are saluted by the author of the inscription, SALVETE FRATRES (Rénier n.

4025; see above), or asked to pray for him (Le Blant, n. 619).

The dead person sometimes prays the living not to meddle with his bones, as PRECOR EGO HILPERICVS NON AVFERANTVR HINC OZZA MEA (Le Blant, n. 207. See similar examples in his notes on this inscription and TOMB).

Sometimes the survivors are exhorted not to weep: and the volite dolere parentes, hoc faciundum fuit (Mus. Disn. i. 117, pl. liii.) becomes on a Christian epitaph—

"Parcite vos lacrimis, dulcis cum conjuge natus, Viventemque Deo credite flere nefas."

De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 843 (A.D. 472).

More strange are the epitaphs counted to be Christian, μή λυποῦ, τέκνον, οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος (Böckh, n. 9589), and θάρα, τατία μήτηρ, οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος (Id. 9624), both from the Roman catacombs. A Jewish epitaph in a Roman cemetery runs similarly (Id. n. 9917).

(2.) Of acclamations addressed to the dead we have the following.*

VIVAS or VIVATIS IN DEO; this and the allied forms VIVE or VIVAS IN CHRISTO, DOMINO, INTER SANCTIS (sic, De Rossi, u. s. n. 10, A.D. 268), IN NOMINE CHRISTI (Marini, p. 455); also IN NOMINE PETRI (Boldetti, p. 388), the same, or nearly so, as those which have just been noticed as addressed to the living, recur abundantly on the sepulchral monuments of Rome and other places (De Rossi, I. U. E. Prol. p. ex; Le Blant, n. 576; Mart. Dict. p. 7, and TOMB).

Epitaph of Aeternalis and Servilia, Sivaux, France. Taken by De Rossi, judging from the style and palaeography, to be earlier than Constantine (Bull. Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 47, whose fig. is copied); if so it probably gives the oldest known example of the Chrisma. Fifth century, according to Le Blant (n. 576).

Similarly in Greek ζήσῃς ἐν θεῷ (Böckh, n. 9800), ζήσῃς ἐν κυρίῳ (Id. n. 9673). They proceed on the supposition that the Christian life is continuous, and that expressions in the form of good wishes, which primarily belong to this life, may when their fulfilment is no

* Of Pagan acclamations addressed in behalf of the dead we have, among others, the following: Sit tibi terra levis, Ossa tua bene quiescant, Ace, Vale, Di tibi longæviant, Χαίρε, δώη σοι Ὅστις το ψυχρὸν ὕδωρ (McCaul, u. s. p. xvii.).

Other forms express to the dead good wishes for their rest or peace. Thus on a gem, found in a grave B (bene) QVESQVAS, (quiescas) (see GEMS), and on tombs QUESCE IN PACE (Marini, p. 366), CESQVAS BENE IN PACE (Id. p. 385). Nor can we well take such phrases as PAX TECUM (Le Blant, n. 490, &c.), εἰρήνη σοι (Böckh, n. 9486), ἰρήνη (εἰρήνη) σοι ἐν οὐρανῳ (Id. n. 9844), and εἰρήνη πᾶσι, with or without ἐν θεῷ (Id. nos. 9487-8), as other than good wishes addressed to the departed, not affirmations of a fait accompli, but a confident prayer, or rather a sure hope, that the state of peace may continue. In other inscriptions, however, it is evidently regarded as already accomplished, e.g., ἀνεπαυσεν Ἀπία ἐν εἰρήνῃ (Marini, p. 456). Compare ἐν εἰρήνῃ προάγει (Böckh, n. 9645 and 9632); OBI-DORMIUIT IN PACE IESV, QVEM DILEXIT, OBIT IN PACE DEI (Hübner, u. s. p. x.). The full expression εἰρήνη σοι ἦτω, PAX VOIBUSCV SIT, also occurs (Böckh, n. 9710; Le Blant, n. 526). More interesting are the acclamations which relate to refrigerium, which God himself is often elsewhere invoked to bestow on the departed. De Rossi notes the occurrence of spiritum tuum Deus refrigeret,^q and the like, as occurring in early Christian epitaphs (Prol. p. cx.). But here the deceased is addressed, in the hope that he is in receipt of that refreshment, or as being sure to receive it. Thus we have the neuter verb refrigerare, to enjoy a cool repose, in this connection, IN BONO REFRIGERES (Marini, p. 420), i.e., may you enjoy refreshment in a good place, by which is intended Paradise, or the bosom of Abraham; REFRIGERA CVM SPIRITV SANCTO, i.e., in thine own holy soul^r (Marangoni, Cose Gent. p. 460. See Tertull. adv. Marc. lib. iv. c. 34). More rarely ACCEPTA SIS IN CRISTO (Marini, p. 454) is the form which the acclamation assumes, with which Χριστὸς μετὰ σου (Böckh, n. 9697) may be compared, as well as AETERNA TIBI LUX IN CHRISTO (Marini, u. s. p. 450), the last word being expressed by the chrisma. Some addresses to the dead, however, are congratulatory, as BENE VIXISTI (sic), VENE CONSUMASTI (Marini p. 434), ANIMA TVA CVM IVSTIS (Id. p. 381), IN REFRIGERIO ANIMA TVA (Fabretti, p. 547), where est rather than sit seems to be understood.

The Greek acclamation θάππῃ (i.e. θάππει) is sometimes placed at the end of an epitaph (Böckh, n. 9821); and sometimes at the beginning (Id. n. 9789), addressed in each case to the departed. Another imperative γρηγόρει (wake up!) in singular contrast to the quiescas above, is occasionally found at the end of Christian inscriptions (Id. 9599, 9570); it may probably contemplate the return of the Saviour. Εὐμοίρι also occurs (Id. 9800).

The Latin classical form Ave, much used by the Pagans, is found also in a Christian epitaph, and written A B E (Böckh, n. 9653). We have also HAVE VALE on the same monument (Le Blant, n. 495).

In the last place are to be noted prayers or requests to the departed to pray to God for the survivors.^s De Rossi notes that in the earlier undated inscriptions of the catacombs (i.e., those before the peace of Constantine), we have pete pro nobis, pro parentibus, pro conjugē, pro filiis, pro sorore (Prol. p. cx.). To these Dr. McCaul adds roga, ora pro nobis, but adds at the same time that there are "comparatively few among the thousands" of these undated inscriptions, which contain these prayers, and "that instances of the mention in such forms of others than the members of the family of the deceased are extremely rare." He has observed only one dated example, of the year 380 A.D. (De Rossi, n. 288) which contains any such request; it has the expression PRO HVNC VNVM ORA SVTIOLEM (u. s. p. xviii.). With respect to such acclamations of affection as oul is amicus, amica, pater et mater, amicus inuicem, pater inuicem, ψυχῇ καλῇ, and the like, they are applied in Christian inscriptions of various kinds both to the living and the dead, and need hardly be dwelt upon in this place (see Garrucci, u. s. Index, s. v. dulcis anima; Martigny, Dict. p. 7; Perret, Catac. de Rome, t. v. pl. 17; Böckh, n. 9697).

E. Style and Structure.—Such inscriptions as relate to public works, churches, basilicas, fountains, or to sacred objects and furniture, altars, chalices, crosses, liturgical book-covers, &c., or to votive offerings and the like, need hardly be taken into the present account. They exist in prose and verse, both in Greek and in Latin, and are of very various styles and lengths. A large number of such are collected by Marini, and edited by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. tom. v. pp. 1-236); to this work more especially the reader is referred. Many of them, however, are later than the period embraced in his work. Very few inscriptions, if any, which belong to this class, go back before the time of Constantine, so far as the writer is aware, and can hardly be called numerous till after the close of the 4th century. With regard, however, to the sepulchral inscriptions the case is somewhat different. They can, to some extent at least, be classified by their style. But the first thing to be borne in mind is that inscriptions of one country are no rule for those of another. Those of Britain and of Ireland, for example, are both unlike each other, and unlike those of Gaul, Spain, and Italy, of nearly the same period. The Greek inscriptions, again, admit for the most part of but little comparison with the Latin ones; the Greek and

^p The Indicative is likewise found, as in Deo decedit e vita (Hübner, u. s. p. xi.); and both expressions mean in reality the same thing. The reader, however, may see Martigny, Dict. s. v. "Purgatoire" for a different view of the optative formulæ.

^q The verb is then used transitively. In the Latin version of St. Irenæus, refrigerare is the rendering of ἀναπαύσασθαι, and Ducauge accordingly (gloss. s. v.) explains the Latin word by requiescere, which is substantially correct. Refrigerium as used by Tertullian and in the Acclamations does not mean "a release from pain, but an enjoyment of positive though imperfect happiness on the part of the just from the very moment of their dissolution in that separate abode which Tertullian supposes our Lord to distinguish by the appellation of Abraham's bosom."—Faber, Diff. of Romanism, book i. c. v.

Latin inscriptions to Dometius, written on the same slab, are a good illustration of this (Le Blant, Insc. Chrét. Gaul. n. 613A).

With few exceptions the earlier inscriptions are characterised by their brevity and simplicity, while from the 4th century onwards they assume in some countries, as in Italy, Gaul, and Spain, a more complex and ornate character. In the earlier epitaphs, moreover, sometimes occur traits more or less similar to the pagan epitaphs, e.g. mention of those who made the tomb, which by degrees disappear. They also contain a much greater number of acclamations, most of which soon vanish completely. In the 4th century Christian Latin epigraphy began to make a style of its own, and for the first time we now get at Rome such opening words as hic requiescit in pace, or in somno pacis, hic quiescit, hic jacet, hic positus est, &c.; and new rhetorical phrases, as mirae inventiæ, sapientiæ, sanctitatis, &c., begin to make their appearance. It is not until about this time that any mention of the secular profession of the deceased occurs in the Latin inscriptions; and it is not very commonly mentioned at any time. The chrisma and the cross, signs of a triumphant faith, now come in abundantly. The inscriptions of Gaul followed the style of Rome a good deal, and the same or similar formulæ appear upon them at a somewhat later time. It is in these Roman and Gaulish inscriptions that changes of style can best be studied, because they are so numerous, because so many of them bear dates, and, in fine, because they have been so admirably edited. M. De Rossi makes some remarks on the changes of style in the Roman inscriptions (Insc. Urb. Rom., Prolegom., pp. cx.-cxvi.), and will in another volume discuss totam stili epigraphici Christiani doctrinam. M. Le Blant, in the first fifty-eight pages of his Monuel, treats of the successive variations in the Gaulish inscriptions (few of which, however, are before the age of Constantine), and also establishes the fact that blank formulæ were in circulation for the use of stonecutters, where of course the number of years of the deceased or of the reigning king could only be expressed by the word tot or tantus, and that the stonecutter has sometimes neglected to replace the tantus by the particular number required. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 59-74.) Similarly in Spain traces of blank formulæ can be recognised (Hübner, u. s. p. viii.).

By means of a careful study of the phrases of the dated inscriptions a close approximation may sometimes be made to the date of an undated one; great caution, however, is necessary, as certain expressions held their place for a long period. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 31-33).

(vi.). Dates of Christian Inscriptions.

(a) Christian inscriptions, when dated, most usually bear the names of consuls, and all the earliest are thus dated. Sometimes one, more usually both consuls, are given, the names being commonly contracted. The abbreviation COS for consulibus was in use up to the middle of the 3rd century, after which COSS, CONS, and CONSS, came to be successively adopted: COS is very seldom found during the 4th century, and almost never in the 5th or 6th: COSS fell into disuse about the first quarter of the 5th century, and after that CONS was used.*

The numerals, to designate a second or third consulate, are frequently prefixed to COS and the other abbreviated forms; but where there is no ambiguity they are sometimes omitted. A very strange abbreviation was occasionally used, though in Christian inscriptions it is exceedingly rare: the names of the consuls were omitted and the numbers only retained. In an epitaph from a Christian crypt at Motya, in Sicily, to "Euterpe, the companion of the Muses," her death is fixed to Nov. 27, ἑπταία τῶν κυ [ρίων] τὸ ἰ καὶ τὸ γ' in the consulship of our Lords for the tenth time and for the third time, i. e. 360 A.D., when Constantius was in his tenth consulate, and Julian in his third. (Böckh, n. 9524.)

Another form of dating was by a post-consulate, i. e. the words POST CONSULATVM, or the abbreviations POST CONS, POST CONSS (or from the middle of the 5th century), P C, and even POST (or POS) only was placed before the consuls' names of the year preceding, "when it was not known who were the consuls of the year, or when the name of but one was known, or when it was necessary or expedient not to mention them" (McCaul, u. s. p. xxvi.). This formula, which is said to have arisen in the troublesome times of Maxentius, 307 A.D., rarely appears in Christian inscriptions till 542 A.D., when the post-consulate of Basil the younger was taken as a point of departure for almost the whole empire, and the years post consulatum Basilii extend up to xxix. The consulate of Justin in 566 A.D. gave birth to another era of post-consulates, which lasted nine years.

There are various other matters connected with consular dates which are intentionally passed over here. For the whole subject see De Rossi (Insc. Urb. Rom. pp. xiii.-liv.; and for an epitome of the more important parts, McCaul (u. s. p. xxiii.-xxvii.).[†]

(b) Other inscriptions are dated by an era, whether of a province or of a city. Examples of the former are seen in Spain and Mauretania; of the latter in various parts of Asia, where the eras of Antioch and Bostra (among others) obtained currency. Examples of these will be found above, and below under TOMB. In all these parts of the empire Christian inscriptions were very rarely dated by the consuls, and those are mostly of the 6th century (De Rossi, u. s. p. xiii.). For other eras employed in Christian inscriptions, see De Rossi (u. s. pp. v. vi.).

(c) Dates by Indictions* (or cycles of fifteen years) are not found in Christian inscriptions of Rome before the beginning of the 6th century. The earliest seems to be 522 A.D. (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 984). In Gaul, however, we find an inscription dated Ind. XV. Olibrio juniore cuns (consule), i. e. 491. A.D. (Le Blant, n. 388). The indictions themselves (which commence 312 A.D.), unless accompanied by other notes of time (as they often are), do not suffice to determine even approximately the year A.D.* For the first year of each cycle is counted as the first indiction, and thus the tenth indiction merely signifies the tenth year in some undetermined indiction. See De Rossi (u. s. De Cyclo Indictionum, pp. xcvi. - ci.)

* In Diocletian's time CONS. was first used for one consul, and CONSS. for two consuls; as well as CS. and CC. SS. similarly.

* These have been thought to be connected with the fifteen years of military service and the extraordinary tribute necessary for their payment from time to time, as adjusted by Constantine; but their origin is not altogether certain.

(d) For the mode of dating by solar and lunar cycles, i. e. by the day of the month, the day of the week, and the day of the moon, as compared with each other and with the year, the reader who desires to enter into so difficult a subject must consult De Rossi (u. s. pp. lxx. - xcvi.). See also MONTH; WEEK.

There are now to be noticed a few eras or modes of dating which are peculiar to the Christians.

(e) The era of the martyrs is only used in Egypt and the adjoining regions. A barbarous Greek inscription (n. 9121 Böckh) dates March 30, ἀπὸ μαρτύρων σθ, i. e. 209 of the Dioclesian era, which commenced August 29, 284 A.D., and so corresponding to 494 A.D. This era, invented and first used by the pagans, was adopted afterwards by the Christians, who more usually changed its name (Martigny, Dict. p. 532, and the references, also Böckh, n. 9134).

(f) Episcopal dates. A Roman epitaph (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 139) is dated DEPOSITA IN PACE SUB LIBE[RIO EP.], and another (n. 190) has RECESSIT III NON. IN PACE SVB DAMASO EPISCO. These are the only examples of the kind known, and do not prove that epitaphs were then dated purely and simply by the papal era, but rather that those who put them up wished to express their adhesion to the orthodox pontiffs and not to their opponents Felix and Ursicinus.†

But from the end of the 4th century it became common at Rome to date sacred buildings by inscriptions in which the pope's name occurred; thus we have in such connections SALVO SIRICIO EPISCOPO (like the SALVIS DD. NN. AUGUSTIS) and TEMPORIBVS SANCTI INNOCENTII EPISCOPI, and the still remaining inscription in the basilica of St. Sabina:

CVLLEN APOSTOLICVM CVM CAELESTINVS
HABERET
ORBE.

(De Rossi, u. s. pp. viii. ix). In the 5th and following century the custom of dating sacred buildings by bishops and other ecclesiastics spread abroad, and at length became very general throughout Europe; but public monuments of the provinces of the 4th, 5th, and even 6th and later centuries are dated by the eras of Mauretania or of Bostra or Antioch, or by consuls, or by the reigns of emperors (De Rossi, u. s. p. ix. and the references). Sometimes, but very rarely, the exact year of office of the bishop or abbot is given (De Rossi, u. s. and above, § iv. n. 11).

There are two other eras much employed in inscriptions soon after the period with which we are concerned, and which indeed at length almost superseded the others in common use—the Dionysian epoch of the Incarnation,* and the mundane era, which reckons the Creation at 5508 B.C. [ERA.]

(g) Bede brought the former into vogue in the beginning of the 8th century, and there are also some early inscriptions dated thereby. De Rossi affirms that he knows of no inscription of the first six centuries so dated. There is one of the year 617 A.D., which records the construction and consecration of a baptistery, at Brixia, by Domina nostra Flavia Theodolinda, which is thus dated at the end: vivente domino Adelvaldo sacrae salutis saeculo ccc ccc xvii (Marini, u. s. p. 170); besides this there is one at Interamna (Merni), dated AN. S. DCC. XXVII. (Marini, u. s. p. 157); others just below our period are a little differently expressed: one is dated AN. INCARNAT. DNI DCCCLVII IND V REGE LOVDOWICO IMP. AVG. (Marini, u. s. p. 85), and another is placed ANNO DOMINI DCCC LXIII (Marini, u. s. pp. 164, 5). All these are in connection with the dedication or building of sacred edifices.

(h) An early example* of the mundane era is furnished by an inscription on a tower at Nicaea in Bithynia, ἔτους ςτς, in the year 6316, corresponding to 808 A.D. (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8669). But as it is called "the tower of Michael, the great king in Christ, emperor," some error in the date (as edited) has slipped in. For Michael I. reigned from 811–813 A.D., and Michael II. from 820–829 A.D. Possibly the ς is a misreading for θ: if so, the date is 811 A.D. Another mutilated inscription, relative to the foundation of an arsenal (τοῦτον μεγαλότατον (sic) ἀρσηνάλην) by "Theophilus the king, son of Michael the king," is doubly dated, ἀπὸ κτίσεως (sic) κόσμου ςτμβ, ἀπὸ δὲ Χριστοῦ ἔτους ωλδ, the year 6342 of the mundane era, corresponding to the year 834 of the Christian era (Id. n. 8680).

(i) There are, in fine, inscriptions dated by the reigns or by the years of the reigns of the sovereigns of the kingdoms which sprung out of the ruins of the western empire. Examples occur in England, France, Spain, and Italy. (See above § iv., Nos. 5, 11, and Tomb.)

In like manner, after the consulate came to an end in 541 A.D., the year of the Byzantine emperor's reign, was occasionally placed on inscriptions as a date. An early example of the year 592 A.D., in the 11th year of Justinian II. (in an inscription relating to a church), is given in Böckh's C. I. G. n. 8651. Another less precise is dated by the joint reign (842–857 A.D.) of Theodora, Michael, and Thecla (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8683).

More than one mode of dating often occurs on the same monument, as by consuls and an indiction conjointly; by an era and a king conjointly;

* This was devised in 525 A.D. by Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot. For his purpose, which was neither literary nor historical, but simply had reference to Easter, see the late Professor Grote in the Cambridge Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, vol. i. pp. 68, 69, in a paper entitled 'On the dating of Ancient History,' where several subjects here touched upon are discussed.

† Probably there may exist somewhat earlier inscriptions dated by this era than those here referred to. "It began to prevail in the 7th century, and appears in the Paschal Chronicle" (C. I. G. n. 8680).

or by a king and an ecclesiastic conjointly. In addition to the years the months are often noted; these are in general the Roman months.

But the day of the month, whether of the death or of the burial, is sometimes in the more ancient inscriptions alone set down. Thus in a^b Roman inscription we have simply Fortunatus depositus III Kal. Oct. in pace; and in another, Laurentiu (sic) idus Ienuas (sic) decessit, followed by the chrisma (Marini, u. s. pp. 380, 387).

In Egypt, however, the Egyptian months are set down, either alone (Böckh, n. 9110), or together with an indiction (id. n. 9111), or with the era of "the martyrs" (id. 9121), or with an indiction together with the same era, under its proper name, "the year of Diocletian" (id. 9134).

The days are added to the months when these occur: usually computed according to the Roman kalendar by kalends, ides, and nones; but the cyclic inscriptions have the days of the week (die Veneris, die Saturnis (sic), &c.; also die Sabbati, die dominica), the days of the moon, or the octave of Easter. (See De Rossi, u. s.; McCaul, u. s. pp. 53-58.) In Egypt the day of the month is reckoned numerically, as the 21st of Tybi, the 10th of Phaophi, &c.

We have also examples, though they are not numerous, of epitaphs dated by saints' days. One at Briord, of about the 6th or 7th century, records of "Ricelfus et jugalis sua Guntello" that "obierunt in die Sci Martini, who probably himself died Nov. 8, A.D. 397 (Butler's Lives of Saints, under Nov. 11). M. Le Blant, who gives this inscription (n. 380), quotes other and earlier examples from the catacombs; such as Natale Susti, Natale Domnes Sitiretis, postea die martirorum, ante natale Domini Asteri, d. nat. Sci Marci.

In addition to the day the hour is sometimes added, and occasionally even the fraction (scrupulus) of the hour. See TOMB.

(vii.) Abbreviations used in Christian Inscriptions.—This catalogue might no doubt be enlarged considerably: it has been taken from Martigny (Dict. pp. 322-324, omitting, however, the numerals, L for quinquaginta, X for decem, and the like); and the writer has made various additions to it, mostly by help of Hübner's Index to his Spanish Inscriptions, p. 115.

^b Cardinal Wiseman says of the deceased Christians in early times that "annual commemoration had to be made on the very day of their departure, and accurate knowledge of this was necessary. Therefore, it alone was recorded" (Fabiola, p. 147). Even if this be the true reason (which is very much to be doubted), it remains to be explained why the day of burial alone is sometimes recorded. The truth seems to be, that some little incident which would be sufficient to remind the friends of the deceased, was sometimes regarded as date enough.

INSINUATIO. The making certain customary payments to the bishop on appointment to a church. See Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii, 1, c. 56). Justinian (Novell. 56, col. 5, tit. 11, § 1) provides that if any of the clergy make the payments which are called insinuatives, "quae vocantur insinuativa," except in the great church of Constantinople, the bishops who exact them shall be deprived of their office.

[P. O.]

INSTRUCTION. 1. For the Christian instruction of children in general, see CATECHUMEN, CHILDREN.

2. In a more special sense, the lections from the Old Testament read to the candidates for baptism immediately after the benediction of the font, and before the benediction of the font, on Easter Eve, were called "Instructiones baptizandorum." See the Gelasian Sacramentary (i. c. 43), and the Gregorian (p. 70). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 19) gives mystical reasons why the lections should be four in number, which however is by no means invariably the case. They are four in the Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), but the Gelasian Sacramentary gives ten and the Gregorian eight. Instruction of this kind seems to be alluded to in Palladius's description of the scene which took place when soldiers burst into John Chrysostom's church at Constantinople on Easter Eve; "some of the presbyters," he says (Vita Chrysost. c. 9) "were reading Holy Scriptures, others baptizing the catechumens." So Paschasius Lilybetanus, in a letter to Leo the Great (quoted by Martene), speaks of a case in which, after the accustomed lections of Easter Eve had been gone through, the candidates were not baptized, for lack of water (Martene, De Rit. Ant. i. i. 13, § 3). As in the responses of the candidates at Rome both Latin and Greek were used, so also the lections in baptism were in ancient times recited in Latin and Greek. Thus Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), after noticing that the reader does not announce the lection in the usual way, "Lectio libri Genesis," but begins at once "In principio," goes on to say, "First it is read in Greek, and then immediately by another in Latin." The next lection is read first in Greek and then in Latin; and so on. Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. ii. 1) says of this custom, that lections were recited by the ancient Romans in Greek and in Latin, partly because Greeks were present who did not understand Latin, and Latins who did not understand Greek; partly to show the unanimity of the two peoples. Anastasius tells us (p. 251, ed. Muratori) that pope Benedict III. (855–858) caused a volume to be prepared in which the lessons for Easter Eve and Pentecost were written out in Greek and in Latin, which volume, in a silver binding of beautiful workmanship, he offered to a Roman church. [C.]

INSTRUMENTA. By the word instrumenta we understand vessels, &c. employed in the sacred ministry; thus, pope Siricius, A.D. 385 (Epist. I. ad Himerium, c. 14), forbidding persons who had incurred public penance to be ordained, says, "nulla debent gerendorum sacramentorum instrumenta suscipere qui dudum fuerunt vasa vitiorum."

By the words "instrumentorum traditio" is technically designated the handing to a person on ordination some vessel or instrument used in his office. Thus, the African statutes at the end of the 4th century (Conc. Carth. IV. c. 5) order the bishop to hand to a subdeacon on ordination an empty chalice and an empty paten, and the archdeacon to hand to him a water vessel with a napkin, because he receives no imposition of hands. Similarly the acolyte (c. 6) is to receive from the archdeacon a candlestick with taper; the exorcist (c. 7) is to receive from the hand of the bishop the book of exorcisms; the reader (c. 8) the codex from which he is to read; the doorkeeper (c. 9) the keys of the church.

In these cases it is to be observed that the "instrumentorum traditio" takes place only in the case of those ordained to minor orders (in-sacratu ministri) who received no imposition of hands.

The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, provides (c. 28) that a bishop who is restored to his orders shall receive from the bishops, before the altar, stole, ring, and staff; a priest, stole and chasuble; a deacon, stole and alb; a subdeacon, paten and chalice; and that those in other orders shall receive back on restoration those instruments which they had first received on ordination. We see from this that the appropriate vestments were regarded in the 7th century as the outward sign of the bestowal of the higher orders. The delivery of the pastoral staff and ring also forms part of the ceremony of the ordination of a bishop in the Pontificals of Gregory the Great and of Egbert [BISHOP, p. 222].

In later times, the handing of the chalice with wine and the paten with a host to a priest on ordination came to be regarded as the "matter" of the sacrament, while the "form" was the words "Accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo missasque celebrare tam pro vivis quam pro defunctis in nomine Domini." But this opinion not only has no support in Scripture, but it seems to have been totally unknown in the church for at least nine hundred years; Isidore, Amalarius, Rabanus, and Walafrid Strabo, know nothing of it. (Martene, De Rit. Ant. l. viii. 9, § 16.) [C.]

INSULANI. A designation of monks in Southern France in the 5th century, on account of the great reputation of the monasteries and of their schools on the islands near the coast, especially on the island Lerina (Lerins) (Bingh. Orig. Eccl. VII. ii. 14). [I. G. S.]

INTERCESSION (Intercessio, ἐντεύξις). It does not fall within the scope of the present work to discuss or to investigate historically the doctrine of the intercession of the saints, or of the nature and efficacy of intercessory prayer generally; the subject is considered here simply in its relation to liturgical forms. And here we have to consider (1) the persons whose intercession is asked; (2) the objects on behalf of which intercession is made.

(1.) a. Throughout the Western church a large portion of the prayers end with a pleading of the merits of Christ, the great Intercessor; generally in the form "per Christum Dominum nostrum." This is in fact an extension to all prayer of the principle laid down for the altar-prayers, "cum altari assistitur semper ad Patrem dirigitur oratio" (Conc. Const. III. c. 23); when the prayer is addressed to the Father, it is through the intercession of the Son. This principle is not adopted in the East, where the prayers, being addressed to the Triune Deity, generally end with an ascription of glory; if with a pleading of merits, it is of the Virgin Mary or the saints (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i. 374).

b. We may take the words of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. V. 9, p. 328) as an authentic account of the manner in which the intercession of the saints departed was invoked in the church of Jerusalem in the middle of the 4th century. "Then we also commemorate those who have gone to rest before us (τῶν προκεκοιμημένων), first patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs; that God at their prayers and intercessions (πρεσβείαις) would receive our supplication." It appears then that in Cyril's time the church asked the intercession of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs; for the rest of the faithful departed, including "holy fathers and bishops," it interceded [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269; DIPTYCHS, p. 560]. But it is "beyond all question that the early church offered the eucharistic sacrifice as well for the highest saints, and even for the blessed Virgin Mary, as for the common multitude of the departed faithful" (Neale, Eastern Ch. Int. 510). The intercession of saints, for whom at the same time intercession is made, is asked in the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where we have the following form (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 360):—"We offer to Thee also this reasonable service on behalf of (ὡπέρ) those who are at rest in the faith, our forefathers, fathers, patriarchs. . . and every just spirit made perfect in the faith; especially our most holy . . . Lady Mary, Mother of God and ever Virgin . . . for the holy Prophet, Forerunner, and Baptist, John; for the glorious and highly-praised Apostles; for Saint N. whose commemoration we are celebrating, and all Thy saints; at whose supplications (intercessions) look upon us, O God. And remember all who have gone to rest before us in hope of the resurrection to eternal life." Then follow the diptychs. The Syriac St. James (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. ii. 36), after commemorating holy Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, St. John Baptist, St. Stephen, the Virgin, and all Saints, proceeds, "Therefore do we commemorate them, that when they stand before Thy throne, they may remember us in our weakness and frailty, and offer with us to Thee this awful and unbloody sacrifice, for the safe-keeping of those who are living, for the consolation of the feeble and unworthy, such as ourselves; for the rest and good memory of those who have passed away in the true faith, our fathers, brethren, and masters." Here the saints departed are represented as joining in one great act of intercession with those on earth, rather than as interceding for them. These may serve as examples of the manner of asking the intercession of the saints in the Eastern church.

Of the Western liturgies, Mabillon's Gallican (Daniel's Codex Lit. i. 75) has, after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, "We pray for the souls of Thy servants, our fathers and former teachers, Aurelian, Peter, Florentinus . . . and all our brothers whom Thou hast vouchsafed to call hence to Thee; . . . for the souls of all faithful servants and pilgrims deceased in the peace of the church; that Thou, O Lord our God, wouldest grant them pardon, and rest eternal: by the merits and intercession of Thy Saints, Mary mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, Stephen, Peter, Paul, John, James, Andrew, Philip, Thomas, Bartholomew, Matthew, James, Simon, Jude, Matthias, Genesius, Symphorianus, Basilides, Victor, Hilary, bishop and confessor, Martin, bishop and confessor, Caesarius, bishop, vouchsafe in mercy to hear and grant these petitions, who livest and reignest in the unity of the Holy Spirit, God for ever and ever." The Roman has the following in the Canon of the Mass:—"Claiming fellowship with and venerating the memory of, first, the glorious ever-virgin Mary, mother of our God and Lord Jesus Christ; and also of Thy blessed apostles and martyrs, Peter and Paul, Andrew, James, John, Thomas, James, Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Simon, and Thad-daeus : Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Xystus, Cornelius, Cyprian, Laurence, Chrysogonus, John and Paul, Cosmas and Damian: and all Thy saints: in consideration of whose merits and prayers, grant that in all things we may be guarded by the help of Thy protection." The Ambrosian (Daniel i. 84) has, besides these, the names of Apollinaris, Vitalis, Nazarius and Celsus, Protasius and Gervasius. [Compare IMAGES, § viii.; INSCRIPTIONS, p. 856.]

The rule of the church in St. Augustine's time drew a broad distinction between martyrs and other saints; for that father observes (In Joann. Tract. 84), "So at the Table of the Lord we do not commemorate martyrs in the same way that we do others who rest in peace, so as to pray for them, but rather that they may pray for us, that we may follow in their footsteps;" and again (De Verb. Apost. 17), "martyrs are recited at the altar of God in that place where prayer is not made for them; for the rest of the dead who are commemorated prayer is made." It is in accordance with this that the Roman canon, besides the Virgin and the twelve apostles, recites as intercessors twelve martyrs. Other churches however, out of respect to their local saints, did not (as we see in the Gallican and the Milanese) draw so rigid a line, and inserted the names of confessors as well as martyrs. The martyrs of the Roman canon seem to be all connected with the city or see of Rome. [See LIBELLI, MARTYRS.]

In the EMBOLISMUS of the Lord's Prayer, the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies pray for peace in our days at the intercession of (intercedente) the Virgin Mary with the apostles Peter and Paul and Andrew and all the saints (Daniel i. 96). In the benediction of incense, in the Roman use (Dan. i. 72), the priest prays that God will bless it, at the intercession (per intercessionem) of Michael the archangel, who stands at the right hand of the altar of incense.

(2.) With regard to the objects of intercession, we may say that Christians have been taught to make intercession for all things of which they know that their brethren have need. Such intercessions are scattered over a great variety of offices or litanies [LITANY]. With regard specially to the intercessions made in the eucharist, we will take the form of the Greek St. James (Daniel, iv. 14) as a specimen of the objects recited in the great eucharistic intercession. When the priest, after consecration, has prayed that the Body and Blood of Christ may be to the partakers for remission of sins, for the strengthening of the Holy Catholic Church, etc., he proceeds—"We offer (προσφέρουμεν) to Thee, Lord, on behalf of (ὕπέρ) the Holy Places, especially Zion; the Holy Catholic Church; holy fathers, brethren, bishops; all cities and countries and the orthodox who dwell there; those who are journeying; those fathers and brethren who are in bonds, imprisonment, mines or tortures; the sick and demoniac; every Christian soul in trouble; those who labour in Christ's name; for all men, for peace, and for the dispersion of scandal and heresy; for rain and fruitful seasons; for those who have adorned the churches or shown pity to the poor; for those who desire to be remembered in our prayers; those who have offered; the celebrant and his deacons; all spirits and all flesh, from Abel even to this day, "give them rest in the land of the living, in Thy kingdom, in the bliss of Paradise, in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, our holy fathers, whence sorrow and grief and mourning have fled away;" for the forgiveness of sins, "by the grace and mercy and compassion of Thy only-begotten Son;" for (ὕπέρ) the Gifts, that God may receive them into His spiritual sanctuary.

INTERCESSION, EPISCOPAL. By a custom which grew up less by any definite enactment than by the general respect attaching to their office, the bishops came to be looked upon as protectors of those who were oppressed by the secular power. The patrimony of widows and orphans was often placed under the protection of the churches and bishops (Aug. Ep. 252). Flavian, bishop of Antioch, interceded successfully in A.D. 387 with the Emperor Theodosius, on behalf of the city, which had been guilty of a riot. So Theodoret with the Empress Pulcheria. Many other instances might be cited. These interpositions obtained the technical name of intercessio, and were recognised by the law. The bishop was expected to visit the public prisons on Thursday and Friday (Codex Justinian. lib. i. tit. 4). They were charged with a special oversight of such as held civil office in their dioceses (Concil. Arelat. I. c. 56, Conc. Arel. ii. c. 13, "ut comites iudices, seu reliquos populus obedientes sit episcopo, et invicem consentiant ad iustitias faciendas, et munera pro iudicio non recipiant, nec falsos testes, ne per hoc pervertant iudicia justorum," Conc. Gener. tom. ii. p. 618, ed. Crabbe). The right of sanctuary for fugitives in the churches grew up in the same period, and was very frequently exercised (Cod. Theodos. l. ix. tit. 45, ap. Neander). See Neale, Introd. to Eastern Church, and essay by Moultrie in Neale's Ecclesiology, pp. 427-474: Neander's Church History, vol. iii. sect. 2. [BISHOP, p. 237; IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY, p. 824.]

INTERCESSORES or INTERVENTORES. In the African churches when a see was vacant the senior bishop appointed one of his suffragans as guardian or procurator. He was styled Intercessor or Interventor. The fifth council of Carthage made a canon that no intercessor should remain in this office more than a year, and that if the vacancy was not then filled, another should be appointed. No intercessor was permitted to be chosen bishop of the vacant see himself. So also in the Roman province, as we learn from the letters of Symmachus (Ep. v. c. 9) and Gregory the Great (Ep. ii. 16); Suicer (Thesaurus, s. v. μεστρης); Bingham (Ant. lib. ii. c. 15, and iv. c. 2). [BISHOP, p. 237.]

INTERMENT. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD.]

INTERPRETER. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. n. 21) speaks of interpreters of the languages employed both in reading the Scriptures and the sermons, and ranks them among the lower orders of the clergy, after the exorcists. An instance of their existence is afforded in the case of Procopius, who is said to have discharged three offices in the church of Palestine, having been reader, exorcist, and interpreter of the Syrian language. (Acta Procop. apud Vales.; note in Euseb. Martyr. Palest. c. 1.) [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE.] [P. O.]

INTERROGATIO (sc. de fide). This is a questioning a candidate for baptism as to his belief, before he was baptized, and formed part of the office of baptism from very early times. After the RENUNCIATION (Abrenunciatio) of the devil by the candidate for baptism, and his anointing, and before he was baptized he was questioned as to his faith, and called upon to make public profession of it. The custom is frequently alluded to by the fathers. It is sufficient here to refer: (1) For the custom: to St. Augustine (de Animâ et origine ejus, l. 10). "Ideo cum baptizantur (i. e. pueri) jam et symbolum reddunt, et ipsi pro se ad interrogata respondent." (2) For its object to St. Cyprian (Ep. 70 ad Januarius de baptizandis hæreticis). "Ipsa interrogatio quæ fit in baptismo testis est veritatis." (3) For its substance, to St. Ambrose (de Mysterioribus, v. 28). "Descendisti igitur (i. e. in fontem) recordare quid responderis, quod credas in Patrem, credas in Filium, credas in Spiritum Sanctum;" and more fully de Sacramentis lib. ii. vii. "Interrogatus es: Credis in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem? Dixisti: Credo, et mersisti, hoc est, sepultus es. Iterum interrogatus es: Credis in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, et in crucem ejus? Dixisti: Credo, et mersisti; ideo et Christo es conspuitus; qui enim Christo conspuitur, cum Christo resurgit. Tertio interrogatus es: Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti: Credo, tertio mersisti; ut multiplicem lapsum superioris ætatis absolveret trina confessio."

The rite is still retained in the office of Baptism in the Roman church, in the same position as of old: and in the Greek church in the preliminary office of "making a catechumen" (εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι κατηχούμενον).

The forms of the questions closely resemble the old forms [v. Rit. Rom. de Sacramento Baptisandi, and Euchologion εὐχολογία εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι κατηχούμενον]. For further details and patristic references see Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. 47. See also BAPTISM, §§ 43, 46, pp. 159, 160; CREED § 4, p. 489; PROFESSION.

[H. J. H.]

INTERSTITIA. These are intervals of time which according to the regulations of the church ought to elapse between the reception of one order and the admission to a superior. Their object was to exercise a cleric in the functions of his order, and to test his fitness for promotion to a higher. The institution is an old one in the church. The tenth canon of the council of Sardica decrees "Hæbit autem unusquisque ordinis gradus non minimi scilicet temporis longitudinem per quod et fides et morum probitas et constantia et moderatio possit cognosci." The duration of these interstitia was not determined at the first, and it has varied much at different times and places. Zosimus e.g., A.D. 417 (Ep. 1 ad Hesychium) proposes the following rule. "If any one has been designed for ecclesiastical ministration from his infancy, he is to remain among the readers till his twentieth year. If he has devoted himself to the sacred ministry when grown and of ripe age, provided he has done so immediately after baptism, he is to be kept among the readers or exorcists five years.

CHRIST. ANT.

Then he is to spend four years as an acolyte or subdeacon. Then if deserving he is to be promoted to the diaconate, in which order he is to remain five years, and, if worthy, promoted to the priesthood." Another canon prescribes that a bishop must have been at least four years a priest. [It must be remembered that in the early church the age required for conferring holy orders was more advanced than is the case at present, twenty-five being the ordinary age for a deacon, and thirty for a priest.]

Gelasius (A.D. 492) shortened the prescribed intervals between the different sacred orders, and in cases of urgency they were occasionally altogether dispensed with. Of this the most conspicuous instance is that of St. Ambrose, who is said to have passed through all the sacred orders and to have been consecrated bishop on the eighth day after his baptism.

In process of time, as the proper functions assigned to the several minor orders fell into disuse, the interstices between them ceased to be observed, and the modern practice is to confer the four minor orders simultaneously. The council of Trent requires a year between the minor orders and the subdiaconate, between the subdiaconate and the diaconate, and between the diaconate and the priesthood. Legitimate exceptions are recognised, and dispensations under certain conditions allowed; but two (major) orders are not to be conferred on the same day: "Duo sacri ordines non eadem die, privilegiis ac indultis . . . non obstantibus quibuscunque" (Con. Trent. Sept. xxiii. col. 3; De Reform.) [ORDINATION.] [H. J. H.]

INTERVENTORES. [INTERCESSORES.]

INTROIT. Introitus is the name commonly given throughout the Latin church to the anthem at the beginning of the eucharistic office. At Rome it was originally called Antiphona and Introito, as in the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus (i. n. 8, ii. n. 3, iii. n. 8, in Musæ. Ital. tom. ii.). In Ordo Romanus VI. (n. 2, ib.), probably a little later than our period, it is first called introitus simply. Meanwhile in one Ordo (v. n. 5, ib.), we find the name of invitational given to it. At Milan it was termed ingressa (Ambros. Miss. Ritus in Pamellii Rituali ss. 11. p. tom. i. p. 293), a word of the same meaning as introitus. In Spain (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, pp. 18, 55, 64, &c.) and in England (the missals of Sarum, York, Hereford; Maskell's Ancient Liturgy, pp. 20, 21) the introit was called officium, or officium missæ. This arose from a mistake. The several masses in the early missals were headed by the words Ad Missam Officium (Leslie, ut s. pp. 1, 7, 10, &c.; Missæ Sarum, coll. 1, 18, 27, &c., ed. Forbes), which were the heading of the whole office, but were supposed to refer to the introit which followed immediately without any heading of its own. The antiphon had this name in all the churches of Normandy, and in many others (Le Brun, L'apologie de la Messe, p. ii. art. 1), and in the missals of the Carthusians, Carmelites, and Dominicans. This extended use would be a sufficient proof of its great antiquity, were we without the evidence of the Mozarabic ritual. In the barbarous Expositio Missæ, ascribed to Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, and certainly not much later than his time, the introit, as used in the old Gallican liturgy, is called praelegere, or antiphona ad praelegendo (sic), because it preceded the eucharistic lessons (Expos. printed in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. 1).

The origin of the introit is obscure. At the earliest period the office began with lessons from holy Scripture, of which psalms said or sung formed a part, but this psalmody is in the West to be traced in the GRADUAL and TRACT. In the Syrian rite a psalm is sung before as well as after the epistle, but this appears to have had the same origin (Ordo Communis; Renaud. Liturg. Orient. tom. ii. p. 7). The introit is clearly another rite, and of later introduction. It seems to have been introduced partly as a fitting accompaniment of the solemn entrance (introitus, ingressa) of the celebrant into that part of the church in which the altar stood, and partly as a means of employing and solemnizing the minds of the people before the service began. The name invitatory suggests that the people were still entering the church while it was being sung.

The Ordo Romanus in its earliest state, about 730, gives us some suggestive information respecting the introit as sung in the churches of Rome at that time. The bishop having vested is still in the secretarium, the choir waiting in the church for an order from him to begin "the antiphon for the entrance" (introitum). On a signal from him "ut psallant," a subdeacon enters the church, orders the candles to be lighted, and then stands with a censer before the door of the secretarium, while one of the leaders of the choir, who has also been in waiting, carries the order for the singing to commence. As soon as this is heard two deacons enter, and each taking a hand of the bishop lead him into the church, up to the altar. He is preceded by the subdeacon with incense, and seven acolytes bearing candles. On his way to the altar the Sancta or FERMENTUM is brought to him that he may select what is necessary for the celebration. After private prayer at the altar, and giving the peace to the ministers, he stops the singing by giving a signal for the Gloria Patri (Grd. Rom. I. nn. 7, 8; comp. ii. nn. 4, 5, iii. nn. 7, 8, v. n. 5, vi. n. 3).

The Liber Pontificalis is supposed to ascribe the introduction of the introit to Celestine, A.D. 423, when it tells us that he "ordered the 150 psalms of David to be sung antiphonally before the sacrifice" (Anastas. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 44). The tradition probably refers to the introit, although the next statement shows that the author connects it with the earlier Gradual. For he adds:—"This was not done before, only the epistles of the apostle Paul were recited and the holy gospel, and so masses were celebrated." It will be observed that the Ordo cited calls the introit an antiphon, though it uses the word psallere. Gregory the Great, A.D. 595, is said to have compiled the antiphons, selecting proper verses from the psalms, and retaining the Gloria, which was then said, as now, at the end of every psalm. Some ancient writers, as Amalarius (De Eccl. Officiis, lib. iii. c. 5), Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 22), and Micrologus (De Eccl. Observ. c. 1), suppose that this selection was the work of Celestine; but Honorius of Autun, more in consonance with the words of the Liber Pontificalis, and with the circumstantial evidence of the case, says,—“Pope Celestine ordered psalms to be sung at the introit of the mass, from which pope Gregory afterwards arranged and compiled antiphons for the introit of the mass” (Gemma Animae, lib. i. c. 87). All the psalms in the antiphonary ascribed to Gregory are taken from the old Italic version, as it stood before the corrections of St. Jerome, but this is no proof of an earlier antiquity of the introits than we ascribe to them. For Gregory himself professed to use the Italic and the Vulgate versions of the Bible indifferently (Ep. ad Leandr. c. 5, in fine; Expos. in Lib. Job. praeef.), and Jerome’s corrected Italic psalter, long called the Gallican psalter, did not take the place of the original at Rome until the time of Pius V. (Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 3, § 4). The following example of the Gregorian introit is for the first Sunday in Advent:—"Antiph. Ad Te, Domine, levavi animam meam. Deus meus in Te confido: non erubescam neque irideat me inimicus meus (Vulg. irideant me inimici mei) etenim universi qui Te expectant (Vulg. sustinent Te) non confunduntur (Ps. xxv. 1-3). Psalm. Vias Tuas, Domine, demonstra mihi et semitas tuas edoce me" (ib. v. 4). Durandus (Rationale, lib. iv. c. 5, n. 5) tells us that "in some churches tropes are said for the psalms, according to the appointment of pope Gregory, to represent greater joy on account of the coming of Christ." The introit itself had long been thought designed to "bring back His advent to our mind" (Amalar. De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. c. 5); but Durandus is without doubt wrong in ascribing to Gregory the attempt to emphasize that meaning by the addition of tropes. We cannot, however, say at what period subsequent to his they first appeared. They were not like the Greek troparia, independent of the antiphons in connection with which they were sung, but were farsings or interpolations in the antiphons of the Gregorian introit. In the following example the farsing is in italics. The antiphon is that for the Epiphany:—"Ejja, Sion gaude, et lactare aspectu Dei tui. Ecce advenit dominator Dominus; cui misteries coeli et terrae famulantur; et regnum in manu ejus. Ipsi manet Deus (sic) gloriae atque jubilatio; et potestas et imperium" (Pamelii, Ritule, tom. ii. p. 613; comp. p. 73).

Of the Gallican introit we only know that like the Roman it was sung before the office of the mass began. "While the clerks are singing psalms" (psallentibus), says Germanus (u. s.), "the priest comes forth out of the sacrum" (here=secretarium). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, appears to recognize the introit, when it orders that as in other churches "collects be said in order by the bishops and presbyters after the antiphons" (cap. 30). The following is the introit (taken from the original Italic version of Ps. xciii. 1) used in the Mozarabic liturgy on every Sunday between Whitsunday and Advent, and again on the Circumcision and the Sundays before and after the Epiphany:—"Dominus regnavit; decorem induit: Alleluia. Y. Induit Dominus fortitudinem et praecinxit se. P. (Presbyter). Alleluia. Y. Gloria et honor Patri: et Filio: et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum: Amen. P. Alleluia." It will be seen that this belongs to the later period, when the celebrant was at the altar before the choir began, a rule which has prevailed in the church of Rome also for many ages. See Sala, Annot. 11, in Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1; and Le Brun, Explication, p. ii. art. 1. The Ambrosian ingressa is very simple. The following is for Christmas Day, from Is. ix. 6, Ital. vers. "Puer natus est nobis, et filius datus est nobis, cuius imperium super humerum ejus, et vocabitur nomen ejus magni consilii angelus" (Pamelius, u. s. tom. i. p. 293). "It is an anthem without psalm, or Gloria, or repetition" (Le Brun, Diss. iii. art. 2).

The following hymn is sung in the liturgy of St. James before the priest enters to the altar. It is preceded by the rubric, "Then the deacon begins to sing in the entrance," which at once suggests an analogy to the Western introit. "Only begotten Son and Word of God, who being immortal didst for our salvation take upon Thee to be incarnate of the holy Mary, mother of God and ever Virgin, and didst unchangeably become man, and wast crucified, O Christ (our) God, and didst by death trample on death, being one of the Holy Trinity, glorified together with the Father and the Holy Ghost, save us" (Liturgiae SS. PP. p. 6, Bas. 1560). The matter of this hymn proves it to be later than the outbreak of the Nestorian heresy; but its great antiquity is sufficiently attested by its appearing also in the liturgies of St. Mark (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. tom. i. p. 136), in copies, apparently the older, of St. Basil (Eucholog. Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin version, Liturgiae, sive Missae SS. PP. p. 32, Par. 1560), in many copies of St. Chrysostom (Goar, u. s. pp. 101, 105), and in the Armenian (Neale's Introd. to Hist. of East. Church, p. 380). In St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, however, we have a nearer approach to, and the probable origin of, the Western introit, viz., in three antiphons, composed for common days, of three or four verses (Rubric in St. Basil, Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin, p. 32) of the 92nd, 93rd, and 95th psalms (as numbered in E. V.). See Goar, pp. 101, 104, 105. While each antiphon is sung, a prayer is said secretly by the priest; and it may be interesting to mention that the "Prayer of St. Chrysostom," in our daily office, is in the Greek liturgy (Lit. PP. pp. 45, 81) the "Prayer of the Third Antiphon." The revisers of our offices were familiar with it in the translation of St. Chrysostom by Leo Thuscus, A.D. 1180 (printed by Hofmeister, in 1540), and in the Greek and Latin of the editions of Venice, 1528, and Paris, 1557, and introduced it at the end of the litany in 1544. When the Greek antiphons were first used is not known. Amalarius, writing about the year 833, says that he had heard the 95th psalm sung at Constantinople "in the church of St. Sophia at the beginning of mass" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 21). The use of the antiphon by the Nestorians and Jacobites seems to carry us up to the 5th century, in which they were separated from the church. On Sundays the Greek church commonly substituted "typica" (so-called because they were forms prescribed by the rubrics) for the first two antiphons, and the Beatitudes for the third (Goar, pp. 65-67; Liturg. PP. pp. 44, 80-82), with verses (τροπάρια) commemorating the saint of the day (Goar, u. s.). The liturgic typica are from the 103rd and 146th psalms (Demetrius Ducas, in Lebrun, Diss. VI. art. iv.; Leo Allatius, De Libris Eccl. Diss. I. p. 14). For the third antiphon may also be used on common days, the third and sixth canticle (when thus united called τρίεκπη) of the matin office (Goar, pp. 67, 124). The typica, we must add, are not sung on every Sunday. "It should be known," says the Typicon of Sabas, "that from New Sunday to the Feast of All Saints (i. e. from the octave of Easter to that of Whitsunday) the church sings antiphons and not typica. We sing the antiphons likewise in the Twelve Days (between Christmas and Epiphany), and on the memorials of saints which we keep as feasts" (In Leo Allat. u. s.).

The Syrian rite preserves a fragment of the 93rd psalm and nearly the whole of the 95th, at the beginning of the service. They are sung while the veils and the altar are being censed (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 3, 4). In the Nestorian liturgies, the priest and deacon, standing near the altar, say, in alternate verses, on common days, parts of psalms 15, 150, 117: and proper hymns on Sundays and the greater festivals (Badger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 215; Raulin, Liturgia Malabarica, p. 294; Renaud. tom. ii. p. 584). In the Armenian, beside the hymn before mentioned, there are hymns proper to the day, sung where the Greek has its antiphons (Le Brun, Diss. X. art. 12).

Cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1) suggests that "perhaps Celestine (in adopting the introit) transferred to the Western churches a custom which had long flourished in the Eastern." The great use made, as we have seen, of the 93rd psalm (Dominus regnavit) in the introits of Spain, creates a strong suspicion that Spain was a borrower from the Greeks, in whose liturgy that psalm was used on all common days and many Sundays in the year. Hence it is probable that the introit was, like some other rites, derived by Rome from the East through Spain.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS. [Cross, FINDING OF THE, p. 503.]

INVESTITURE. The Latin word Investitura (from vestire, to put into possession; see Ducange s. v.), is of later date than the 9th century; nor had the thing signified by it really commenced by then, in the sense which concerns us here: the putting ecclesiastics in possession of their temporalities by a formal act of the civil power. When Sigebert, quoted by Gratian (Dist. lxxiii. c. 22), in enumerating the privileges supposed by him to have been conferred on Charlemagne by Adrian I., says of that pope: "Insuper archiepiscopos et episcopos per singulas provincias ab eo investituram accipere definivit: et nisi a rege laudetur et investitur episcopus, a nullo consecratur," he is, apart from the doubtfulness of the fact (on which see De Marca, de Concord. viii. 12), making the pope depose, not merely to language, but to customs unknown in his day. Landulph, who was contemporary with Sigebert, is bolder still; making Adrian the inventor of both. "Qui primus," as he says of him, "annulos et virgas ad investendum episcopatus Carolo donavit" (Hist. Mediol. ii. 11); but then he couples another incident with this tale, which explains its origin. The absence of notice in the Caroline capitularies of any such custom, and their apparent ignorance of the word itself, seems conclusive against the existence of either at that date: particularly as the word "vestitura" is of frequent occurrence in them, denoting either possession, or the payment for it. Of course there were symbolical forms also then in use for giving possession, but none peculiar, as yet, to the clergy; and the common name for the act of doing this was "traditio." Hence, probably, the new word arose from joining the two words, "in vestitura," in one; and then understanding it of the special formality by which the clergy were put in possession of their temporalities, on this becoming essential to possession in their case. That Charlemagne, as well as his predecessors, appointed bishops of his own choosing occasionally to sees in his dominions, is no more than had been done by the Greek emperors ages before, where investiture in its Western acceptation has never been known. Neither the Theodosian Code, nor the Code or Novels of Justinian exhibit traces of anything approaching to it, though by the latter limits are prescribed to the fees for enthronization (Novel. cxxiii. 3: see also Du Cange and Hofman, s.v.; Sirmond ap. Baluz. Capitul. ii. 802; and Thomassin. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discipl. II. ii. 38). [E. S. Ff.]

INVITATORIUM. In the Gregorian and Benedictine * offices the psalm "Venite exultemus Domino" xciv. [E. V. xc.] is said daily at the beginning of Nocturns prefaced by an antiphon which is called the Invitatorium. It is of precisely the same character as other antiphons to psalms, and varies with the day, but is said differently from other antiphons, and repeated several times during the course of the psalm as well as at the beginning and end. Thus the ordinary Sunday invitatory is "Adoremus Dominum, qui fecit nos," which is said twice at the beginning of the psalm, and repeated in whole or in part five times during its course, and again after the Gloria.

On the Epiphany no invitatory was said; but the psalmody began, and still begins, with the psalms of the first nocturn with their antiphons [Hodie non cantamus Invitatorium, sed absolute incipimus. Rubric ex Antiphonario Vaticano Rom. Eccl.]^b and the psalm "Venite" was said with its own antiphon as the last psalm of the second nocturn. [Later it was said as the first psalm of the third nocturn, and its antiphon repeated during its course in the ordinary manner of an invitatory]. Amalarius (lib. iv. c. 33) and Durandus (lib. vi. c. 36) suggest that the reason for this omission may have been to mark the difference between the invitation to the faithful to praise God, and that which Herod gave to the scribes and doctors to find out where Christ should be born. More probably it was omitted [Martene de Rit. lib. iv. c. 14] simply because the psalm to which it belonged was said in another place, though why the psalm should be displaced from its ordinary position is not so clear.

The psalm "Venite" is also known as the "Invitatory Psalm."

In the Ambrosian psalter, "Venite" is not said at the beginning of the office, and there is no antiphon which corresponds to the Gregorian Invitatorium. [H. J. H.]

IRELAND, COUNCILS OF (Hibernica concilia). But two such are recorded before A.D. 800, both held by St. Patrick, according to Spelman (Conc. p. 49 and seq.), A.D. 450 or 456, viz. in his 80th or 86th year, assisted by his coadjutors, Bishops. Auxilius and Iserninus. At least the 34 canons passed at the first run in their joint names. The discipline prescribed in them indicates very primitive manners. By the 6th any clerk, from the doorkeeper to the priest seen abroad without his shirt, and with his nakedness uncovered, if his hair be not tonsured in the Roman style, and his wife walk out with her head unveiled, is to be lightly regarded by the laity, and excluded from the church. Thirty-one canons of a similar description are given to the other council. But these 65 by no means exhaust the number ascribed to St. Patrick. Seventeen more from other sources are supplied by Mansi (vi. 519-22). Another collection of Irish canons, supposed to be earlier than the 8th century, may be seen in Dachery's Spécil. by Baluze, i. 491 and seq., and a supplement to them in Martene and Durand, Anec. iv. 1-21. ^b Amalarius c. xi writes: "Nostra regio in praesenti officio [i. e. in die Epip.] solita est unum omittere de consueto more, id est Invitatorium;" as if the custom were local; but from what he says in the passage referred to in the text, it would seem that it soon became general. Some French churches, however, among which were those of Lyons and Rouen, were in the habit of singing the Invitatory on the Epiphany. At Lyons it was sung with special solemnity (Martene ut sup.).

Eusebius saw the statue himself, but its being meant for our Lord seems to have been matter of tradition. *Τούτων τὸν ἀνδριάντα εἰκόνα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ φέρειν ἔλεγον. JAMES THE GREATER, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend.—By the name of James the Greater, the son of Zebedee is distinguished from the other apostle of the same name. The epithet would seem to have regard either to stature or to age, though some, with apparently less likelihood, would make it refer (1) to priority in the call to the apostleship, or (2) to higher privileges in intercourse with Christ, or (3) to the dignity of an earlier martyrdom.

The elder brother of St. John, universally believed to have been the last survivor of the apostles, St. James was the first to be called away, having been beheaded by Herod Agrippa I., shortly before the Passover of 44 A.D. Out of a mass of tradition concerning him, the only point supported by any adequate evidence is the incident related by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 9) on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, of the conversion of St. James's accuser as the apostle was led away to death. Struck by his steadfastness, he too embraced Christ, and the apostle and his accuser suffered together.

The stories, however, of St. James's connection with Spain are deserving of very little credit. In spite of such plain statements as Acts viii. 1 (very lamely met by Baronius), the apostle is made to undertake a missionary journey into Spain after the death of Stephen, returning to Jerusalem before A.D. 44. The ancient evidence for such a story is of the weakest. Isidore of Seville (ob. 636 A.D.) does say (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 71; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151), if indeed the work is his, which is certainly doubtful, that St. James preached the gospel to the natives of Spain and the Western regions;^a and the same statement is found in the Collectanea, once wrongly attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 545). Mere unsupported statements, however, of so late a date can amount to very little. It is worthy of notice too that at a much earlier period, Innocent I. (ob. 417 A.D.) states that no church had been founded throughout Italy, Gaul, or Spain, except by those who owed their authority directly or indirectly to St. Peter (Ep. 25 ad Decentium, c. 2; Patrol. xx. 552). With every allowance for the desire of a bishop of Rome to exalt the see of St. Peter, so sweeping a statement could hardly have been ventured on, had there been a strongly established tradition as to St. James's connection with Spain. Ambrose evidently knew no such legend, for he speaks of St. Paul's projected journey into Spain being "quia illic Christus non erat praedicatus" (Comm. in Ep. ad Rom. xv. 24; Patrol. xvii. 176); nor did Jerome, for he mentions St. Paul's journeys having reached even to Spain, immediately after referring to the apostle's never building "super alterius fundamentum, ubi jam fuerat praedicatum" (Comm. in Amos, v. 8 sqq.; vol. vi. 291, ed. Vallarsi). Baronius (notes to Martyrologium Romanum; July 25), in summing up concerning these legends, can only urge "non esse adeo impossibilia, vel haberi pro monstro, ut putant aliqui."

The story of the translation of the apostle's body into Spain is obviously totally apocryphal. It is to the effect that after his body had been interred at Jerusalem, his disciples removed it to Iria Flavia, in the far north-west of Spain. (For an elementary form of the story see the Martyrologies [July 25] of Usuard and Notker; Patrol. cxxiv. 295, cxxxi. 1125: those of Bede and Wandelbert ignore it.) Here it was discovered early in the 9th century, and removed to Compostella (a corruption of Giacomo Postolo, ad Jacobum Apostolum), a few miles distant, by order of Alphonso II., king of Asturias and Leon (ob. 842 A.D.). For a very full account of these legends, see Cuper in the Acta Sanctorum (July, vol. v. pp. 3 sqq.); also Mariana, De adventu Jacobi Apostoli majoris in Hispaniam, in his Tractatus, Col. Agr. 1609; Tolra, Justificación historico-crítica de la venida de Santiago el Mayor á España, y de su sepulcro in Compostela. Matriti, 1797; Arevalus, Isidoriana, c. 61 (Patrol. lxxxi. 382 sqq.), and sundry writings in connection with St. James, wrongly attributed to pope Callixtus II. (Patrol. clxiii. 1370 sqq.). Strangely, however, in spite of this lack of evidence, the legend took such root in Spain, as practically to count there as an article of faith, and thus we find Luther holding it necessary to protest against such a view (Sämmtliche Schriften, xv. 1864, ed. Walch).

For the wild legends connecting St. James with the false teachers Hermogenes and Philetus, reference may be made to the Historia Apostolica of the pseudo-Abdias, lib. iv., in which, it may be remarked in passing, there is no allusion whatever to Spain (Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, vol. ii. p. 516 sqq. ed. 1719).

2. Festival of St. James.—The date when St. James was first commemorated by a festival cannot be determined very closely. It is well known that at first the only apostles who had a special festival were St. Peter and St. Paul, and that the others gradually obtained separate commemorations afterwards. In the case of St. James, the notices are such as to point to the conclusion that the festival was one which only made its way very gradually, and that the date at which it had attained general observance was quite late. We find a mention, it is true, in the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, where for December 27 is this notice: "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae [here probably Evangelistae should be read] et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On the other hand, many ancient Sacramentaries give no indication of the existence of a festival of St. James. The Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 403) and Gregorian (col. 115, ed. Menard), as we now have them, do so, the forms being almost identical in the two cases; but the Leonine and Gelasian pass it over. In the ancient Gallican Liturgy edited by Mabillon, to which we have referred below, it will be seen that St. James is commemorated, together with his brother, on December 27, but in the Gallican Lectionary the festival is of St. John alone, and in the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry's Spicilegium, xiii. 390), the notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Ordinatio Episcopatus Jacobi Apostoli fratris Domini et Adsumptio Sancti Joannis Evangelistae." In the Gothic Breviary edited by Lorenzana, a form is provided for a festival of St. James on December 30 (Patrol. lxxvi. 1306), but there is none in the Mozarabic Missal. The Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 766 A.D.) has no notice of such a festival. Additional evidence to the same effect may be found in the fact that the earliest traces of a vigil of a festival of St.

^a This writing speaks of St. James as buried "in Marmarica" (al. Carmarica, &c.), a name which does not seem to have been satisfactorily explained.

James are of very late date. Binterim (Denk r. v. 1. 401) asserts that the vigil does not occur at all in calendars before the 10th century. Even so late, however, as the 13th century, the festival itself does not appear to have attained universal acceptance; for in the canons of the council of Oxford (1222 A.D.) it is not included in the list of the chief festivals observed in England (can. 8; Labbe xi. 274). At the council of Cognac in France (1256 A.D.) the case is somewhat doubtful, yet taking the context into consideration (cf. can. 19), the words "duodecim Apostolorum, et maxime Petri et Pauli, Andreae, Jacobi . . ." perhaps point to separate festivals and not to the collective festival of the apostles (can. 21; Labbe xi. 749: cf. Conc. Tolosanum [1229 A.D.], can. 26, op. cit. 433, where the probability seems to incline the other way). We may appeal, however, finally to the proceedings of the synod of Exeter (1287 A.D.), where the festivals to be observed are named in their several months, and where the entry for July is, "Translationis S. Thomae martyris, Sanctae Mariae Magdaleneae, S. Jacobi Apostoli majoris" (can. 23, op. cit. 1288).

Besides this vagueness as to the date of the origin of the festival, the utmost latitude also prevails as to the day when it was to be celebrated. We have evidence indeed of a kind which is wanting in the case of every other apostle, for from Acts xii. 4 we may assume that St. James was put to death shortly before the Passover. Still, in the Western church, perhaps from the wish not to have a celebration of a martyrdom in Lent and Eastertide, we generally find St. James's festival on July 25.^b The calendar of the church of Carthage associates him, as we have seen, with his brother John on December 27; as does also the Gothico-Gallic Missal, where the heading for the day is "in Natale Apostolorum Jacobi et Johannis" (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. iii. p. 196). [In the Gothic calendar, however, prefixed to Lorenzana's edition of the Gothic Breviary, we find on December 30, "Jacobus frater Joannis Apostoli et Evangelistae," following the notice on December 29, "Jacobus, frater Domini," Patrol. lxxxvi. 19.] The same combination too meets us in the calendar of the Armenian church on December 28 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 804), and in that of the Ethiopic church on September 27 (Ludolf, Firsi Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 5). The calendar of the Byzantine church appoints April 30 for the commemoration of St. James, and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxv.) κτείνε μάχαίρα φόνου Ἰακώβου ἐν τριακόστῃ. In the martyrology given by Cardinal Sirletus, besides the commemoration on April 30, there is also noted on November 15, "Natalis SS. Baruch et Jacobi, fratris Joannis Theologi" (see Canisius, Thesaurus, vol. iii. pp. 427, 486).

The spring period is also recognised in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars. In the former, besides the festival mentioned above, there are also commemorations on February 4 and April 12 of St. James, apparently the son of Zebedee (Ludolf, pp. 20, 26). The Coptic calendar has generally a very close affinity with the preceding, and, like it, has a festival of St. James (defined as the son of Zebedee) on April 12; and also on February 12 of a James, presumably the present, and on April 30 of a James, defined as the son of Zebedee.^c

3. Whether or no it is due to the early date of this apostle's martyrdom, but little literature is directly associated with his name. The canonical epistle of James is indeed assigned to him in the subscription of a Corbey MS. of the old Latin version cited by Tischendorf (in loc.), and also in the passage of Isidore already referred to. This theory, however, is exceedingly improbable, and need not be further referred to here.

A pretended discovery was made near Granada in Spain in 1595 A.D. of the remains of two of St. James's disciples, and with them of eighteen books on leaden plates, including several by St. James, which with the others were condemned by Innocent XI. in 1682 A.D. (Fabricius, Code's Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, iii. 725; Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. vii. pp. 285, 393).

JAMES THE LESS, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—It does not fall within our present province to discuss the question whether James, the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve apostles, is or is not the same as James, the Lord's brother, bishop of Jerusalem. The probability seems to incline in favour of the non-identity of the two, but there are considerable difficulties attending either hypothesis; and the matter will be found discussed at length in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. Of ancient liturgies, martyrologies and calendars, some identify, while others distinguish them; and hence it may perhaps be most convenient here to collect together the various notices under either designation.

It may be remarked at the outset that if James, the son of Alphaeus, be a different person from James the Lord's brother, there is almost a complete lack of tradition as to his history. The ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks of his being martyred in Persia (Patrol. xxx. 478), and the Greek metrical Ephemerides, which we have cited below, assert that he was crucified; but it is impossible to say what amount of belief is to be given to either of these statements. James, the ^c It should be noticed that sundry slight variations from Ludolf's calendar of the Egyptian church occur in those given by Selden (de Synodis Veterum Liberum, pp. 210 sqq.; ed. Amsterdam, 1679). Here one calendar gives Feb. 11, the other Feb. 12; one April 11, the other April 12; and one (the other has "accident") has April 29 for April 30.

^b The statement of some writers (e.g. Augusti, Denk r. iii. 227) that this particular day is the anniversary of the translation of the saint's remains to Compostella, is one whose proof and dis-proof is equally impossible.

Lord's brother, on the other hand, fills a prominent place in the history of the Acts, he is referred to by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians in a way that sufficiently indicates his importance, and there can be no doubt that it is to him we owe the so-called Catholic Epistle of St. James. Ecclesiastical tradition also tells much concerning him, and the account of his martyrdom given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 23) from Hegesippus is doubtless substantially correct. It is not, however, necessary to repeat here what has already been said in the Bible Dictionary, to which reference may be made.

2. Festival.—The exact date of the rise of a special festival of St. James, whether as the son of Alphaeus or as the Lord's brother, is hard to fix. Like those of most of the apostles, it is comparatively late. Among the earliest witnesses, we may mention the Martyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrology of Bede, and the ancient liturgies referred to below. The first of these, as well as other early Roman martyrologies, commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on June 22, and also James, the Lord's brother, on March 15, April 25, and December 27. On the last of these there is associated with the "Assumptio S. Joannis Evangelistae," also the "Ordinatio episcopatus S. Jacobi fratris Domini," a combination to which we shall again refer. There is also in this martyrology, as we now have it, a commemoration of James, not further defined, but obviously the present, on May 1. The metrical martyrology of Bede commemorates St. Philip and St. James together on May 1, the latter, it will be seen, defined as the Lord's brother,

This has been the general custom throughout the Western church, and so we find it in the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv. 1161), Gregorian (col. 101, ed. Menard) and Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 370) liturgies. The reason for this combination of apostles, and for the choice of this particular day does not appear. Schulting (Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica ii. 130) simply states that it is because of the translation of the relics of the two on that day in the Pontificate of Pelagius I. (ob. 560 A.D.). We are not aware that anything can be adduced in support of this statement beyond the remark of Anastasius Bibliothecarius that under Pelagius I., "initiated basilica Apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi" (Vitae Pontificum; Pelagius I. Patrol. cxxviii. 614), where we see the two names already associated.

It is stated by the Micrologus that this festival was originally one of all the apostles; there seems, however, to be no real evidence for the assertion "ideo etiam invenitur in martyrologiis sive in Sacramentariis festivitas Sanctorum Jacobi et Philippi et omnium Apostolorum" (de Eccl. Observ. c. 55; Patrol. cli. 1017). This is followed, however, by sundry liturgical writers, e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animae iii. 140; Patrol. clxxii. 681), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. vii. 10).

Besides the festival of May 1, the Ambrosian liturgy also commemorates on Dec. 30 the "ordinatio B. Jacobi Alphaei Apostoli" (op. cit. 309), resembling the already cited notice of the Martyrologium Hieronymi; and we may again refer to the entry in the Martyrologium Gellonese quoted in the preceding article. The Gallican liturgy, published by Mabillon, omits altogether the festival of St. James, whether as son of Alphaeus or as brother of the Lord; but in the Mozarabic missal we find a commemoration of "S. Jacobus, frater Domini" on Dec. 29. We may take this opportunity of adding that the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel there are respectively Wisdom xviii. 20–24; i. Tim. i. 18–ii. 8; Luke viii. 23, 27, John xii. 24–26, xiii. 16, 17, 20, xv. 6, 12, 13 (Patrol. lxxxv. 104). In the Mozarabic Breviary, the form is merely headed "in festo S. Jacobi Apostoli" (Patrol. lxxxvi. 136), but there are numerous references to the martyrdom of James, the Lord's brother, at Jerusalem.

The Byzantine calendar distinguishes the son of Alphaeus from the Lord's brother, the former being commemorated on Oct. 9, the latter on Oct. 23; and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. lviii.),—ἀμφ' ἐνδὲν Ἰάκωβος ἐνὶ σταυρῷ τεταάνυστο, and ἐσθλὸν ἀδελφὸθεον τριτάτῃ ξύλῳ εἰκάδι πληῆσαν. In the Armenian church, besides the commemoration of the two sons of Zebedee on Dec. 28, there are also commemorations on August 31 of "Thomas and James, Apostles," and on Dec. 23 of "James, Apostle" (Neale, Eastern Church; Intro. pp. 801, 804). In the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches given in Ludolf's Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, we find that the former commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on October 2, and James, the Lord's brother, on October 23, and that they both commemorate this latter on July 12. Besides this, the Coptic calendar has on Feb. 12, and the Ethiopic on Feb. 4, a James, an apostle, not otherwise specified.^a

It may be remarked here that many of the customs which still characterize the day on which the Western church commemorates St. James, have obviously sprung from lingering heathen usages. These are, as a rule, connected with the idea of the return of spring, and thus are in some sense parallel to those associated with the festivals of Christmas and St. John the Baptist's day, which dwell on the idea of the returning and retreating sun. [CHRISTMAS; JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF.]

Thus the gathering of flowers and the adorning of houses with them on May-day morning may fairly be connected with the Roman festival of the Floralia held on the five days following April 28; similar festivals to which were also held in other places, as the Anthesphoria in Sicily, etc.

A trace of the ancient sun-worship is still to be found in one of the customs prevalent on this day among Celtic peoples, and notably the Irish and Highland peasantry, viz., the lighting of great fires in the open air; and thus the common Irish name for the day, is La Bealtine (day of Beal's or Baal's fire), and similarly in Gaelic.

^a It may be noted that one of the Egyptian calendars, given by Selden (de Synedriis Vetrum Ebraeorum, pp. 215, 219; ed. Amsterdam, 1673) puts Feb. 11 for Feb. 12, and July 11 for July 12.

Customs also with the same central idea existed among the ancient Gothic nations (see Olaus Magnus, Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus xv. 8, p. 503, ed. Rome, 1555).

3. With the name of the person or persons now before us, more literature is associated than in the case of the son of Zebedee. Besides the Canonical Epistle of St. James, there are still extant the so-called Proteuangelium Jacobi, the most respectable of the Apocryphal gospels, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. It is possible too that at one time there existed other pseudonymous writings bearing the name of St. James, for we find Innocent I. in alluding to sundry works of this class, mention those which "sub nomine . . . Jacobi minoris . . . damnanda" (Ep. 6 ad Exsuperum c. 7, Patrol. xx. 502). Again, in the records of a council held at Rome in 494 A.D., under the episcopate of Gelasius, it is ruled "Evangelium [et Evangelia] nomine Jacobi minoris, Apocryphum" (Patrol. lix. 162, 175, 176). Apocryphal letters to St. James from St. Peter and St. Clement are prefixed to the various editions of the Clementine Homilies (see e.g. Cotelierus, Patres Apost. i. 602, ed. 1700). The Apostolic Constitutions again (viii. 23), cite James, the son of Alphaeus, as giving rules respecting confessors and virgins; and some forms of the text, but apparently not the best, give (c. xxxv.) rules as to divine service claiming the authority of James, the Lord's brother.

JERUSALEM, COUNCILS OF (Hierosolymitana Concilia). (1) A.D. 47, says Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 38); Baronius and others, A.D. 51: the third, in chronological order, of the meetings of the Apostles recorded in their Acts, but the only one deserving the name of a synod. Its proceedings are described there (c. xv.). A controversy having arisen at Antioch, over which according to Eusebius (Chron. ad l.) Euodius had been appointed bishop as far back as A.D. 43, on the necessity of circumcising the Gentile converts and obliging them to keep the law of Moses, it was referred to the Apostles and elders at Jerusalem for decision, SS. Paul and Barnabas being sent thither for that purpose. The Apostles and elders came together, accordingly, to consider of it. St. Peter spoke first, and gave his opinion against burdening the disciples with any such yoke. Then all the multitude—in other words, the body of believers, or brethren who were present—listened to the reports given of the conversion of the Gentiles that had been achieved on their first expedition as missionaries into Asia Minor by SS. Paul and Barnabas. After which St. James, as bishop, doubtless, of Jerusalem, delivered his "sentence;" which was embodied in the synodical letter, addressed in the name of the Apostles and elders and brethren, finally, to the brethren of the Gentiles in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, and sent by two principal men of their own number, in addition to SS. Paul and Barnabas. On reaching Antioch, the bearers of this epistle gathered the multitude together and delivered it, when its contents having been read caused great joy.

(2) Mansi's reasons for dating this council A.D. 349 seem conclusive (ii. 171, note). Constans, who ruled in the West, threatened his brother Constantius with hostilities, if St. Athanasius, in whose favour the Sardican council had pronounced two years before, was not restored to his see; and Gregory, his rival, having died in the early part of this year, his return was allowed. In his way he stopped at Jerusalem, when a synod was held under its orthodox bishop, Maximus, and a letter despatched from it to congratulate the Alexandrians on this act of grace on the part of the emperors: which Constans, however, did not live to see carried out, as he was slain in Jan. 350. And Maximus having held this synod without leave from his metropolitan, Acacius, bishop of Caesarea, was ejected by him in another synod a few months later, to be succeeded by St. Cyril, then catechist, and a supposed Arian.

(3) A.D. 399. A synod of bishops, met to celebrate the feast of the dedication of the church there, acknowledge the receipt of a synodical epistle from Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, condemning some of the errors of Origen lately revived in his diocese, and profess their agreement with it (Mansi, iii. 989-92).

(4) A.D. 415. What we should call a diocesan synod: of presbyters, that is, under their bishop, John. Orosius, the historian, then on a mission from St. Augustine to St. Jerome, was present at it, and gives an account of its proceedings. Pelagius being there, and accused by him of heresy, was invited to come in, and put on his defence. Neither what he said, nor what Orosius said, were considered altogether unexceptionable by the bishop, who proposed that letters should be sent to Pope Innocent of Rome on the subject, and that all should abide by what he decreed (Mansi, iv. 307-12).

(5) A.D. 518, to express its adhesion to the Constantinopolitan synod of the same year (see the art.): its own synodical letter being also preserved in the subsequent council under Mennas.

(6) A.D. 536, Sept. 19: under Peter, its patriarch, on receipt of the acts of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, between four and five months previously, with the edict of the Emperor Justinian confirming them, and a letter from Mennas to Peter acquainting him with their contents (see the article on this council). The deacon and notary present having recited them, they were received synodically by Peter, and subscribed to by forty-eight bishops, with himself at their head (Mansi, viii. 1164-76).

(7) A.D. 553, under its patriarch, Eustochius, at which the acts of the 5th council were received and confirmed.

(8) A.D. 634, under Sophronius, on his elevation as patriarch, to condemn Monothelism, against which he had contended with so much ardour as monk previously. The encyclical epistle sent by him on this occasion to the bishops of Rome and Constantinople is preserved in the 11th action of the 6th council where it was recited (Mansi, x. 649-52). [E. S. Ff.]

JESUS. [JOSHUA.]

JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS OF. I. The symbolic representations of the Lord are discussed severally, as under the titles FISH, IXOTC, LAMB, VINE; see also SYMBOLISM. For the pictorial types of the Lord derived from the Old Testament, see OLD TESTAMENT IN CHRISTIAN ART; for pagan types used to represent Him, see PAGANISM IN CHRISTIAN ART. For representations on gems, see GEMS, §§ xii. and xiii. p. 718; on the bottoms of cups, see GLASS, CHRISTIAN, p. 732. See also IMAGES, p. 813; and NUMISMATICS. Setting aside such representations as these, it is to be observed, in the first instance, that He is represented in the human form from the earliest times of Christian art as the Good Shepherd; and this symbolic picture, though in no case whatever considered as a portrait, must have made the idea of representations of His human form a very familiar one at all times in the Roman and other Western churches—and in earlier centuries, in the Byzantine also. One of the latest, and the most important perhaps of all these, is the often described Good Shepherd of the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, middle fifth century: and one of the earliest ideal portraits of our Lord is found in the church of St. Apollinaris, built a century later within the walls of that city. In art these two figures mark the transition from the elder Graeco-Roman ideas and traditions of art to the later style, properly called Byzantine. The leading difference in feeling and principle between them will be illustrated in the course of this article: for the present it may briefly be thus stated: that in the earlier illustration of the Lord's Parable of Himself, the attempt at beauty predominates, and is far from unsuccessful; whereas in the Byzantine picture of St. Apollinaris, though considerable beauty of feature is retained, the tendency to the ascetic or melancholy ideal of later art, both Italian and German, is unmistakably visible.

It is perhaps fortunate that the words of St. Augustine (De Trinitate viii. 4, 5) put it apparently beyond question, that the world cannot possess now, and did not possess in his time, any authentic record whatever of the bodily appearance of Jesus Christ the God-Man on earth. "Nam et ipsius Dominicae facies Carnis innumerablem cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur; quae tamen una erat, quaecunque erat." Two centuries before, indeed, St. Irenaeus (contra Haeres. 1. 25) had spoken, with indignant absence of comment, of certain Gnostic representations of Christ, both painted and sculptured, as it appears. "Quasdam quidem [imagines] quasi depictas, quasdam autem et de reliqua materia fabricatas habent, dicentes formam Christi factam a Pilato, illo in tempore quo fuit Jesus cum hominibus. Et has coronant, et proponunt eas cum imaginibus mundi philosophorum, videlicet cum imagine Pythagorae, et Platonis, et Aristotelis." These passages seem conclusive to the effect that no real portrait of our Lord existed, or was remembered as existing, in the 2nd century. Indeed as Martigny observes, the controversy (dating from the 2nd century) with regard to the human comeliness of our Lord's body visible on earth, makes it perfectly certain, were proof necessary, that no authentic portrait of Him ever existed. Augustine acknowledges without blame the universal tendency of thought to picture to itself persons and events by imaginative effort, instancing St. Paul in particular, and taking it for certain, as it probably may be, that each of all the innumerable readers of the epistles will form a different idea of his own about the author's appearance, though none can say whose will be nearest the truth.

In his mind then, and indeed in our own, all ideal or fancy portraits of our Lord, so called, are merely symbolic of His humanity; and in this view, the crucifix itself may be taken as a symbol only of the fact of His death and the doctrine of His sacrifice for man; however the word sacrifice be defined or enlarged upon; and this may certainly make its presence in Christian churches not only allowable but desirable. We may observe on the different relation of the church to the arts in Augustine's days, when Christian art of a well marked and distinctive character existed, from the state of things in the time of Tertullian, who protests against all simulacra, likenesses, or representations whatever, and, as he well might in the presence of the whole Pantheon, considers all images or likenesses practically the same as idols.^a Human art, however, was adopted by the church along with human thought and learning. We cannot tell whether Tertullian knew or cared for the catacomb-paintings of Rome. Some of them, as those in the more ancient part of St. Domitilla, were certainly in existence before his time; but he seems, in the presence of the heathen, to protest against all paintings whatever, and the fact that St. Augustine not unwillingly accepts them, is an illustration of a highly natural change of Christian feeling on the matter.^b

The more ancient usage of representing the Lord as the Good Shepherd culminates in the Mosaic of Galla Placidia's chapel. A far higher antiquity is claimed for the no-longer existing portrait-head of Christ, which Bosio represents, from a chapel of the Callixtine catacomb.

Head of Christ from the Callixtine catacomb. (Martigny.)

There is a general opinion that it may have been of as early date as the 2nd century: and what we know of it may well induce us to believe that it was the original of that ideal of our Lord's countenance which has passed, through Leonardo da Vinci, into all Christian painting. Lord Lindsay, however, says that the traditional Head with which Europe is so familiar, was unknown in the West till the 4th century, when the original was sent to Constantia, sister of Constantine, by Eusebius of Caesarea. It is therefore of Byzantine or Eastern origin. The earliest example, he continues, is a supposed 4th century mosaic, found originally in the Callixtine, and now in the Vatican. See Eusebius's letter in Labbe, Conc. t. vi. col. 493 sq. This letter repudiates (rhetorically but with sincerity) any idea of our Lord's real appearance, and from it and the passage in Hist. Ecc. (viii. 19) it appears that Eusebius had not seen any historic portrait which he (or indeed others) believed on evidence to be a genuine likeness [IMAGES, § III.]. Others of the same type are repeated on sarcophagi, dating from that of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359; see Bottari, tav. xv. xxi.-xxv. xliii. xlv.; the latter represents the paintings in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, probably renewed over older pictures in the time of pope Adrian I. (A.D. 772-775). This catacomb also contains a highly ornamented cross, which is evidently intended to represent the person of our Lord [CROSS].

The assertion of the idea that our Lord not only took upon Him the flesh of mankind, but the "form of a servant," or slave, all bodily ugliness instead of beauty, is derived from meditation on the prophetic text (Is. liii. 2), "He hath no form nor comeliness;" as the natural thought of His beauty from the Messianic Psalm (xlv. 3), "Thou art fairer than the children of men." The former view seems to have been entertained, or is nowise discouraged by Justin Martyr, who twice uses the word αἰδώς of our Lord: meaning evidently to repeat the expression of Isaiah (Dial. cum Tryph. cc. 85 and 88). So Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. III. 1) appeals to the two texts to which we have referred on the same side. Compare Stromata, ii. 5, § 22; iii. 17, § 103; vi. 17, § 151. Tertullian may be supposed to have thought likewise (Adv. Jud. c. 14): "Ne aspectu quidem honestus;" (De carne Christi, c. 9) "Adeo nec humane honestatis corpus fuit." He infers from the cruelty of Jews and soldiers at the crucifixion, that such insults could not have been offered to the Lord, had His person possessed any beauty. So Origen (c. Cel. vi. 75, p. 327, Spencer), who, however, held that the Lord could appear in whatever form he pleased (Ib. ii. p. 99f.). A list is given by Molanus (Hist. Sacramenti Imaginum, p. 403) by which it appears that St. Jerome (in Matt. ix. 9; Epist. 65, ad Princip. c. 8), St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 [al. 28] in Matt. p. 328; and on Ps. 44 [45] p. 162), and Theodoret, followed the text which speaks of Him as fairest of all men, St. Basil and St. Cyril of Alexandria (little to our surprise) taking the other side. This unedifying controversy belongs to art rather than to theology. The Oriental, or Egyptian, or ascetic view of the human body, would necessarily have weight on the ill-favoured side, theologically speaking. And in practical art, the want of skill, and also of models possessing any degree of earthly good looks, must have borne strongly in the same direction. Beauty of expression was too subtle a thing for the hands of the Mosaicists of the 8th and 9th centuries.

There were various reasons why the ideal of bodily beauty should gradually be lost, up to the 12th century. It has often been remarked that as the ascetic life was more and more severely enforced on the faithful, and the sufferings of the later Roman world bore more and more severely on the whole community, the honour of the body of man was lost and forgotten. In the earlier Gothic days, strength and manly beauty must have been associated in the eyes of the Monastic Church only with the ignorance and fierceness of barbarian soldiers. The Christian assembly on earth, under the hands of Alaric and Genseric, Attila and Alboin, was utterly hopeless of any good on earth. The eastern end of a Byzantine or Romanesque church from the 6th century, begins accordingly to be adorned as a mystical representation of heaven, beyond the wilderness of earth, with the portrait figure of Christ as its centre. The Lord, whom all seek so piteously, shall suddenly come to His temple; and the eyes of distressed congregations are allowed a vision in symbol of His presence breaking in on the distresses of later days. One of the earliest examples of churches thus ornamented is that of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome. Here the figure of our Lord coming with clouds and standing on the firmament, is grand and sublime in the highest degree, and is perhaps the earliest or greatest instance of very early date, in which passionate conception, supported by powerful colour, forces itself, without any other advantage, into the foremost ranks of art-creation. The towering and all commanding form of the Lord must have seemed to "fill the whole temple;" with the symbolic hand of the First Person of the Trinity above His Head, and the Holy Dove on His right hand. The mystic Jordan, or River of Death, is at His feet, and on its other side, with small rocks and trees to indicate the wilderness of this world, are the twelve sheep of His flock, with the houses of Jerusalem and Bethlehem; He, Himself, appearing again in the centre on earth as the Lamb of the elder dispensation. The same idea is similarly treated in the early 9th century decorations of St. Prassede. The form of the Lord is tall and spare, not without grandeur, but markedly ascetic: the signs of the other Two Persons of the Holy Trinity are with Him, and He is surrounded with all the imagery of the Apocalypse; with this grand addition, that on the spandrels of the Arch of Triumph before Him, the twenty-four elders are inlaid in white and gold mosaic, in the united act of casting their crowns before Him. He appears below as the Lamb; and the same symbol is repeated at the top of the Arch of Triumph, laid on an ornamented altar-table—as the Paschal Lamb that was slain. The Offering of the Crowns by the Elders was also represented on the triumphal arch of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, and the author of an interesting article on Portraits of Christ (Quarterly Rev. Oct. 1867) says it still exists, having been rescued from the flames in 1823. There were, or still exist, similar figures, in the Vatican Basilica of St. Peter (De Sac. Aedif. xiii. xiv.) in St. Constantia, (ib. xxxii.) St. Andrew in Barbara (V. M. l. lxxvi.) St. Agatha Major in Ravenna (I. xlv.) and St. Michael of Ravenna (II. xvii.) &c. The greater part of these mosaics will be found photographed in the unique collection of Mr. J. H. Parker, which, in spite of all the deficiencies of the photographs, gives an idea of the tessellated work which does not exist elsewhere. To historians, or students of Christian art, their importance is, that by the presence of the sheep of Christ's church, they connect His Glorified Form with the more ancient catacomb representations of the Good Shepherd.

In St. Andrea in Barbara, the Lord stands on the Rock of the Four Rivers, and He is thus represented very frequently on the sarcophagi. See Aringhi, vol. I. p. 280 (Probus and Proba) and pp. 293, 297. On that of Junius Bassus (Aringhi I. 277) and elsewhere, He is sitting above a half-veiled figure representing the firmament or clouds of heaven [FIRMAMENT].

The figure described above from SS. Cosmas and Damianus possesses awe and grandeur, and can dispense with regularity or sweetness of feature. But the very earliest ideal portraits certainly possessed this; and it is one instance of the cheerfulness of spirit which Mr. Lecky notices in the Primitive Church, that the remnants of Graeco-Roman skill were devoted to such works as Bosio's picture (above) must have been; or the other mentioned by Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri pp. 21 and 64) as "maestosa figura del Salvatore, come quella dipinta nel cimitero di Ponziano." The question stands on and indicates one of those great human divergences of character and thought, which determine the lives and conduct of whole generations: and it will be remembered how the Mediaeval German or hard-featured ideal was set forth against the Lionardesque; not altogether without the countenance of Dürer and Holbein. On this subject, the last chapter but one of vol. iv. of Ruskin's Modern Painters, is worthy of grave attention. There is no doubt, further, that Protestant asceticism often resembles that of earlier days, in a certain suspicion of beauty as carnal and idolatrous.

The Gnostic images of our Lord (see St. Irenaeus supra) are also worthy of attention. One was set up by Marcellina (Aug. de Haeres. vii.), a follower of Carpocrates, and adored along with others of St. Paul, Homer, and Pythagoras; and the eclectic Lararium of Alexander Severus, containing the statues of Christ, of Abraham, Orpheus, and Apollonius of Tyana, is mentioned by Lampridius (In Alex. Severum xxix.). Raoul Rochette (Discours sur les types imit. p. 21), is referred to by Martigny for a "pierre basilidienne," which he thinks may give an idea of the type of portraiture which was in vogue among that class of sectaries. It is altogether different, in any case, from that of the Callixtine and other catacombs; and for further contrast with it, he gives a woodcut (reproduced above) of that which he considers, on De Rossi's authority, indisputably the most ancient of all representations of our Lord. It is taken from a portrait on ivory, in the Christian Museum of the Vatican.

The classic type which insists on personal beauty, is by far the most common on the sarcophagi, and all early monuments. Christian artists in fact seem, as was natural, to have invested their ideal with comeliness as long as they had skill to do so. The dress (of course excepting the Good-Shepherd representations), is invariably the tunic and pallium, sometimes ornamented with the stripes or clavi (Ciampini Vet. Mon. ii. p. 60, i. 184, xlvi.). The idea of white raiment generally seems to be intended, though gold, dark imperial blue, and other colours are used in the mosaics. The white and glistening raiment of the Transfiguration will account for this (Ciampini Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xvi. i. tab. lxxvii.). Our Lord is generally shod with sandals, if at all. The cothurnus is given apparently in Aringhi, vol. i. lib. ii. c. x. pp. 332, 333, and something resembling it is worn by the Good Shepherd (Aringhi, vol. ii. pp. 63, 67, 75, 79, &c.)

Portraits of our Lord are generally youthful, as symbolizing His eternal nature, even (Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 213) when He instructs the apostles (Bottari, cxi.). In the dispute with the doctors His youth is of course insisted on, but He is not made small of stature, whereas in pictures of the miracles, as has been frequently remarked, His figure greatly exceeds His human companions in height. This is the case also (Aringhi, i. pp. 307, 313 and passim), where any dead persons are carved on their tomb as presented before him, as in many 'bisomatus' sarcophagi of husband and wife. A beautiful illustration of this tradition of early Christian work in later times will be found in Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. iii. p. 78, where this distinction is used by the artist, with the detail of the human figures partly hiding themselves in the folds of the robes of attendant angels, who are inferior in size to the divine figure, though of superhuman stature. The Lord sometimes stands or sits on a sphere (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 270, tab. vii.), probably to give the idea of all things being put under his feet. He is accompanied by attesting angels, or His form is represented, full length or half-size, on a medallion supported by angels, as in the diptych of Rambona, and very frequently in the mosaics of Rome and Ravenna. These medallions are sometimes called IMAGINES CLIPEATAE, the use of them being probably derived from portrait-images on shields of ancient times. The cross sometimes represents our Lord thus borne. This seems to point to the Ascension, and to his glory as Lord of Hosts or of Sabaoth. It is not our work to follow the idea into its various developments in the angelic choirs of the middle ages, for which we may refer to Lord Lindsay, and to Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art. But a curious example of transition from the circular or oval medallion into the Gothic quatrefoil, containing the figure of our Lord, and supported by angels, still remains in the College-Hall or Refectory at Worcester, and is certainly derived from classic or Byzantine antiquity.

Our Lord frequently bears a rod or wand, especially in representations of the miracles, apparently as an emblem of his power over nature, or as the leader of His people in the wilderness, with a reference to Moses. The rod or volume very often appears in His hand, as committed to St. Peter and St. Paul or other apostles, or when He instructs the disciples. The full-grown rather than the youthful type appears in such examples, as in Bottari, clxxvi. See woodcut reproduced below.

Frequent representations of the Second Person of the Trinity as present at some transaction narrated in the Old Testament, or as the anti-type of some typical event or person. Martigny mentions a glass vessel in Garrucci (Vetri, xiii. 13), in which He is with Daniel, who is giving the cakes to the dragon. A more certain and satisfactory example is in His appearance with the three holy children in the furnace, Bottari, xxii. xli. See also Gori (Thes. diptych. t. iii. tab. 8) where He stretches the cross out over the flames. The representation of the holy Three appearing to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 2), in S. Vitale at Ravenna is well-known, and Ciampini's plate is now supplemented or super-

We may conclude with the mnemonic lines of St. Damasus (Carm. vi. Patrolog. Migne, t. xlii. col. 378), of the symbolic or other names and titles applied to our Lord up to his days.

II. Besides the representations of the Lord which strictly belong to art, there are others which have an archaeological rather than an artistic interest. We have ancient assistants—(1) of portraits of the Lord produced in the ordinary manner; and (2) of portraits of the Lord produced miraculously. Some of both kinds are even believed still to exist.

(1) Ordinary Representations.—Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 18) tells us that at Caesarea Philippi [Panaes] there existed a group in bronze representing a woman kneeling before a dignified man, who stretched out his hand benignantly towards her. This group Eusebius says that he had himself seen. He adds, that it was long unknown whom this statue represented; but as it was observed that a plant of healing virtues grew at its foot, care was taken at last to cleanse it, so as to make the inscription legible; then it was discovered that the woman cured of the issue of blood, who lived at Paneas, had erected the statue in honour of the Saviour. On this discovery it was at once removed into the Diaconicum or Sacristy of the church. That such a statue existed seems past all doubt; as to its original intention, the opinion of most modern archaeologists is, that it had been erected in honour of Hadrian, or some other who had benefitted the province, which was represented as a kneeling woman at the feet of her benefactor. Similar representations are frequently found on coins, especially of the time of Hadrian. Supposing some such expression as “σωτήρι,” or “σωτήρι τοῦ κόσμου”—titles at that time very frequently given to emperors—to have been found on the inscription, while the name had become illegible, the statue would naturally be referred by the Christians of the fourth century to the true “Saviour of the World” (Hefele, Beiträge, ii. 257). The emperor Julian, angry at the respect paid to this statue, caused it to be thrown down and his own substituted. This is related by Sozomen (H. E. v. 21), who adds, that the statue of Julian was soon afterwards struck by lightning and partly destroyed, while some fragments of the statue of Christ, which the heathens had dragged about the street, were collected by the Christians and restored to the church. Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 3) gives nearly the same account, except that he says nothing of any edict of Julian, but attributes the whole transaction to the pagan inhabitants of Paneas, and that he gives the more exact detail, that the head of the statue was preserved. This however was again lost at a later period. Asterius of Amasea (Conc. Nic. II., Labbe, vii. 210) gives again a different account, attributing the destruction of the statue to Maximin, who (he says) was nevertheless unable to destroy the fame of the miracle related in the Gospel.

Eusebius also says (H. E. vii. 18) that he had discovered that, besides this statue, there existed coloured pictures of Christ (εἰκόνας διὰ χρωμάτων ἐν γραφαῖς), as well as of the apostles Paul and Peter.

In the time of the Iconoclastic controversy, pope Gregory II. asserted in his letter to the emperor Leo III., about A.D. 727, that portraits of Christ, of St. James the Lord's brother, of St. Stephen, and of other martyrs, had been made in their life-time (Labbe, vii. 12). And it was probably about this time that the legend arose that St. Luke had painted portraits of Christ, of His Mother, and of SS. Peter and Paul. This story is found in Simeon Metaphrastes, in the Menologium of the emperor Basil, and in the history of Nicephorus Callisti (ii. 43). At a yet earlier date (about A.D. 518) Theodorus Lector (fragment in Valesius, p. 551, ed. Mentz) spoke of a portrait of St. Mary painted by St. Luke, which was sent by Eudocia to Pulcheria, but said nothing of any picture of Christ. Such portraits of the Virgin are said even still to be in existence; one is shown, for instance, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome.

Nicodemus is sometimes described as a wood-carver, and an image of Christ of cedar-wood from his hand is said by Aringhi (Roma Subterr. lib. iv. c. 47) to have existed at Lucca. Some have ventured to identify this with a wonderful-working image at Berytus, mentioned in the pseudo-Athanasian document read before the second council of Nicaea, A.D. 786 (Labbe vii. 217). Leo Diaconus, in the tenth century, says that his contemporary, the Byzantine emperor Nicephorus, placed this statue in the church of the Saviour at Constantinople; but neither he nor the pseudo-Athanasius says anything of its having been the work of Nicodemus. The legend attached to the image of Lucca is of course destitute of every shadow of probability.

Among the likenesses of the Lord reported once to have existed, we must reckon one said to have been the work of the Virgin herself, described in Adamnan's account of Arculf's visit to the holy places in the seventh century (De Locis Sanctis, i. 10; in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 460). Among the wonders of Jerusalem he mentions a napkin, partly red and partly green, said to have been woven by the Virgin Mary herself, containing pictures of the twelve apostles and of the Lord Himself.

(2) Images not made with hands.—Another class of portraits of Christ are the εἰκόνας ἀχειροποίητοι, images of miraculous origin, of which the most famous are (a) the Abgarus portrait, (b) the Veronica.

(a) The story of a correspondence between the Lord and Abgarus of Edessa is found as early as the time of Eusebius (H. E. i. 13). Evagrius, in the sixth century^a (H. E. iv. 27) speaks also of a divinely-fashioned likeness (εἰκὼν θεότευκτος) which Christ sent to Abgarus on his desiring to see him, and which saved Edessa when it was besieged by Chosroes in the year 540.

This story is alluded to by Gregory II. in his letter to Leo before referred to, when the famous picture had already become an object of pilgrimage. “Send”—he adjures the iconoclastic emperor—“to that image not made with hands, and see; to it flock all the peoples of the East, and pray; and many such there are made with hands.” His contemporary, John of Damascus (De Fide Orthod. iv. 16) gives more detail. A story was current, he says, that Abgarus, king of Edessa, sent a painter to take a portrait of the Lord; and that when he was unable to perform his task in consequence of the brightness of His countenance, the Lord himself put his outer garment (ἱμάτιον) to His own face and impressed upon it a perfect likeness (ἀπεικόνισμα) of His countenance, which He sent to Abgarus. Leo Diaconus (Hist. iv. 10, in Niebuhr's Scriptt. Byzant. xi. 70) adds to this a wonderful story of a tile having received the impression from this robe. The tile is also alluded to by Zonaras (Annal. xvi. 25). The image on the cloth was brought to Constantinople in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenetes, A.D. 944; its translation is celebrated by the Byzantine church on August 16, which is a great festival. What became of the picture when that city was taken by the Turks is not recorded, but pictures claiming to be this miraculous portrait are found in Italy. The Genoese lay claim to the possession of it, and say that it was brought to their city by Leonardo de Montalto, who presented it to the Armenian church of St. Bartholomew, where it is still exhibited once a year. St. Sylvester's at Rome also claims to possess the original Abgarus-picture. This is (according to Hefele) of the Byzantine type, and represents the countenance of the Lord in the bloom of youthful power and beauty, with high and open forehead, clear eyes, long and straight nose, parted hair, and a thick, auburn, bifurcated beard. Dr. Glückselig contends that the Edessa portrait furnished the type for the pictures of Christ in mosaics from the fourth century onward; before that time (he believes) no attempt at portraiture of the Lord was made, the early representations in the catacombs being mere symbols or adaptations of pagan types.

(6) The opposite of the calm and beautiful face represented in the Abgarus-portrait is the "Veronica" picture of the suffering Saviour crowned with thorns. The legend attached to this picture is, that as the Lord was bending under the cross on his way to Golgotha, a pious woman, Veronica, offered Him her veil, or a napkin, to dry the sweat on His face; an image of the face remained miraculously impressed on the cloth. In the Martyrology of Usuard, for instance, (ed. Greven.) we have under March 25, "Veronicae sanctae matronae cui Dominus imaginem faciei suae sudario impressam reliquit." Gervase of Tilbury (Otia Imperialia, c. 25, in Leibnitz's Scriptt. Brun. i. 968), who wrote in the thirteenth century, speaking of the "figura Domini quae Veronica dicitur," informs us that some say that it was brought to Rome by an unknown person, Veronica; but the account given by the most ancient writers is (he proceeds) that the woman who brought it was Martha, the sister of Lazarus. From the tradition of the elders we learn that she had a likeness of the Lord's countenance painted on panel, which Volusianus, a friend of Tiberius Caesar, who was sent by the emperor to Jerusalem to report on the deeds and miracles of Christ, caused to be taken away from her, that by means of it Tiberius might be healed of his disease. Martha, however, it is said, followed the "countenance of her guest," came to Rome, and at the very first sight healed Tiberius. Whence it came to pass (continues the veracious chronicler) that Christianity was known in Rome before the arrival of the apostles, and that Tiberius, instead of the mildest of sheep, became the fiercest of wolves, raging against the Senate because they refused to recognise Christ according to his wish—certainly a remarkable way of accounting for the aberrations of Tiberius's later years.

The Veronica-portrait is said to have been brought to Rome as early as the year 700; in the year 1011 an altar was dedicated in its honour, and even to this day it is one of the relics exhibited in St. Peter's, though only on extraordinary occasions. It was exhibited on the 8th December, 1854, when Rome was crowded with bishops assembled to be present at the promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. On that occasion it was seen by M.

"The Holy Face is enclosed in a frame of silver, partially gilt, and square, of a severe character, and little adorned. The simplicity of the bordering gives prominence to the interior of the picture, which is protected by a thin plate of crystal. Unfortunately, by one of those customs so common in Italy, a sheet of metal covers the field, and only leaves apparent the figure indicating its outline. By this outline one is led to conjecture flowing hair reaching to the shoulders, and a short beard, bifurcated and small. The other features are so vaguely indicated, or so completely effaced, that it requires the liveliest imagination in the world to perceive traces of eyes or nose. In short, one does not see the material of the substance because of the useless intervention of a metal plate, and the place of the impression exhibits only a blackish surface, not giving any evidence of human features."

For many years the explanation of the name Veronica given by Mabillon and Papebroch was generally adopted; that "Veronica" is simply an anagram of "vera icon," a true image. Mediaeval writers do in fact use the word Veronica rather to designate the picture itself than as the name of a woman. Thus Gervase of Tilbury, as we have seen, speaks of "figura Domini quae veronica dicitur;" and he afterwards uses the expression, "Est ergo veronica pictura Domini vera." But more recently W. Grimm has maintained a different view. He notices the fact, that the woman with the issue of blood who was healed, is said in the gospel of Nicodemus (c. 7), probably of the fifth century, and by John Malalas, a Byzantine historian of the sixth (Hist. Chron., p. 305, ed. Oxon. 1691), to have been named Beronice (Βερονίκη); and supposes that the legend of the veil or napkin in question arose from some confusion of the Peneas statue with the Abgarus-portrait; the Veronica-legend is, he believes, no more than a Latin rival-story or metamorphosis of the Greek Abgarus-legend, with the Veronica introduced from another source. M. Maury (Croniques et Legendes) connects the name Βερονίκη with the Gnostic feminine symbol ἡ Προβήνικος, but this conjecture seems rather ingenious than sound.

(3) In the eighth century the iconoclastic party, seeing the great variety of pictures of Christ, very naturally asked which they were to consider the true portrait; were they to adopt the Roman type, or the Indian, or the Greek, or the Egyptian? To this Photius (Epist. 64) replies, that the difference between these representations is much the same as the difference between the gospels circulating in the several countries, which are written in one character by the Romans, in another by the Indians, in another by the Hebrews, in another by the Ethiopians, and which differ, not only in the forms of letters, but in the pronunciation and significance of the words. If Photius's illustration is to be taken exactly, it seems to imply that all the pictures of which he knew anything represented the same face, and were only made to differ by the peculiarities, whether individual or national, of the painter; and it is probable enough that the Byzantine type was so far determined in his time, that all the pictures which he had

(4) The descriptions of the Lord given by John of Damascus in the eighth century, and by the supposed Publius Lentulus at a later period, no doubt had considerable influence on the representations of Christ. The former (Epist. ad Theoph. c. 3), referring to the testimony of still earlier writers, describes the Lord as having been somewhat bent even in youth, with meeting eyebrows, beautiful eyes, large nose, curling hair, dark beard and tint the colour of wheat, like His mother. The latter is supposed to be written to the Senate of Rome by one Publius Lentulus, a friend of Pontius Pilate. The age of this document is unknown (see Gabler, de æthervia Epistolæ Pub. Lentuli ad Senatum; Jena, 1819), but it does not seem to be quoted in its present form by any earlier writer than Anselm of Canterbury († 1109). Another description of the Lord's person is given by Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. i. 40), but this, as it is of the fourteenth century and does not claim to rest on earlier authorities, may be passed over.

JEWS AS REPRESENTED ON CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS. The Jews of our Lord's time appear in various sculptures of His life and works (Bottari, tav. lxxxv. et passim; Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lxiv. et passim). They are generally distinguished, especially in all subjects connected with the Wilderness, by wearing a flat cap or beretta, as in the above plates from sarcophagi. The Old Testament mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore are without the limits of our work, and Roman dress and armour prevail in them. The supposed arrest of St. Peter contains some of these figures, but though Aringhi, Bottari, and Buonarroti are against him, Martigny is still inclined to think the group in question intended to represent Moses attacked by the rebellious people in the Wilderness, when (Exodus xxiv. &c.) they were ready to stone him. This subject constantly accompanies that of the Rock in Horeb, where their complaints were silenced by miracle. Moses or St. Peter (whichever figure may be intended), always has his head uncovered in it, and the other Hebrews wear the flat head covering, short tunics, cloaks or sags fastened with fibulae, and sandals (Exod. xii. 11). The cap may have been a common or distinctive part of Jewish dress.

JEWS, TREATMENT OF. The fortunes of the Jews after the rise of Christianity are matters of general history. An account of their relation towards the expanding power of the church will be found in Milman's Hist. of Jews (iii. 167–203). This article only gives a brief summary of the ecclesiastical enactments against connivance with Jewish practices, or against the Jews themselves. To desert Christianity for Judaism was APOSTASY; to confound together the rites or doctrines of the two religions was HERESY; see Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 43, 44; ibid. XVI. viii. de Judæis Coeli olis et Samaritanis. But in addition to these graver offences, Christians were ordered to hold themselves separate from various Jewish customs. Thus resting on the Sabbath (Saturday) was denounced (Conc. Laod. c. 29) on the ground of its being a relic of Judaism; it was also forbidden (ibid. cc. 37, 38) to receive festival presents, or unleavened bread, from the Jews, or to share in their feasts. A similar injunction against participating in Jewish festivals or fasts appears in the Apostolic Canons (cc. 69, 70) under pain of excommunication, and also in the Trullan council (c. 11). The council of Eliberis, A.D. 305, initiating the violent hostility against the Jews which prevailed in Spain up to and through the time of the Inquisition, forbade (c. 49) any landlord to call upon a Jew to bless his crops; and in the next canon prohibited a Christian from eating with a Jew. This prohibition against sharing food with a Jew, because he regarded certain meats as unclean, is enacted in many subsequent Gallic councils (Conc. Venet. c. 12; Conc. Agath. c. 40; Conc. Epauon. c. 15, 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 15). Intermarriage with Jews was guarded against as strictly as with heathen (1 Conc. Arvern. c. 6; 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 14; 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 63). The dangers which were supposed to lurk in association with the Jews are exemplified at length in Chrysostom's 6 Homilies in Judæos, also in Hom. 23 ad eos qui primo Pasch. jejuntant, and Hom. 24 ad eos qui Judæorum jejuniis jejuntant (tom. 6 Ed. Savil.). One of the matters regarded with special jealousy by the church was the right of the Jews to hold Christian slaves. By a law of Constantine (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 27), the right had been considerably restricted; but the law appears to have fallen into disuse. The 3rd council of

Orleans, A.D. 538 (c. 13) recognises Christian servitude, but decrees that if a Christian slave takes sanctuary because his Jewish master interferes with his religion, the slave is not to be surrendered, but redeemed at a fair valuation. This decree was repeated and enlarged by subsequent councils (4 Conc. Aurel. c. 30, 31; 1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 15). In Spain the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 66) sanctioned the royal decree which declared it altogether unlawful for a Jew to hold a Christian in bondage, but the desire of gain was too strong for both church and state, for a little later the 10th council, A.D. 656, complains that even the clergy sold Christian captives to the Jews. The treatment of the Jews in Spain occupies no inconsiderable portion of the numerous canons of the synods held in Toledo in the 7th century. Under the reign of Recared, the first Gothic king, and again under Sisebut, the Jews had been subjected to fierce persecution. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, over which Isidore of Seville presided, gave them some relief, but this leniency was partial and shortlived. In the 57th canon of that council it was enacted that no Jew should be converted by violence; but the later canons contain more stringent regulations; children of Jews, who have been baptised, are to be separated from their parents and placed in monasteries or in God-fearing families (c. 60); the testimony of Jews is to be rejected (c. 64), because those who are unfaithful to God cannot be faithful to man; and (c. 65), they are to be excluded from all public offices. A few years later all trace of toleration has disappeared, owing perhaps to the absence of Isidore, who had died in the interval, and the civil law which banished Jews from the kingdom, was ratified by the church (6 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 8 Conc. Tolet. c. 12). The 12th council, A.D. 681, in response to an exhortation from the king to extirpate the pest of the Jews, proscribed (c. 9) in detail each distinctive Jewish practice. Shortly afterwards the Saracenic invasion swept over the Peninsula, and the Jews enjoyed more peace. In France there is no notice of the Jews earlier than the 6th century. The 3rd council of Orleans, A.D. 538, contains an ordinance (c. 30), forbidding Jews to appear in the streets or hold any intercourse with Christians for four days, from Maundy Thursday till Easter Monday (1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 14). The council of Narbonne, A.D. 589 (c. 9) forbade Jews to hold religious services at the burial of their dead, under a fine of six ounces of gold, a sum which indicates their wealth at that date. By the 5th council of Paris, A.D. 615 (c. 15) no Jew was to hold any public office which made Christians subordinate to him, except on condition of being baptised with his whole family (Conc. Remens. c. 11; Conc. Cabil. c. 9). Later, under Charlemagne, Jews were not only tolerated but treated with consideration. [G. M.]

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FESTIVALS AND LEGEND OF.

1. History of Festivals. (a.) Nativity of Baptist.—The Festival of St. John the Baptist stands in remarkable contrast with those of other saints commemorated by the church, in that with these it is their death which is celebrated, as the birth into the better life, whereas here it is the actual birthday; a circumstance only elsewhere commemorated in the case of our Blessed Lord Himself, that of the Virgin Mary on September 8 being of quite later date; and thus we find St. Augustine saying (Serm. 287, vol. v. 1692, ed. Gaume) "solos duos natales celebrat [ecclesia], hujus [i.e. Johannis] et Christi." There is a very obvious reason to be found for this exceptional state of things from the close historical connection between the birth of the Forerunner and that of the Saviour. This reason is plainly dwelt on in many ancient liturgies, and the Preface in the first mass for the festival in the Leonine Sacramentary may specially be noted.

What claims June 24, the day on which this nativity is celebrated, has to be considered the actual birthday of St. John, it is of course impossible to say definitely. We know from Luke i. 26, that the Baptist was six months older than our Lord, and therefore the difficulty resolves itself into the more important matter as to the correctness of the view which places Christmas on December 25, a question which will be found discussed elsewhere* [CHRISTMAS].

Attention has there been called to the coincidence of Christmas Day with the period of the winter solstice, and the possible reasons underlying that coincidence. The festival of the Nativity of St. John will consequently coincide with the period of the summer solstice, which, like the winter solstice, was a time specially observed in many of the older heathen religions. From this source many superstitious heathen observances in connection with this day passed into early Christianity. One of these, the so-called Fire of St. John the Baptist, will be found touched upon in the following article: another is reprehended by Augustine, "Natali Johannis . . . de sollemnitate superstitionis pagana Christiani ad mare veniebant et ibi se baptizabant . . . Adjuvo per ipsum, qui hodie natus est, nemo faciat" (Serm. 196 in Nat. Dom. vol. v. 1310).^b

A curious mystical idea was early suggested by the times on which the two birthdays were

* It is true that in the present church year, beginning with Advent, the festival of the Nativity of the Baptist seems to follow by six months that of our Lord; but of course, when, as was originally the case, the year began with Easter, the natural order of sequence prevailed.

^b This practice, as existing among the Manichæans, is referred to below.

kept, in connection with the Baptist's own words (John iii. 30), "He must increase, but I must decrease," so that from our Lord's nativity the days began to lengthen, and from St. John's to shorten. This idea is found dwelt upon in Augustine (Serm. 287, § 4, vol. v. 1692). See also a sermon formerly attributed to Augustine [Serm. 197 in Append. § 2, ib. 2856], but now referred to Caesarius of Arles: and Maximus Taurinensis (Serm. 4 in Append., Patrol. lix. 850); and the presence of numerous homilies for the festival of the Baptist among the writings of this father show at how early a date it was commemorated. A remark of his may further be added, that it was kept "majorum traditione" (Serm. 292, § 1, vol. v. 1717). Consequently with all allowances for a rhetorical way of speaking, this will carry back the festival at any rate as far as the middle of the fourth century. We find it also mentioned in the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense, where the notice is "viii. Kalend. Jul. Sancti Joannis Baptistae" (Patrol. xiii. 1221)^c. It is wanting, however, in the calendar of Bucherius, which is generally referred to the middle of the fourth century, and in the list of festivals in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33). These, however, are mere passing exceptions, for its otherwise universal presence in ancient liturgies, martyrologies, and calendars, and the numerous homilies for it in the writings of the fathers (Augustine, Maximus Taurinensis, etc.) are evidence of the wide-spread observance and early date of the festival. The council of Agde (506 A.D.) in ruling concerning private chapels, includes the Nativity of St. John the Baptist among the most important festivals on which a man was not to forsake his proper church, the only others specified being Easter, Christmas, Epiphany, the Ascension, and Whitsunday (Conc. Agathense, can. 21; Labbe, iv. 1386).

It may next be remarked that, as might have been expected from the interdependence of the dates of the natiivities of our Lord and of the Baptist, the East agrees almost unanimously with the West as to the particular day on which the latter is to be commemorated. See e.g. besides the regular Byzantine calendar, the notice in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. xxxii.), Πρόδρομον ἀμφὶ τετάρτῃ εἰκάδι γελ- νανο μήτηρ; the curious design in the Moscow pictorial calendar (ibid.); and the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 32). So far as we have observed, the Armenian church, the only church that does not celebrate Christmas on December 25, is also the only one that does not commemorate the Nativity of the Baptist on June 24, keeping it on Jan. 14 (Neale, Eastern Church, Intro. p. 797).^d as we have shown below, in the Leonine Sacramentary, though not specified by name as in the Ambrosian. We need not, however, with Papebroch, consider St. Ambrose to have been the first to institute the vigil. It is also found included in the later Roman Sacramentaries, the Gelasian and Gregorian, and its observance throughout Gaul and Germany is shown by its presence in ancient martyrologies and calendars of those countries, e.g. [in one form of] the Mart. Gellonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 424), the Mart. Autissiodorensis (Martene, Collectio Ampliss. vol. vi. 709), and a calendar of the 9th century described by Binterim. This writer refers also to a German Sacramentary published by Gerbert, where the notice for the day is, "jejunium S. Joannis Baptistae, una cum Missa pro more vigiliarum" (Denkw. v. i. 377). It may be mentioned that the council of Seligenstadt (1022 A.D.) ordered that all Christians should abstain from flesh and blood for fourteen days before the festival of St. John the Baptist (can. 1, Labbe ix. 844).

As regards the octave, it would appear that Papebroch is in error in considering that no earlier traces of it could be found than of the 13th or 14th centuries, for Binterim cites several calendars of the 9th and 10th centuries which mark it, e.g. the Cal. Frisingense of the 10th century (Eckhart, Franc. Orient. i. 835). It will be remembered that this octave has a special importance of its own, as being the day on which the Baptist was circumcised and received the divinely declared name of John, and on which the speech of Zacharias was miraculously restored.

(β.) Decollation of the Baptist.—Besides the festival of the Nativity of St. John, there are other Johannine festivals of comparatively minor importance, the chief of which is that of the Decollation, generally commemorated on August 29,^e the chief exception being that the Armenian church celebrated it on April 13, and the Gallican church, according to one view, on the octave of the Nativity of the Baptist, and according to another view on September 24.^f

This festival, too, must be of comparatively early date, for we find it in the Gelasian and [in some forms of] the Gregorian Sacramentaries, to its presence in which Bede alludes (Expos. in Marc. lib. ii.; Patrol. xcii. 192). Again in the Eastern church, we may appeal to the Byzantine and Russian calendars, and reference may be made to the Moscow pictorial calendar and the Greek metrical Ephemerides, the notice in the latter being, εἰκάδι ἀμφ' ἐνάτῃ Πρόδρομον τάμεν αἰχλὴν ἕλκος. See also Ludolf's Egyptian and Ethiopic calendars (p. 1): here, however, there is a simple commemoration of the Baptist on August 29, and the festival of the Decollation on August 30.

^c The other mention in this calendar of St. John the Baptist [vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae et Jacobi Apostoli quem Herodes occidit] is probably due to a copyist's error, because of the constant association of St. John the Evangelist with Dec. 27. It has been maintained, however, that this is an early African form of the festival of the Decollation of St. John the Baptist.

^d For a possible variation from general usage in the case of the church of Tours, see Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 31 (Patrol. lxxi. 566).

^e The Martyrologium Hieronymi (Patrol. xxx. 488), and a MS. of the Martyrology of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 1025), place it on Aug. 30. So also the Egyptian calendar in Selden (p. 221, ed. Amsterdam, 1679).

^f Augusti (Denkw. ii. 156) argues that the Decollation was not originally a distinct festival from that of the Nativity of the Baptist, but the evidence for this view, it must be said, is hardly conclusive.

mediately followed the Nativity of the Baptist, induced Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. v. p. 608) to maintain that the former commemoration was probably held there on the octave of the latter. Mabillon, on the other hand, appeals to a letter which bears the name of Augustine, to one Bibianus, a Gallican bishop, which asserts that the conception and death of St. John fell on the same day (i.e. Sept. 23 or 24), and further refers to August 29 as the day "quando inventum legitur caput dominici praeursoris" (Patrol. lxxii. 431). This letter, while obviously spurious, may be taken as evidence as to ancient Gallican custom, and we find the same usage, at any rate partially, among the Goths of Spain. (See Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic Missal; Patrol. lxxxv. 837.)

Legend.—This will perhaps be the most convenient place to give a very brief résumé of the legends respecting the body of St. John. This was said to have been buried at Sebaste, a town on the site of the earlier Samaria. In the time of the emperor Julian, the coffin was broken open, the bones burnt, and the dust scattered abroad. With this definite statement, it might have been thought that the history of the relics was at an end; but the story runs that the Christians saved some of the remains, which were sent to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Alexandria to Athanasius (Rufinus, Hist. Eccles. xi. 28; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii. 3; vol. iii. 918, ed. Schulze and Noesselt; Theophanes, Chronographia, vol. i. 117, ed. Classen); part also were obtained by Theodoret for his own church of Cyrus (see his Reliq. Hist. vol. iii. 1245). In order to contain the relics of the Baptist, a church was some time afterwards (circa 390 A.D.) built in Alexandria on the site of the temple of Serapis by the emperor Theodosius, and finished in the reign of his son Arcadius. Concerning the Head of the Baptist also there is a long series of traditions. These are often plainly conflicting, and it is to be regretted that a scholar with Papebroch's great learning should have wasted time on the attempt to reconcile them. The Head was said to have been buried in Herod's palace, where it was first discovered about the year 330 A.D. and taken into Cilicia. In the time of the emperor Valens it was moved as far as a place named Cosilaus, but about 390 A.D. Theodosius transferred it to Constantinople (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 21). Besides all this, however, we read of a finding of the Head at Emesa in 454 A.D., a discovery which can hardly harmonize with the preceding, and which was not improbably due to a growing demand of the age for relics. However, there is a further story of another translation of the Head, from Emesa to Constantinople in 850 A.D., to preserve it from the Saracens, and here it remained till 1204 A.D., when Constantinople was taken by the Latins. The Head then, or part of it, was brought to France by one Waldo de Sartone, a canon of Amiens. The further legends given by Papebroch, compared with which the above almost rises to the dignity of history, we pass over.

We find at a comparatively early period evidence of the existence of literature on the subject of the Finding of the Head, for at a council held at Rome in 494 A.D. under the episcopate of Gelasius, such writings are with others ordered to be read with caution. ("Scripta de inventione capitis Joannis Baptistae novellae quaedam relationes sunt, et nonnulli eas Catholici legunt. Sed cum haec ad Catholicorum manus pervenerint, beati Pauli apostoli praecedat sententia, Omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete." Patrol. lix. 161.)

(γ.) We are now naturally brought to the third of the Johannine festivals, the Finding of the Head. It would appear that different supposed findings are commemorated, and that this accounts for the various days on which the commemorations are held. The letter of the Pseudo-Augustine already quoted names August 29 as the day on which the Head was found, and in connection with this we may cite one form of the martyrology of Bede, "Passio et decollatio vel potius inventio capitis beati Joannis Baptistae . . ." (Patrol. xciv. 1025). That day, however, has ordinarily been reserved for the Decollation, and Feb. 24, for the Finding. In that arrangement, generally speaking, Western, Byzantine, Coptic, and Ethiopic calendars agree: and the Byzantine also commemorates another finding on May 25. There is besides a commemoration of the "Apparitio corporis" ["inventio ossium" Copt.] in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars on May 27, and of the "depositio capitis" on Oct. 27 [26, Selden] in the latter. The notice for Feb. 24 in the Greek metrical Ephemerides is εἰκόστην προδρομοιο φάνη κάρη ἀμφὶ τετάρτην.

(δ.) The festival of the Conception of the Baptist on Sept. 23 [or 24] is also found in the above calendars, and in many Western martyrologies. It is not recognised, however, in the Armenian calendar. The notice for Sept. 23, in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, is εἰκάδι δὲ τρίτῃ γαστήρ λάβε προδρομον εἶσα.

(ε.) Besides the two preceding, comparatively unimportant festivals, we find also a commemoration of the imprisonment on Aug. 24 in the Ethiopic calendar (Ludolf, p. 39), and general commemorations of the Baptist in the same, on Aug. 29 and April 10 (ib. pp. 1, 25): and on June 6 and September 5 in the Armenian calendar (Neale, pp. 799, 801).

2. Liturgical Notices.—The oldest Roman Sacramentary, the Leonine, contains no less than five masses for the festival of the Nativity of the Baptist. The first of these evidently belongs to the vigil, for though included with the second and third under the general heading Natale S. Jo. Bapt., still the point is settled by the words of the preface (also occurring, be it said, in the Gregorian and Ambrosian liturgies in the service for the vigil) " . . . exhibentes solemne jejunium, quo nati Joannis Baptistae natalitia praevenimus " (Leonis Opera; vol. ii. 28, ed. Ballerini). The fourth and fifth masses, portions of which are also found in the Gelasian Sacramentary, are headed ad fontem, showing the use made of the day as a solemn season for baptism. The Gelasian Sacramentary both has services for the vigil and Nativity, each with its own title (Patrol. lxxiv. 1165), and also for the Decollation (dies passionis) of the Baptist (ib. 1175): and the same too is the case with the Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 392, 420), and the Gregorian Sacramentary (coll. 108, 126; ed. Menard). In this last, while the first mass is headed in vigilia, the second bears the title In primâ missa de nocte.

In the ancient Gallican Lectionary, published by Mabillon, we find no mention of a vigil: the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel, are respectively Isaiah xl. 1-20; Acts xiii. 16-47; Luke i. 5-25, 39-47, 56-68, [to the words Dominus Deus Israel], 80. This is immediately followed by the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, and this by the "Passio S. Joannis Baptistae" for which the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel are respectively Isaiah lxlii. 1-13, 22, —xliv. 5; Heb. xi. 33—xii. 7; Matt. xiv. 1-14 (de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 158, 160). The same too is the case in the Gallican missal, save that there the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is immediately followed by a mass "In Natale unius Apostoli et Martyris" (Op. cit. lib. iii. 271, 275). In the Mozarabic missal we find forms given for the Sunday "pro adventu S. Johannis," as well as for the festival of the Nativity itself, and for that of the Decollation. The prophetic lection, epistle and gospel in the three cases are Isaiah xl. 1-9, Eph. iv. 1-14, Mark i. 1-8; Jer. i. 5-10, 17-19; Gal. i. 11-24, Luke i. 57-70, 80; Wisdom iv. 7-15, 2 Cor. xii. 2-10, Matt. xiv. 1-15. Sundry variations to the above occurring in ancient lectionaries are mentioned (in loc.) in the notes to Leslie's edition of the Mozarabic missal. (Patrol. lxxxv. 751, 756, 837; and for the Breviary [June 24, Sept. 24], Patrol. lxxxvi. 1129, 1133, 1209.)

3. Miscellaneous Notices.—We have hitherto spoken of the Baptist solely from the Christian point of view, we shall now dwell briefly on some further references. Josephus's account (Antiq. xviii. 5, 2) is practically the same as that of the New Testament, but he adds that, besides other causes, Herod Antipas was more or less moved to the murder of St. John by political reasons, the dread of a revolution.¶

There are, moreover, some curious associations connecting St. John with some semi-Christian, or rather non-Christian, religions. The Clementine Homilies (ii. 23) make Simon Magus to have been the chief (πρώτος καὶ δοκιμώτατος) disciple of St. John, who is further described as a ἡμεροβαστίτης (see Hegesippus apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 22; Justin Martyr Dial. cum Tryph. c. 80; and esp. Epiphanius, Haer. 17). We may perhaps, therefore, connect the Hemero-bastitae with the so called Mendaens (or properly Mandaens), known also as the Zabians, disciples of St. John, Christians of St. John. This sect, which still exists, chiefly near the Tigris, claims to be the lineal successors of the actual disciples of St. John, respecting whom they give some wild traditions, and whom they regard as superior to Christ. They totally ignore his beheading, and say that on his death-bed he bid his disciples to crucify his body, in reference to the death that should befall his kinsman Jesus. The body was then preserved in a crystal sarcophagus at Sjuster in Persia. (Ignatius a Jesu, Narratio originis, rituum et errorum Christianorum Johannis. Romae, 1652; Kaempfer, Amenitates Exoticæ pp. 435-454, Lemgoviae 1712; Norberg, De religione et lingua Sabæorum; Petermann in Herzog's Real-Encycl. s. vv. Mendäer, Zobier :

Chwolsohn, Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus pp. 100-138, St. Petersburg, 1856.) They celebrate in August (or April, according to Ignatius a Jesu) an annual festival of three days' duration, in honour of the Baptist, and an annual festival in June of five days' duration, when all the sect receive baptism. (Kaempfer, p. 446.) This reminds us of Augustine's protest cited above. Their chief sacred book, the Sidra Adem or Book of Adam, edited by Norberg (Codex Nasaræus, liber Adami appellatus, Hafniae), and recently by Petermann (Lipsiae, 1867), contains several references to St. John (see vol. i. 108, vol. ii. 20, 22, 24, 60; ed. Norberg). They also possess a "Book of John [the Baptist]" reported to have been given to their ancestors by John himself; of which there is a MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (Norberg de linguâ, &c., p. 4). Among their most curious superstitions is one in connection with the baptism of our Lord by St. John, which accounts for the view they take of blue as an unholy colour (Kaempfer, p. 447).

For a possible connection of the sect of the Elxaites with the teaching of St. John, see Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum iii. 158. Chwolsohn (Op. cit. p. 112) views Elxai as the actual founder of the Mendaens, another point of coincidence.

Among the Mohammedans, St. John is accounted as a prophet, and he is mentioned in the Koran in terms of high respect (Sura iii. 39). The passage in Sale's translation runs, "John, who shall bear witness to the word which cometh from God, an honourable person, chaste, and one of the righteous prophets."

We must in conclusion only allude in the briefest terms to a point, which though not strictly within our province, must not be absolutely passed over, the position of St. John the Baptist as the patron saint of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John, and his association in some form with the esoteric rites of the order of the Templars, though probably here there has been at times a confusion with St. John the Evangelist. For the possible connection with St. John the Baptist in such rites as the Baphomet, the dis severed head, etc., see Von Hammer, Mysterium Baphometis revelatum. Vindobonae, 1818. Reference may also be made to Von Wedekind, Das Johanns-Fest in der Frey-Maurerei. Frankfurt, 1818.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF. We called attention in the previous article to the way in which early Christian writers dwell on the mystical significance of the fact that the festival of St. John the Baptist coincides with the period of the summer solstice, and we also referred in passing to various superstitious rites and customs, which Christianity evidently inherited from heathenism. The most prominent of these is that which has long been known under the name of the Fire of St. John the Baptist, which, with numerous attendant customs, is obviously nothing more than a relic of ancient sun-worship, connected with that period of the year when the sun has reached the turning point of his annual course. This custom of kindling great fires in the open air on Midsummer's Eve has been shown to exist (and in not a few places even to the present day) among almost all European nations, as well as in the East* (see Jac. Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie pp. 583 sqq., ed. 2); and it can hardly be rightly viewed unless we associate it with the universally observed festival at the winter solstice, the Natalis Invicti, when the sun is, as it were, born again for the coming year [CHRISTMAS], with that on May-day, the la Beal-tine of the Irish, when the sun's warmth has awakened the dormant earth [JAMES THE LESS, ST., FESTIVAL OF], and with other similar instances.

Thus, it will be seen, there is plainly no original connection of St. John the Baptist with the practice now under consideration. The birthday of our Lord having been once fixed, by whatsoever means, at the winter solstice (and there is certainly no inconsiderable body of evidence pointing to the conclusion that the well-nigh universal prevalence of a festival at that time of the year had much to do with the matter, and that it is a case of the transference of worship from the material sun to Christ, the sun of righteousness), then, since there was a difference of six months between the ages of our Lord and of the Baptist, the birthday of the latter would naturally be assigned to the summer solstice. The existing heathen practices, at first strongly opposed by the church, gradually came to be tolerated and finally to be recognised; while the attempt was continually made to associate the customs of the day with the saint whose festival had thus happened to coincide with the older celebration.

A curious view on this subject, which may just claim a passing notice, is found in Hislop's Two Babylons (p. 184), which refers the great Midsummer festival of many heathenisms primarily to the Babylonian festival of Tammuz, who is further identified with Oannes, the Fish-God mentioned by Berosus (lib. i. p. 48, ed. Richter). It is there maintained that this name was suggestive of that of Joannes, and thus a Christian festival grew out of a heathen one, with hardly a change in the name of the object of the festival. More evidence, however, and less theorizing is wanted, before such a view can be seriously entertained.

To return now to the main part of our subject;—we shall cite, as showing the church's original point of view in the matter, a passage from one of the sermons of Augustine first edited by Frangipane in 1819, where he protests strongly against this practice of the lighting of fires on St. John's Eve:—"Cessent religiones sacrilegiorum, cessent studia atque joca vanitatum; non fiant illa quae fieri solent, non quaedam jam in daemonum honorem, sed adhuc tamen secundum daemonum morem. Hesterno die post vespeream putrescentibus flammis antiquitus more daemo-niorum tota civitas flagrabat atque putrescebat, et universam aerem fumus obduxerat" (Serm. 8 de S. Joh. Bapt. § 3; Patrol. xli. 996). Theodoret again (Quaest. in iv. Reg. [xvi. 3], Interr. 47, vol. i. 539, ed. Schulze) in referring to Ahaz's "causing his sons to pass through the fire," sees in it an underlying reference to a custom existing in his time, of lighting fires in the streets, over which men and boys leaped, and even infants were carried by their mothers. Theodoret states that this was done once a year, and though he does not further define the time, there is a probable reference to the Midsummer fire. The Quinisext or Trullan council (circa 692, A.D.) forbids the lighting of such fires before houses, etc., and the leaping over them; and penalties are laid down for all, cleric or lay, who followed the practice (can. 65, Labbe vi. 1172). In this last case, however, the periods are distinctly specified as the times of the new moon, but the superstition legislated against is clearly a parallel one; and, at any rate, Theodore Balsamon (cited by Paciaudius, infra), in his comments on this canon, makes special mention of the fires on St. John the Baptist's Eve. One more such instance may suffice: the German council, which sat under the authority of St. Boniface, either at Augsburg or Ratisbon in 742 A.D., forbids "illos sacrilegos ignes, quos Nod-fretres [Nodfyre, Niedfyre] vocant" (can. 5, Labbe vi. 1535).

We have already referred to the change of feeling with which such practices were regarded by the church as time went on, and to the consequent attempt to connect them directly with the Baptist. As examples of this we may cite Joh. Beletth (Rat. div. off. c. 137; Patrol. ccii. 141), who wrote about 1170 A.D., and Durandus (Rat. div. off. vii. 12. 10). In these passages reference is made to three customs practised at this season, the lighting of fires (which are described as being made of "ossa et quaedam alia immunda"), the carrying of firebrands about the fields, and the rolling of a wheel. After a strange explanation of the first of these as being a means for driving away dragons, another reason is given, namely, that it was done in memory of the burning of the bones of St. John the Baptist at Sebaste (see last article). The carrying about of firebrands is explained as having reference to him who was a "burning and shining light" (John v. 35); while the rolling of the wheel, which has an obvious reference to the course of the sun, is made further to refer to the glory of St. John waning before Him who was the True Light.

An attempt to disprove the idea of the connection of the Fire of St. John with heathen rites is made by Paciaudius (de Cultu S. Joh. Bapt. Antiquitates Christianae, pp. 355 sqq.), who, however, is mainly combating the idea of its connection with the Roman Palilia, a point urged by Reiske, Zeumer (infra), and other writers. The arguments here, however, though ingenious, rest altogether on too narrow a footing.

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to F. C. de Khautz de ritu ipis in Natali S. Joh. Bapt. aevi. Johannis*

* Nor need this remark be confined to the old world, for we find the same class of rites prevailing also among the Peruvians under the dominion of the Incas (Prescott, Conquest of Peru, i. pp. 96 sqq.; 10th ed.).

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., IN ART, ETC.

1. Iconography.—We find abundant evidence that representations of St. John the Baptist were very frequent in early Christian times. Epiphanius (Conc. Nic. II. Act. vi.; Labbe, vii. 538) tells us that those who delighted in "soft clothing" were rebuked by the figure of the Baptist in his "raiment of camel's hair;" in this garb, indeed, he is most usually represented, especially in the Baptism of the Saviour [see JORDAN], a subject of very frequent recurrence in early Christian art, as for instance, in the well-known painting in the cemetery of Pontianus, in many mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxiii.), and on various engraved stones and bronze medals (Vettori, Num. aer. explic. p. 68 and frontispiece), where he is shown in the act of pouring water from a shell on the Lord's head; he carries a staff in his left hand.

finger to the Messiah, represented in the form of a lamb, or in person (Concil. in Trull. can. lxxxii.). He has been figured by some artists in tunic and pallium, as for example on the bottom of a cup given by Buonarrotti (Vetri, tav. vi. No. 1), and assigned to St. John the Baptist. If this assumption be correct, we have here one of the most ancient representations of this saint, but many competent judges believe that it is a representation of St. Paul. Be this as it may, we find the Baptist clad in a similar manner, and also nimbused, in a mosaic of the 6th century (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxi.), in the centre of an ivory cross of almost the same date (Paciaudi, De cultu Joann. Bapt. p. 182, see woodcut), in an ancient diptych figured by Gori (The-saur. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 235), and also in bust upon a chalcedony attributed to the 5th century (Paciaudi, u. s. p. 189).

In the Menaea of the Greeks the figure of St. John the Baptist is winged, in allusion to the passage of Isaiah quoted by St. Mark (i. 2), and applied by the Lord Himself to the Forerunner: "Behold! I send My Messenger before Thy Face which shall prepare Thy way before Thee." His right hand is raised in the act of exhortation, and in his left he carries a cross, and a scroll inscribed with these words.

The annunciation of the birth of the Baptist is depicted in mosaic on the great arch of St. Maria Maggiore, A.D. 443. The angel is addressing Zacharias, who stands before the altar of incense (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. xlix. nn. 1, 2, 3). In the ancient mosaic on the portico of St. John Lateran the head of John the Baptist is carried in a dish by a licitor, while the decapitated body remains still kneeling before the executioner whose sword is still raised.

2. Dedications.—The first church dedicated to him was probably the basilica built by Constantine, and dedicated to the Forerunner, upon the Coelian Mount, near the Lateran. It is, however, not improbable that the name was transferred to it from the baptistery of Constantine, a short distance from it, which was dedicated to St. John.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius states that Constantine built churches dedicated to the same saint at Ostia and at Albano (in S. Sylvest. §§ 45, 46; Migne, cxxvii. 1524 f.), and Du Cange mentions one at Constantinople (Constantinop. Christ. lib. iv. § 4), of which, however, we can find no other record. At Naples it is commonly asserted that a church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was built in that city by Constantine on the site of the temple of Hadrian, in fulfilment of a vow made during a violent storm on his voyage from Sicily. But it has been proved by Majochi, that this founder could not have been Constantine the Great, though he may possibly have been the younger Constantine, son of Constans (De Cath. Neap. part. ii. 3). It appears certain that at Florence in early times a church was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, who became the tutelary saint and protector of the city (Villani, Chroniche, l. i. c. 60). St. Benedict dedicated to the Baptist one of the two oratories which he erected on the site of the temple of Apollo on Mount Cassino (Greg. Dialog. ii. 8, in Migne, lxi. col. 152 B). Tradition asserts that at Milan a temple of Janus was converted into a church, and dedicated as "Sancti Joannis ad quatuor facies" (Castellione, Mediæv. Antiq. pars 1, fasc. 2). There were at Ravenna in the 6th and 7th centuries two churches dedicated to this saint, one of which, called In Marmorario, specially commemorated his decollation (Rubeus, Hist. Raven. ii. and iii.). At Monza, queen Theodelinda built a church in honour of St. John the Baptist, on which she lavished wealthy endowments and precious gifts of every description. Agilulph, her husband, followed her example at Turin (Paciaudi u. s. pp. 15 and 16). Paciaudi enumerates many other churches dedicated to the Baptist in different places and in later times. Altars dedicated to him were usually to be found in the baptisteries; these were always placed under his protection, adorned with paintings and sculptures in which he is the principal figure, and sometimes enriched with his relics. (Paciaudi, De Cultu Joann. Bapt.; Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, ST., FESTIVAL OF.

1. History of Festival.—It is not necessary to enter here upon a discussion of the various early legends respecting St. John the Evangelist, which will be found treated of in the Bible Dictionary, to which reference may be made. We shall here merely speak of the festivals of St. John, and add a notice of the chief pseudonymous works attributed to him.

We hardly find the festival of St. John standing out in early times with that prominence which we should expect in the case of one so essentially of the chief of the apostles. As we have already mentioned in the article on the festival of St. John the Baptist, there is a not improbable commemoration of the evangelist in the ancient Calendarium Carthaginense, if, as seems reasonable, we assume the word Baptistae to have been written "per incuriam scribae" for Evangelistae. The notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae, et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On this assumption then we have a joint commemoration of the two brothers, the sons of Zebedee; and the same combination is also found in the Gothico-Gallic missal (infra). The Armenian church commemorates the two brothers together on Dec. 28 (Neale, Eastern Church; Introd. p. 804); and the Ethiopic church on Sep. 27 (Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, p. 5).

In the West, however, the name of St. John alone is ordinarily found associated with Dec. 27, a day which by its close proximity to Christmas seems especially appropriate for the commemoration of the beloved disciple, as also those of the Innocents, the first martyrs for Christ, and of Stephen the first conscious martyr. This idea is often dwelt upon by mediaeval writers, some of whom allude further to a tradition that the Evangelist died on the day which is now the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, but that his commemoration was transferred to a day in the octave of Christmas (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. vii. 42). As we have implied above, however, there is a lack of recognition of this festival in the writings of the earlier fathers, scarcely any of whom furnish us with homilies for the day, even those who have written them for the festivals of St. Stephen and the Innocents.

It may be noted here that in many ancient calendars December 27 is marked not as the Natalis or Nativitas, but as the Assumptio or Transitus of St. John. Thus we find, e.g., in the ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi "vi. Kal. Januarii Assumptio S. Joannis Evangelistae apud Ephesum" (Patrol. xxx. 137), and similarly the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium xiii. 390). This wording is doubtlessly due to the belief in some of the curious legends as to the death of this apostle. Of this we find no trace in the earliest writers; thus Polycrates, a near successor of St. John, simply says ἐν Ἐφέσῳ κεκοίμηται (Polycr. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 31). Soon, however, the legendary element showed itself, and as early as the time of Augustine the story prevailed that the apostle had been laid in the tomb merely in the semblance of death, but that he really lived was shown by the movements of the ground where he was laid, and the appearance as of dust expelled from the grave by the process of breathing (August. Tractatus 124 in Joannem c. 2; vol. iii. 2467, ed. Gaume). Later writers speak of this dust by the title of manna (see e.g. Gregor. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum i. 30. Patrol. lxxi. 730; Hildebert Turon. Serm. in festo S. Johani, Patrol. clxxi. 726 sqq.). It is this which appears to be specially dwelt on by the Greek church in their commemoration of St. John on May 8 (infra). In some writers the legend makes St. John live to the end of the world, to witness with Enoch and Elijah to the truth (see e.g. Ephraemius Antioch. apud Photium, Bibliotheca, cod. 229; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 985). According to another form, he died in the ordinary course of nature, and was immediately raised from the dead and translated into paradise (see e.g. Nicephorus Hist. Eccles. ii. 42). All these legends have doubtlessly grown from a misunderstanding of our Lord's words in John xxi. 22.

We may add further that the festival of St. John "ad portam Latinam" on May 6, which commemorates the apostle's having been thrown at that place into a cauldron of boiling oil and escaping unhurt, is often noted as the "Nativitas (Natalis) ad portam Latinam" (e.g. in the Gregorian Sacramentary and some forms of the Martyrologium Hieronymi) the apostle having there as fully won the martyr's crown as though no miraculous deliverance had been wrought.^a Whatever truth there may be in this story, it is at any rate as old as the time of Tertullian (see de Praescript. c. 36; cf. Jerome, adv. Jovinian. i. 26, vol. ii. 280 [where he appeals to Tertullian], Comm. in Matthaeum xxi. 23, vol. vii. 155).

In later times a church was built near the Latin gate in memory of this event. It may reasonably be inferred that it is to this church that Anastasius Bibliothecarius refers as being restored by Adrian I. (ob. 795 A.D.), though he describes it as "ecclesiam beati Johannis Baptistae sitam juxta portam Latinam" (Vitae Pontificum, Adrian I.; Patrol. exxviii. 1191). On this point see further G. M. Crescimbeni, L'Istoria della chiesa di S. Giovanni avanti Porta Latina; Roma, 1716.

In the Greek church St. John is commemorated on May 8 and September 26, regard being had on the former day to the miracle of the "manna," and on the latter to his translation. Thus in the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i., pp. xxvii. xlii.) the notices are ὁδοῦται τελευτοῖσι βοδισμῶν^b Βροντόγοροι, πρὸς γε θεὸν μετέστη βρόντης παῖς ἐκείδι ἔκτη. The latter festival is also found in the calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic churches^c (Ludolf, p. 5), which also commemorate St. John on December 30, and also his translation on May 11 (ib. pp. 16, 28).

Before passing on to the next part of our subject, we may refer briefly to a custom prevalent in the middle ages of sending to friends on St. John's day presents of wine which had been previously blessed (Benedictio or Hauustus S. Joannis). The origin of this custom is not certainly known. Some have viewed it as a continuation of the old Roman custom of sending to friends at the beginning of January presents in honour of Janus. Whether or no there be any connection between the two customs, it seems probable that there must be some reference to the legend of the poisoned wine cup sent to St. John, who signed it with the cross and drank it unhurt (see e.g. Isid. Hispal. de ortu et obitu Patrum c. 72; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151). This legend has very likely arisen from our Lord's words (Matt. xx. 23: cf. also Mark xvi. 18), and has itself obviously been the source of a common mediæval representation of St. John, as holding a cup round which a serpent is entwined.

2. Liturgical Notices.—In the Leonine Sacramentary we have two masses for the festival of St. John on December 27 (Leonis Opp. ii. 153, ed. Ballerini). There is, however, but one in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1060), and in the Gregorian, as given by Menard (col. 10); he mentions, however, that two occur in the Cd. Rotoldi, and in the text of Pamelius, and also in the Gregorian Antiphony (ib. col. 659). We may probably assume that one mass was for early morning, and another for a later service. In some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary is also a mass for May 6, "Nativitas S. Joannis ante portam Latinam" (ib. col. 87). The Ambrosian liturgy gives one mass for December 27 (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 307).

In the ancient Gallican lectionary published by Mabillon, Dec. 27 is inscribed in festo S. Joannis, but in the Gothico-Gallic missal the heading is in Natale Apostolorum Jacobi et Johannis (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. 111, iii. 196). In the former case the epistle and gospel assigned for the day (no prophetic lection is provided) are Rev. xiv. 1-7, Mark x. 35 . . . (one leaf of the MS. is here torn away). The Gothico-Gallic missal has also a commemoration of St. John, "ante portam Latinam"^d (Op. cit. iii. 262).

The Mozarabic liturgy commemorates St. John alone on Dec. 27 (Patrol. lxxxv. 199), the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel being respectively, Wisdom x. 10-18, 1 Thess. iv. 12-17, John xxi. 15-24. (For sundry variations from these, see Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic liturgy in loc.) For the service in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxxvi. 127.

The so-called Liber Comitis provides for the festival of December 27 an Old Testament lection and gospel, Eccles. xv. 1-6, and John xxi. 19-24 (Patrol. xxx. 489).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—With the name of St. John is associated a considerable amount of pseudonymus literature. First among these we may mention the book de transitu Mariæ, first edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphæ, pp. 70 sqq.; see also his Prolegomena, pp. xxxiv. sqq., and Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, ed. 1719). This was one of the books condemned by the council at Rome under Gelasius in 494 A.D., where it is simply spoken of as "Liber qui appellatur Transitus, id est, Assumptio Sanctæ Mariæ" (Patrol. lix. 162); and the false claim to the name of John the θεολόγος is referred to by Epiphanius Monachus (de Vita B. Virginis, c. 1; Patrol. Gr. cxx. 188). Fabricius also refers to another apocryphal document found attached to a copy of the above, ὑπόμνημα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς τὴν ἀποκαθάρσιν αὐτοῦ συγγραφείσα (sic) παρὰ τοῦ ἁγίου θεολόγου. A passing allusion may be made here to the Templars' mutilated recension of the canonical gospel of St. John, published by Thilo (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti i. 817) as the Codex Evangelii Johannis Parisiis in sacro Templariorum tabulario asservato, and also to the Book of St. John, said to have been in use among the Albigenses, and brought to light by the Inquisition of Carcassonne (Op. cit. 884).

We may next mention the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the Greek text of which was first edited in Tischendorf's Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (pp. 266 sqq.), and a Syriac version of the latter part of it in Dr. Wright's Apocryphal Acts. Any detailed account of this document is out of place here; reference may be made to Tischendorf (pp. lxxiii. sqq.): it may, however, be noted that it was known to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). A history of St. John at Ephesus, in a Syriac translation of an unknown Greek original, has been published by Dr. Wright (Op. cit.).

There is also an apocryphal Apocalypse of St. John, first edited by Birch in 1804, and subsequently by Tischendorf (Apocal. Apocr. pp. 70 sqq. cf. pp. xviii. sqq.). Assemani (Bibliotheca Orientalis, iii. part 1, 282) mentions three MSS. of an Arabic version of this document. Less important than the above, but claiming a passing notice, are the Epistle ad Hydropicum quemdam given by the Pseudo-Prochorus (see Fabricius, i. 926), the Prayer of St. John, cited from Martene by Fabricius (iii. 334), and the Prophetia de Consummatione Mundi, said to have been discovered with a commentary of Caecilius in 1588 A.D., in Granada (ib. iii. 720). In connection with St. John may also be mentioned the Historia Apostolica (lib. v.) of the Pseudo-Abdias (ib. i. 531 sqq.) and the Passio S. Johannis Evangelistæ of Melititus (ib. iii. 604). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 16) connect with the name of St. John the regulations as to the ordination of presbyters. Finally, we may mention the Syro-Jacobite liturgy of St. John the Evangelist. A Latin translation of this is given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orientalium Collectio, ii. 163, ed. 1847).

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to Tillemont (Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique, vol. i. pp. 370 sqq. and notes 17 and 18, ed. 1693) and to Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 288 sqq., iii. 242 sqq.). [R. S.]

JOHN, ST., THE EVANGELIST, IN ART. From very early times the eagle has been assigned to St. John as his emblem among the four living creatures which have always been held symbolical of the four Evangelists; indeed the most ancient method of representing the beloved disciple appears to have been by this symbol alone. [EVANGELISTS.]

Perhaps the oldest personal representations of ^d This mass occurs between those for the "Finding of the Cross" and those for the Rogation days. It contains, however, it must be stated, no reference to the event "ad portam Latinam."

him are to be found on two glass cups, where he is figured in bust conversing with St. Peter; the names SIMON, JOHANNES being given (Garucci, Vetri ornati di fig. in oro, tav. xxiv 4 and 5). In some mosaics of the 6th century we find him as a young man—all representations make him young—with long hair; a nimbus surrounds his head; he wears the tunic and pallium, and carries his Gospel pressed to his heart. In the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna a mosaic of A.D. 547, shows the Evangelist seated, holding the codex of his Gospel open in his hands; before him is a small table with a pen and ink-bottle, and the symbolical eagle appears above his head. (See woodcut.) Lambeci (Biblioth. Caesar. Vindobon. vol. ii. pars i. p. 571) gives an illumination from a very early Greek manuscript in which St. John is represented seated, dictating his Gospel to a deacon.

We find him standing with a volume in his hand in a mosaic which dates from the 9th century, in the church of St. Maria Novele. This figure and those of three other apostles occupy four small niches, which are placed two on each side of a large niche, containing the seated figure of the Virgin with the infant Jesus on her lap (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tav. liii.).

In the crypt of St. Urban in Caffarella, at Rome, we find a somewhat coarse and very curious painting of the same date, in which St. John appears with similar surroundings. He stands on the right of the Virgin and St. Urban on the left (Perret, vol. i. p. lxxxiii.).

The attempted martyrdom of St. John before the Latin Gate is figured in an ancient mosaic on the portico of St. John Lateran (Ciamp. De Sac. Aedif. tab. ii. 8). The scene is now very imperfectly represented because the mosaic is much damaged, but the flagellation of the apostle can still be distinguished, and also the cutting off of his hair. In the oldest representations of the Crucifixion, St. John uniformly occupies the position he assumes in his own narrative (John xix. 25, 26), standing with the Virgin at the foot of the cross, the faces of both resting upon their hands in token of grief. He appears thus in a fresco in the cemetery of St. Julius (Bottari, excii.) and in the celebrated diptych of Rambona, figured by Buonarrotti (Vetri Ornati, p. 285). Over his head are the words, DISSIPULE (sic) ECCE (mater tua).

An almost identical representation is found upon the very ancient ivory tablet in the form of a pax, mentioned by Florentino, taken from the collegiate church of Civitalis, in the diocese of Aquileia. St. John stands by the Lord's side with this inscription: AP. ECCE M TVA (Apostole ecce mater tua).

Basilicas were dedicated to St. John the Evangelist in very early times; among others, we may mention that of St. John Lateran. The ancient Vatican had also an altar raised to his honour by pope Symmachus (Ciamp. De Sac. Aedif. p. 60, 1 D). (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

JORDAN, THE RIVER, IN ART. The representations of the river Jordan in early Christian art, especially those sculptured on sarcophagi (Bottari, tav. xxix.), are generally copied, with more or less exactness, from the river-gods of pagan antiquity. Thus we find him personified as an old man with a crown and sceptre of reeds, sometimes leaning upon an urn from which flows a stream of water. He is thus represented in the mosaic in the baptistery of St. John in fonte at Ravenna, with the name

Mosaic at Ravenna. From Ciampini.

IORDANN, written over his head (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tav. lxx., see woodcut); also in an illumination in a copy of the Book of Judges, in the Vatican. The same mythological type appears again at Ravenna, in a mosaic in the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin; in this instance, however, two horns are substituted for the crown of reeds on the head of the figure (Id. ibid. II. tav. xxiii.).

The Jordan, simply as a stream, appears in some sculptured representations of the translation of Elijah (Bottari, Sculture, tav. lii. 2), in a painting of the baptism of the Lord in the cemetery of Pontianus, in another fresco in the cemetery of Callixtus (Bottari, lxxii.), on a bronze medallion of the baptism of the Lord with the name of the river below, IORDA (Vettori. Num. Aer. explic. frontisp.), in some bottoms of cups, where it flows at the feet of the Saviour (Buonarrotti, tav. vi. 1), and in various mosaics, that of SS. Cosmas and Damian at Rome, for example, with the inscription

IORDANES (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tav. xvi.). See JESUS CHRIST, p. 876. On some sarcophagi the Lord appears seated, in the act of teaching, and, at his feet, a half-length human figure holding with both hands a piece of cloth, which inflated by the wind, spreads above his head in the form of an arch. This has been supposed to be another emblem of the river Jordan (Cavedoni, Ragguol. crit. p. 50), on the banks of which several of the Lord's discourses were delivered. But see FIRMAMENT. JOSEPH, ST. Early Christian art has left us no work in which St. Joseph appears alone, or even as a principal figure. In such subjects as the Nativity, the Adoration of the Shepherds, and of the Magi, and the finding of Jesus in the Temple, he appears only as an accessory; never in an exalted, seldom even in a prominent, position.

St. Joseph. Carving in Ivory, from Martigny.

He is represented as a middle-aged man, sometimes bald (Bottari, tav. lxxxvi.), sometimes with thick hair (Id. lxxxv.; Allegranza, Monum. Sacr. di Milano, tav. iv.); he is generally robed in tunic and pallium, and carries some carpenter's tool, as the distinctive mark of his calling (Molanus, de Hist. SS. Imag. p. 269). Thus in a diptych in Milan cathedral he is represented with a saw (Bugati, Memor. di S. Celso, p. 282), on the sarcophagus of Celsus, also in Milan, he carries an adze (Bugati, u. s. p.

In all these cases St. Joseph retains the unobtrusive position assigned to him in the gospel narratives—always in the background, and apparently full of earnest thought. He appears absorbed in his duty as the protector of the Holy Family; in an attitude of watchful love he stands behind the Virgin while the Holy Child sleeps upon her knees; sometimes his hand is stretched over them in token of protection (Perret, vol. v. pl. xii.); sometimes, seated near the cradle, he guards the slumbers of the Divine Infant.

Bandini gives an ancient ivory (In tabulam eburn. in fine; see woodcut), which shows two scenes in the life of St. Joseph. Above, the dream; an angel standing by a bed extends his arm over the sleeper in the attitude of exhortation. Below, we have the journey to Bethlehem: an angel leads the ass on which the Virgin is seated; her arm encircles Joseph's neck, and his whole attitude expresses the most reverent affection. JOURNEYING. All travellers and strangers were expected to bring COMMENDATORY LETTERS, i.e. testimonials from their own bishop, and were then admitted to communicate in the Eucharist. Persons who had not provided themselves with these, might share if they needed it, in the hospitality provided by the churches and religious houses, but were not admitted to communion. This was to guard against the admission of excommunicated persons. The Apostolical Canons order that if any person was received without commendatory letters, and it afterwards appeared that he was excommunicate, both the receiver and received should be cast out of communion (Can. xiii.). From an allusion in the letters of Gregory the Great, we learn that those who travelled by sea sometimes took the reserved sacrament in both kinds with them in the ship, so as not to be deprived of communion. (Gregor. Dialog. III., c. 36, apud Baron. an. 404). "Peregrina Communio," or the Communion of Strangers, is a well-known phrase in Canons, but is not well understood (Bingham, xvii. 3; and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417). From the fifth century downwards, these rules were of continual application, in consequence of the increasing practice of going on pilgrimages. [PILGRIMAGE.] [S. J. E.]

JUDE THE APOSTLE, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—With the name of this apostle considerable difficulties are associated; the questions as to the identity of Jude with Lebbaeus and Thaddaeus, the identity of Jude the apostle with Judas the Lord's brother, and, on the hypothesis which distinguishes these two last, the question as to which was the author of the canonical epistle. As to the first point, in spite of some curious complications, we can hardly hesitate to assume the identity of the three; it is not conceivable that the Evangelists should have actually varied in the lists of the Twelve. It is not necessary to enter at length into this point here, as it will be found discussed in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE; a few further remarks, however, may be made. The most prominent tradition in connection with the name of this apostle is the mission to Abgarus, king of Edessa, to which we shall again refer. The case is, however, complicated by the fact that some writers describe this Thaddaeus as the apostle (e.g. Jerome, Comm. in Matt. x. 4; vol. vii. pt. 1, 57, ed. Vallarsi; and the Acta Thaddaei, infra), while others (e.g. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 13) speak of him as one of the Seventy disciples, who was sent to Edessa by the apostle Thomas. This last writer introduces another difficulty by stating (l.c.) that the name of Thomas was really Judas.* Yet another element of confusion has been brought in by those who identify Lebbaeus with Levi (cf. Origen contra Celsum, i. 62). Any discussion, however, on these theories is quite beyond our present province, and we shall therefore assume the identity of Jude, Lebbaeus, and Thaddaeus; and in collecting the various notices of Thaddaeus we shall include all as belonging to the apostle, except those which distinctly refer to him as one of the Seventy. As to the varying forms of the traditions about Thaddaeus's labours and death, it is utterly impossible to say how far they are to be viewed as distinctly conflicting legends, and how far they are to be explained as referring to two different men.

* In the Syriac Acts of Thomas, published by Dr Wright, the name Thomas appears as a mere occasional addition to Judas. See also Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 318.

We shall now proceed briefly to glance through the various legends. The Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks in its Prologue of St. Simon and St. Jude having suffered together "in Susia, civitate magna apud Persidem" (Patrol. xxx. 451), though in the body of the work the scene of the martyrdom is simply given as "alibi" (ib. 495). The Martyrology of Bede speaks of previous labours of St. Jude in Mesopotamia (Patrol. xciv. 184): so also the Western Martyrologies^b generally, see e.g. those of Wand-albert (Patrol. cxxi. 616) and Usuard (Patrol. cxxiv. 630). So also Isidore, who refers to labours in Mesopotamia, Pontus, and Armenia (de ortu et obitu Patrum, c. 78, Patrol. lxxxiii. 453) and Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270). Paulinus of Nola does indeed speak of his labours among the Libyans (Poema xix. 82; Patrol. lxi. 514), but a mere unsupported statement of this kind need not count for much.^c The account given by Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. ii. 40) varies somewhat, and, as will be seen, we cannot account for the variation by referring it to the other Thaddaeus. The apostle is spoken of as labouring in Judea, Galilee, Samaria, Idumaea, Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, finally dying peaceably at Edessa; on his arrival at which place he found that Thaddaeus, one of the Seventy disciples, had been there before him. The Apocryphal Acts of Thaddaeus (infra) differ again. According to these, Thaddaeus was a native of Edessa, who was a disciple of St. John the Baptist before he followed Christ. Abgarus, king of Edessa, having been healed by a miraculous portrait sent him by our Lord, is visited by Thaddaeus after the Ascension. The apostle, after making many converts, journeys to Amis on the Tigris, and thence to Berytus in Phoenicia where he apparently dies a natural death.

Syrian traditions almost universally distinguish Thaddaeus, the apostle of Edessa, from St. Jude; though, like Western authorities, they assign Mesopotamia to the latter as the sphere of his labours; the former, however, whom they ordinarily name Adai, they maintain to be one of the Seventy (see Assemani, Bibl. Orient. i. 318; iii. part 1, 297, 302; from which last reference it appears that practically the only exception to the general character of the stream of Syrian tradition is Jesujabus, bishop of Nisibis, with whom Adai is the same as the apostle St. Jude:—for the history of this Adai, see Op. cit. iii. part 2, pp. 8–13).

2. Festival.—As in the case of not a few others of the apostles, there is a lack of evidence for any early special commemoration of St. Jude; and its absence from the earlier Sacramentaries, as well as the fact that hardly any ancient Homilies^d are extant for such a festival, points in the same direction. In the West the commemoration of St. Jude has been joined with that of St. Simon on October 28, but this combination does not occur in Eastern calendars. The reason for this association of the two names it is impossible to ascertain; it may have been from the belief that the two apostles were brothers, or from the tradition of their having suffered martyrdom on the same day, but as in the parallel case of St. Philip and St. James it is perfectly useless to theorize. It may merely be remarked that as regards the first of these theories, there is no trace of such a combination of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and but little of one of St. James and St. John: as regards the latter, the tradition can have been by no means a wide-spread one, inasmuch as only the Western church commemorates the two apostles on the same day.

We have already remarked as to the absence of this festival from the oldest liturgical authorities. Thus we find no trace of it in the Leonine or Gelasian Sacramentaries, in Mabillon's Gallican liturgy, in Muratori's Gregorian Sacramentary and in the calendar of Fronto: nor is it recognized in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 766 A.D.). It is found, however, in the Gregorian Sacramentary as edited by Menard (col. 137), where also a separate mass is provided for the vigil. The vigil is also recognized with the festival in Menard's Gregorian Antiphonary (col. 711), and in the St. Gall MS. of the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 427). A mass for the festival is given in the Ambrosian liturgy, part of which is the same as that in the Gregorian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 427); and in the Mozarabic missal, where, however, it must be noticed that the greater part of the service is borrowed from that for another festival, that for St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. lxxv. 888, where see Leslie's note: also for the form in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxxvi. 1236). The Comes Hieronymi, as published by Pamelius (Liturg. Lat. ii. 53) gives an Old Testament lection [or epistle] and gospel for the vigil and the festival; Wisdom iii. 1 sqq., John xv. 1 sqq., and Romans viii. 28 sqq., John xv. 17 sqq.

Besides the festival of October 28, it may be noted that some Western calendars give other commemorations of St. Simon and St. Jude: thus the Martyrologium Hieronymi, as given by D'Achèry from the Corbey MS., adds one on July 1 (Patrol. xxx. 464), and the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, 405) two, on June 29 and July 1.

In the Eastern church, as we have already said, St. Jude is commemorated apart from St. Simon, on June 19. There is also a festival on August 21 of Thaddaeus, whom we should assume to be the apostle of Edessa viewed as distinct from St. Jude. Papebroch, however (infra), evidently refers both to the same St. Jude in his notes to the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by him in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. pp. xxxii. xl.). The notices here are—έννεα και δεκάτη θνήσκει βελέεσσιν Ιουδας, and είκάδι πρώτη Θαδδαϊος βιότοιον απέπητη. In the Armenian calendar we find commemorations of Thaddaeus on July 20 and of Thaddaeus and Bartholomew on November 30 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 800, 804). Whether, however, both of these are to be referred to St. Jude we are unable to say. We may refer lastly to the commemoration of St. Jude has been joined with that of St. Simon on October 28, but this combination does not occur in Eastern calendars. The reason for this association of the two names it is impossible to ascertain; it may have been from the belief that the two apostles were brothers, or from the tradition of their having suffered martyrdom on the same day, but as in the parallel case of St. Philip and St. James it is perfectly useless to theorize. It may merely be remarked that as regards the first of these theories, there is no trace of such a combination of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and but little of one of St. James and St. John: as regards the latter, the tradition can have been by no means a wide-spread one, inasmuch as only the Western church commemorates the two apostles on the same day.

^b The Martyrologium Gellonense speaks of St. Jude's having been buried "in Nerito Arminiae urbe" (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 390). This is probably a false reading for "in Beryto;" so Isidore (l.c.) "in Beryto Armeniae."

^c Muratori (not. in loc.) tries to account for the discrepancy by supposing Libya to be the place of sepulture, but not of death, but this is palpably over-refining.

^d Among the very few, we may note that of Nicetas Paphlago (Patrol. Gr. cv. 254); that once attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 489) is spurious.

lendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Fasti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae). Here we find "Jude, Apostle," commemorated by the former church on Jan. 26 and May 10 (pp. 19, 28); and a commemoration by both churches of Thaddaeus on June 26 (p. 32), and of the Translation of the body of Thaddaeus on July 23 (p. 35). The last two are perhaps to be referred to Thaddaeus viewed as external to the Twelve.

3. Whether the apostle St. Jude is to be considered as the author of the canonical epistle bearing the name of Jude, we do not discuss here: reference may be made on this point to the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. But little pseudonymous literature is connected with the name of St. Jude; an apocryphal gospel bearing the name of Thaddaeus is mentioned in some forms of the records of the council held at Rome in 494 A.D. under the episcopate of Gelasius (Patrol. lix. 162). It has been suggested, but does not seem probable, that Thaddaei is a false reading for Matthiae. There are also extant Acta Thiddaei, of which the Greek text was first published by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. 261 sqq.). In this is contained the letter of Abgarus to our Lord in a somewhat different form from that given by Eusebius. The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 25) give, in the name of "Lebbaeus, surnamed Thaddaeus," the regulation as to the order of widows in the church, and also as to exorcists. Finally, we may refer for the legendary history to the Historia Apostolica of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. vi.; Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 591 sqq., ed. 1719). In addition to works already cited, see also Augusti, Dehewürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. iii. pp. 206 sqq. JUDGE. The early ecclesiastical jurisdiction was exercised without formality or strict adherence to legal rights and requirements, in a quasi-paternal manner. [Compare DISCIPLINE.] No special training was therefore required for it. The bishop himself was the usual and "ordinary" judge: and appeals from him went to the provincial synod or to the metropolitan, primate or patriarch in person. [APPEAL; AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS; BISHOP, p. 236.]

The earliest officer of the bishop occupying in any sense an independent position was the OECONOMUS or treasurer. This office was often united with that of the defensor or guardian and advocate of the liberties of the church, who is spoken of in the 2nd canon of the council of Chalcedon. [ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH.] Gothofredus (in Cod. i. iii. 33. 2) says that the defensor became in time a judge in small causes: and his office is supposed by Ayliffe (Parerg. 160) to have been the original of the modern official or chancellor.

The word "official", the technical word in later times (as in the 12th century) for the officer exercising coercive jurisdiction on behalf of the bishop or metropolitan, is not used in this sense in the Code or in the Novells. The word indeed often occurs in them, but as the name of a secular officer.

speaks of arbitrators being chosen with the bishop's consent to determine civil controversies between clerks, instead of the bishop.

The greater formality and style of the ecclesiastical courts grew up with the increase of jurisdiction over civil matters and with the appointment of "officials" in the 12th century. The presence of a registrar to make solemn record of the decrees of the court was first ordered in the council of Lateran held under Innocent III. A.D. 1215; though it was probably customary to have a scribe or notary present at the formal sittings of the courts for some time before this; and we actually hear of notaries at the pseudo-council of Ephesus, A.D. 449. Apparitors or summoners to the bishop's courts are spoken of in the Code and Novells, where the fees to be taken by them are specially regulated.

In what has been said as to the bishop being the "ordinary" judge, it is not intended to imply that he decided, at any rate grave cases, alone, or without the advice and concurrence of his clergy.

Similarly the metropolitan, even if he did not convene the whole provincial synod, collected some of the bishops of the province to assist him in deciding the causes brought before him. In some cases the canons or imperial laws speak of the metropolitan, in others of the synod, as the proper court.

The jurisdiction of abbots [ABBAT] had hardly grown up during the period of which we are treating. They had at the utmost a sort of parental authority subordinate to the bishop. [JURISDICTION.] [W. G. F. P.]

JURISDICTION. Before the time of Constantine the Great such jurisdiction as was exercised in the church must have been of a purely spiritual character, and its sanctions must have been purely spiritual. Sinners were brought before the tribunal of the bishop, who judged and inflicted spiritual censures, and inflicted them probably without appeal.

Upon the recognition by Constantine of the church as a collegium licitum, these spiritual judgments and censures began to have an effect of which the civil law could take cognizance, and a civil effect was given to them. They were also made use of to assist or sometimes even take the place of the sanctions of the civil law.

In criminal causes where the accused was a clerk, or in any way specially connected with the performance of religious observances, there was an early tendency to make the bishop the judge, first in conjunction with the lay judge and in time as the sole judge. Judging as a spiritual judge over spiritual persons, a confusion arose between the sentences which he imposed in execution of the discipline of the Church, and those which he imposed as a delegate of the power of the State and armed with the authority of a criminal judge. The two matters are so intertwined, that it will be convenient to discuss together the jurisdiction in spiritual matters and that over spiritual persons.

A second fountain of jurisdiction in the courts of the church was arbitration. Bishops were encouraged by the Christian Emperors to arbitrate on moral grounds between Christians disputing as to matters of right and property, and the civil law gave a civil force to their judgments. Where clerks were parties, the propriety of a recourse to the tribunal of the bishop was considered to be greater. Where a clerk was defendant, his right to escape the annoyance of appearing before a secular tribunal was paralleled to and strengthened by his privilege to be tried by the bishop when defendant on a criminal charge. Hence arose jurisdiction between parties generally.

Lastly, certain special matters of civil litigation began to be considered, irrespective of the parties, as being peculiarly fit for the cognizance of the ecclesiastical judge. Hence arose a jurisdiction over special civil causes.

Jurisdiction in spiritual matters and over spiritual persons.—We have here first to consider the difference between the forum internum and the forum externum. The forum internum was the tribunal in which the bishop or sometimes the priest decided on cases of conscience, gave spiritual directions, and counselled with fatherly authority penitential discipline. The procedure and the decision of this tribunal were not, except in the cases where public penance was required, necessarily known to any but the penitent and his judge. The terror of conscience was the only sanction, and there could be no formal appeal. But along with this forum the church from its earliest time possessed also a forum externum (see 1 Cor. v.; 1 Tim. i. 20). [PENITENCE.]

When the gravity of the offence altered the relation of the parties and converted the father into the avenger, or made it necessary to prefer the public weal of the community to the individual welfare, the sentences of deposition or excommunication were inflicted.

These sentences on clerk or layman were inflicted by the bishop. They were or ought to be recognized by all other bishops, and there was originally no appeal. The so-called Apostolical Canons, though requiring the imposition of these sentences in several cases, are silent as to the procedure by which they were to be inflicted. The Nicene Canons for the first time provide a limited right of appeal.

The 5th canon says that clerics or lay people separated from communion by their own bishop, shall be held everywhere to be so separated; but that in order that no one should be expelled from communion through a contentious or harsh spirit of their bishop, the occasion of their expulsion shall be inquired into by the provincial synod, which is to be held for this purpose twice a year. The decision of the synod is to be final. It was not till considerably later, when, it does not exactly appear, that further appeals were allowed. [APPEAL; INDULGENCE.]

The original discipline of the church had made all crimes as importing sins the subjects of the penitential discipline or the forum internum, and by consequence in the graver and more public cases, or where penitence was not shown, of the forum externum. It became however obviously impossible, as the church tribunals took a more formal shape and as appeals came to be allowed, that ordinary criminal offences against the laws of the state should be tried in any fashion by the church courts; and hence a division arose, whereby certain offences became the subject of the almost exclusive jurisdiction of the church courts, while on other offences they were not allowed to sit in judgment.

Offences of laymen subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts were heresy (Van Espen Jus Eccles. Univ. pars iii. tit. iv. cap. 2, and the article HERESY), magic (can. 10, caus. 26, q. 5), blasphemy, to be punished by bishop or count according to the capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. cap. 101), and probably cases of laying violent hands on clerks. It seems that incest and incontinence were not distinctly reckoned as offences over which the church had coercive jurisdiction till late in the 9th or the 10th century, though they were of course subject to penitential discipline [FORNICATION; HARLOT; INCEST].

But the subjection of clerks to the ecclesiastical tribunals was much wider than this. In A.D. 376 a law of Gratian and Valentinian is said to have subjected clerks for small offences or offences of an ecclesiastical nature to their diocesan synod (L. 23, Cod. Theod. de Episcopis et Clericis). But a special exception was made of such offences as gave rise to a criminal action before the ordinary or extraordinary judges or the higher officials classed as the Illustrious. So in A.D. 399, Arcadius and Honorius are said (L. 1. Cod. Theod. De Religione) to have ordered causes relating to religion to be tried by the bishops, but questions which related to the civil law to be tried according to the law (i.e. by the lay judges). Rather stronger is an edict attributed to Valentinian Theodosius and Arcadius (L. 3 Cod. Theod. de Episcop. Jud.) Van Espen (Jus Eccl. pars iii. tit. iii. cap. i.) cites a constitution of Honorius, A.D. 412 (L. 41, Cod. Theod. de Episcop. et Cleric.) which would apparently subject the clerk for all offences to the bishop; but it is held that the words, though vague and general, do not really refer to other than ecclesiastical offences.

We come next to Justinian. The Code contains an enumeration of the courts by which an accused clerk is to be tried as follows: he is to be tried before his bishop. If the bishop be "suspected" there is to be an appeal (or possibly an original trial) before the metropolitan. If his decision be not satisfactory, an appeal lies to the provincial synod and thence to the patriarch, whose judgment (subject to certain peculiar rights in the patriarch of Constantinople) is to be final. The law then proceeds as follows: "As for these proceedings, if they relate to ecclesiastical matters, we order that they be of necessity tried only by the most religious bishops or metropolitans, or by the sacred synods, or by the most holy patriarchs. But if there is a controversy as to civil matters, though we will allow those who wish it to bring the question before the bishops, yet we will not compel them, since there are civil tribunals, if they prefer to go to them, before which tribunals also criminal proceedings can be had" (Cod. i. iv. 29).

This law seems to confuse civil and criminal proceedings, and has a relation to both. The 83rd Novell is more precise. It recites a request of Menas or Mennas, the patriarch of Constantinople, and proceeds to confer certain privileges upon clerks. The first relate to civil suits. As to criminal causes, it enacts that where they relate to secular matters they shall be tried before the lay judge; but before the lay judge proceeds to execute the sentence, he shall allow the bishop to depose or degrade his clerk. Criminal causes relating to ecclesiastical matters are to be tried by the bishop. The 123rd Novell effected a further alteration (cap. xxi.) Making the same reservations as to ecclesiastical causes, it provides that a clerk accused of a secular criminal offence shall be brought before the bishop, who if he find him guilty shall depose him ab honore et gradu, from his office and order, and send him to the lay judge for secular punishment; or he may be brought before the lay judge first, in which case the lay judge is to transmit the evidences of his guilt to the bishop, who is to depose him and send him back to the lay judge for secular punishment. This Novell extends to monks, deaconesses, and nuns.

Van Espen (loc. cit.) quotes some canons of the 6th century as going further in this respect, and the capitularies of the Frank kings enact that clerks shall not be judged by lay judges, but by ecclesiastical ones (lib. i. cap. 38); and that no one shall presume to accuse a clerk, monk, or nun before a lay judge (lib. v. cap. 378).

In England it is well known that the distinction between secular and ecclesiastical courts did not exist during the Anglo-Saxon rule, the sheriff and the bishop sitting side by side on the same bench.

The punishments or censures inflicted by the episcopal tribunals were at first mere acts of penance, the discipline retaining its original penitential character. So early indeed as the Theodosian Code (L. 21 De Hæreticis) a fine of ten pounds of gold seems to have been imposed on any clerk or bishop who was convicted of heresy; but it does not appear whether this fine was imposed by the ecclesiastical judge or by the lay judge after sentence by the ecclesiastical judge. [FINES, p. 671.]

Seclusion in a monastery both for laymen and more especially for clerks and bishops was an earlier punishment. It seems to be mentioned in the Epistles of St. Gregory (lib. 2 Epist. 27, 40), and in a canonical rule of about the year 816 as a substitute for scourging. [IMPRISONMENT, p. 829.]

The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) orders that any bishop who has been by law expelled from his see, yet returns to the city, shall be shut up in a monastery.

Relegation or banishment from the city they disturbed, or in which the public offence was committed, seems to have been first used as an ecclesiastical punishment towards the close of the period of which we are writing (see Epist. of St. Gregory, lib. 9, Ep. 66). It is very doubtful though whether it was ever exercised in invitum, unless it was supported by a special decree of the civil authority. The bishops of large towns, particularly Constantinople, were however often armed with a power of sending back to their own dioceses clerks disorderly frequenting the capital.

Scourging, as a means of penitential discipline, is mentioned by St. Augustine (Epist. 133) and St. Gregory (Epist. lib. 2, Epist. 52, lib. 9, Epist. 66) [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT]. It seems to have been used by bishops with reference to their younger clerks, and by abbots with reference to monks. In the canon law (can. 10, caus. 26, q. 5) an epistle of St. Gregory is quoted in which he orders practisers of magic if they be slaves to be scourged, if free men, to be secluded till they are penitent. The 38th of the Apostolical Canons orders that any bishop, priest, or deacon, who endeavours to make himself feared by scourging either sinners or men outside the Christian community who have done wrong shall be deposed. St. Paul requires as a qualification of a bishop that he should be "no striker" (1 Tim. iii. 3). The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the bishop to beat any one with his hands.

Besides these corporal punishments, the ecclesiastical courts continued to administer and inflict their old censures, now become also of worldly import, of excommunication and deposition or degradation.

So clearly was the distinction between these last censures and matters of internal and penitential discipline now marked, that St. Augustine seems to say that bishops cannot prohibit any one from communicating unless the penitent has confessed his crime or been convicted by a secular or an ecclesiastical judge; "nos a communione prohibere quoniam non possumus . . . nisi aut sponte confessum, aut in aliquo sive saeculari sive ecclesiastico iudicio nominatum atque convictum" (Serm. 351, § 16; Opp. v. 1359, ed. Bened.). Conformably to this the 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the excommunication of any one till after a full trial.

It should be said here that monks, who were originally subject to their bishops like any other laymen, were made in a special and further degree subject to them by the council of Chalcedon at the suggestion of the emperor Marcian (Van Espen pars III. tit. xii. cap. 1). There seems to have been no question of their exemption from episcopal authority till the 6th century; and even then the exemptions conferred on them were not exemptions from jurisdiction, but from despotic invasion of their internal rights.

deacons and chapters; and actual exemption from their bishop's authority sometimes was conferred on monasteries. [EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES.]

The trial of bishops has been reserved for separate mention.

It is first provided for in the Apostolical Canons (can. 74). This is the more remarkable as there are no provisions in these canons regulating the trials of clergy or laity.

This canon provides that a bishop when accused by credible persons shall be summoned by other bishops (that is, the other bishops of the province), to appear before them. If he appears and confesses, or is convicted, his punishment is to be decreed. If he does not appear, he is to be summoned a second time personally by two bishops, and so if necessary a third time, after which he is to be tried and condemned in his absence. The 75th canon prevents heretics from giving evidence against a bishop, and requires the evidence of two witnesses.

The Nicene Canon (can. 5) as to the appeal of clerks and laymen to the diocesan synod (quoted p. 894 supra) has been held by many, notably by St. Augustine (see Van Espen, pars III. tit. iii. cap. 5) to relate also to the trial of bishops. However this may be, the 6th canon of the council of Constantinople undoubtedly provides for the trial of bishops. After refusing the evidence of heretics, excommunicated persons and persons accused of crimes, it proceeds to enact that if any not disqualified person has any ecclesiastical charge to prefer against a bishop, he shall bring it before the provincial synod. If the synod cannot correct the crime, the bishops thereof shall go before the greater synod of that "diocese" (diocese is here used in the imperial sense of a larger province, exarchate or patriarchate), but shall not bring their accusation till they have submitted to undergo a like penalty, if they are found calumniators. The decree is to be then made by the greater synod, and there is to be no appeal either to the emperor or to a general council from it.

The 9th canon of the council of Chalcedon seems to relate primarily to civil suits. It orders that any dispute between a clerk and a bishop (whether his own bishop or not) shall be tried by the provincial synod. If bishop or clerk have a dispute with the metropolitan, the trial should be before the exarch of the diocese or the emperor.

The 123rd Novell provides (cap. viii.) that a bishop shall not, whether in a pecuniary (civil) or criminal cause, be brought against his will before any civil or military judge; and (cap. xxii.) that disputes between bishops, whether on ecclesiastical or other matters, shall be tried in the first instance by the metropolitan and his synod, with an appeal to the patriarch; while bishops accused of crimes are to be tried by the metropolitan (apparently alone), from whom an appeal lies first to the archbishop (that is probably the primate or exarch or president of the greater synod), and thence to the patriarch.

Jurisdiction between parties.—In the early days of the church, when Christians formed a small and separate society, it was natural and almost necessary that disputes between them should be settled by arbitration within their own body, to avoid the scandals to which references to heathen judges might give rise. St. Paul expressly reprobates the practice of "brother going to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers" (1 Cor. vi. 6).

The arbitrator chosen would naturally be the bishop, and this appears to have been the case.

After the recognition of the church by Constantine, provision was made for giving a legal sanction to these arbitrations. Constantine himself is said (Van Espen, pars III. tit. i. cap. 2) to have allowed litigants to choose the bishop instead of the lay judge, and to have ordered effect to be given to the sentence of a bishop so judging. A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius is preserved in the Code (I. iv. 7) allowing litigants to go before the bishop in civil matters only and as before an arbitrator.

Another constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (Cod. I. iv. 8) orders that the bishop's judgment shall be binding on all those who have chosen him as judge, and shall have as much force as a judgment of the praetorian prefect, from whom there could be no appeal.

It appears that at this time Jews had the privilege of trying their disputes if they pleased before their rabbi or "patriarch."

Valentinian III. allowed the same result to be obtained by means of a previous formal "compromissum" or submission to arbitration.

None of these constitutions, however, in the least degree compel the resort to the ecclesiastical tribunal, unless the matter in question be of an ecclesiastical nature, not even though the defendant be a clerk.

So the emperor Marcian (Cod. I. iii. 25) speaks of an episcopal audience for clerks who are sued at law, but gives the plaintiff the power of choosing the lay tribunal.

The 67th Novell makes provision for the mode of trial, which is to be summary.

There being the power of resorting to the arbitration of the bishop, the church compelled by threats of censure every clerk at least to resort only to the tribunal of the bishop. Among other canons on this subject may be cited that of the council of Chalcedon (can. 9) which orders that any clerk who shall have a dispute with another clerk shall not go before the secular tribunals, but shall plead his cause first before his bishop, or before such person, with the consent of the bishop, as both parties shall choose to decide the question.

The 9th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage orders that any bishop, priest, deacon, or clerk, who has a civil matter in dispute, and brings it before the secular tribunals, shall lose all that he gains by the sentence of the secular tribunal, or shall be deprived of his office. There are also canons of the 4th council of Carthage to the same effect.

The 79th Novell (cap. i.) gives the fori privilegium for the first time. It provides that any one having a cause with any of the venerable holy men (the monks) or the holy virgins, or any women living in nunneries, shall go before the bishop. The bishop is to send to the monastery and to provide for the appearance of the defendants before him, either by the intervention of their abbots or of agents (responsales) or otherwise. He is then to try the cause; which is on no account to come before the secular judges.

The 83rd Novell, which has been already referred to,^a extends the privileges. Any one having a pecuniary cause against a clerk is to go before the bishop,^b who is to decide summarily without writing. His sentence may, however, be put in writing. There is to be no recourse to the civil tribunals; but the main object of the Novell is to avoid long delays and pleadings, rather than to change the tribunal which is to adjudge.

The 123rd Novell puts the privilege on a firm basis. Clerks, monks, deaconesses, nuns, and ascetic women, are to be impleaded before the bishop. The lay judge is to execute the bishop's sentence, if there is no appeal. But either of the parties may appeal within ten days to the local lay judge. If he decides in accordance with the bishop's judgment, the decision is final.

If the lay judge decides contrary to the bishop, his sentence may be appealed from in the regular way of civil suits.

If the bishop delayed to hear or decide on the cause, the plaintiff might go at once before the lay judge. This Novell expressly reserves all ecclesiastical suits for the sole cognizance of the bishop.

The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. i. cap. 28) ordered all disputes between clerks to be settled by their bishop, and not by secular judges: while another capitulary (lib. vi. cap. 366) recites and enforces an edict, attributed to Theodosius, declaring that the sentences of the bishops, however declared, and apparently in whatever causes, shall be ever held inviolate. This edict was declared by Charlemagne to be binding over all parts of his empire.

The object of these laws also seems to have been to avoid prolixity of pleadings, technicality of procedure, and long disputes, distracting holy men from their proper avocations, rather than any supposed impropriety of secular judges exercising jurisdiction over clerks.

The constitution of the special court of his bishop for the clerk or monk, seems to have been considered by the secular authorities as a privilege given to him, which he might waive, the secular court having always the capacity to exercise jurisdiction over him, if the privilegium fori were not set up. But the canons and decrees of the councils and synods leave the clerk no option, forbidding him to sue, or to abstain from raising his privilege when sued, in the lay court.

The secular authorities seem to have retained nevertheless their view of this exemption as a privilege and capable of waiver. Gothofred (in Cod. I. iii. 33 and 51) cites a constitution of the emperor Frederic (apparently Frederic II.) strongly denouncing any assertion of jurisdiction by the lay judge in civil or criminal matters; but yet allowing the clerk to waive his privilege and submit to the jurisdiction.

The emperor Alexis Comnenus brought the matter under the general rule "actor sequitur forum rei" (Constit. Imp. 289, § 11).

^a Supra, p. 895.

^b The text seems to say "archiepiscopus." For all matters to be taken.

The jurisdiction over testamentary causes did not arise in Western Europe till the 12th century. It appears to have arisen early in the 12th century in England; not till the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century in France.

The only indication of testamentary jurisdiction in Eastern or Western Europe during the period of which we treat, appears in the commission given by the Christian emperors to the bishops, to take care that the wishes of the dead should be faithfully performed.

Charlemagne especially intrusted the bishops with the duty of protecting wards, widows, and paupers, and of seeing that no wrong was done to them. This led in time, but not during our period, to a sort of jurisdiction over all cases where a member of one of these classes was concerned.

Matrimonial causes, though infringements of the marriage vow were probably treated of with other matters of spiritual discipline, did not as involving formal legal rights or questions of property, fall to the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical tribunals till the 11th century.

Suits relating to ecclesiastical matters are in many of the Imperial Constitutions mentioned as unquestionably matters for the bishop's jurisdiction. The term "ecclesiastical matters" is vague, and probably varied at different times; but before the expiry of our period, causes relating to tithes and offerings were probably considered as coming within its meaning.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ANCIENT ATLAS.

AN

COMPILED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF

DR. WILLIAM SMITH AND MR. GEORGE GROVE.

THIS important Work has been undertaken to supply an acknowledged want, as well as in Illustration of DR. WM. SMITH'S BIBLICAL and CLASSICAL DICTIONARIES, THE SPEAKER'S COMMENTARY, &c.

The Maps are on a large scale, and have been executed by the most eminent engravers in Paris and London. They contain the modern names along with the ancient ones. There is also a series of smaller Maps, exhibiting each country at different historical periods. To the larger Maps a full Index is appended. The CLASSICAL MAPS have been prepared by DR. KARL MÜLLER, under the superintendence of DR. SMITH. Those of the HOLY LAND and MOUNT SINAI include the recent observations and positions obtained by the Officers of Royal Engineers, and have been prepared under the superintendence of MR. GROVE.

The Maps are of the same size as those of KEITH JOHNSTON'S ROYAL ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY, with which the present Atlas will range. The descriptive Letterpress gives an account of the authorities employed in constructing each Map.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"The students of Dr. Smith's admirable Dictionaries must have felt themselves in want of an Atlas constructed on the same scale of precise and minute information with the article they were reading. This want has at length been supplied by the superb work before us. The indices are full, the engraving is exquisite, and the delineation of the natural features very minute and beautiful. It may safely be pronounced—and higher praise can scarcely be bestowed—to be a worthy companion of the volumes which it is intended to illustrate."—Guardian.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE; its Antiquities, Biography, Geography, and Natural History. By Various Writers. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. and LL.D.

The object of this Work is to elucidate the Antiquities, Biography, Geography, and Natural History of the Old Testament, New Testament, and Apocrypha; and not to explain systems of theology, or discuss points of controversial divinity. It has seemed, however, necessary in a "Dictionary of the Bible" to give a full account of the Book, both as a whole and in its separate parts. Accordingly, articles are inserted not only upon the general subject, such as "Bible," "Apocrypha," and "Canon," and upon the chief ancient versions, as "Septuagint," and "Vulgate;" but also upon each of the separate books.

This great Work, which has been prepared by a combination of leading divines of the Church of England, had its origin in the widely-felt want of a plain explanatory Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, which should be at once more comprehensive and compact than any previously published. The cordial and enthusiastic reception which has been extended to the work—even by those whose connections would lead them to the most severe and indeed hostile criticism—demonstrates the great success which the enterprise has already achieved. From the fulness, fairness, thoroughness, and candour with which all difficult questions are discussed, the Bible Commentary is sure to be satisfactory to the scholar; while the plain, direct, and devout manner in which the meaning of the Sacred Text is explained, thoroughly adapts it for the widest popular use, whether in the closet, in the family, or in the Sunday-school.—Advertisement to the American Edition.

MURRAY'S STUDENT'S MANUALS.

A Series of Class-books for Advanced Scholars.

Forming a Complete Chain of History from the Earliest Ages down to Modern Times.

"This series of STUDENT'S MANUALS, ANCIENT and MODERN, edited for the most part by DR. WILLIAM SMITH, possess several distinctive features which render them singularly valuable as educational works. They incorporate, with judicious comments, the researches of the most recent historical investigators, not only into the more modern, but into the most remote periods of the history of the countries to which they refer. The latest lights which comparative philology has cast upon the migrations and interminglings of races are reflected in the histories of England and France. We know no better or more trustworthy summary, even for the general reader, of the early history of Britain and Gaul than is contained in these volumes respectively.

"While each volume is thus, for ordinary purposes, a complete history of the country to which it refers, it also contains a guide to such further and more detailed information as the advanced student may desire on particular events or periods by copious lists of the 'Authorities.' This most useful feature seems to us to complete the great value of the works, giving to them the character of historical encyclopædias, as well as of impartial histories."—The Museum.

"Before the publication of these Student's Manuals there had been established, by the claims of middle-class and competitive examiners on young men's brains, a large annual demand for text-books that should rise above the level of mere schoolboy's epitomes, and give to those who would master them some shadow of a scholarly knowledge of their subjects. Such books were very hard to find. Mr. Murray now brings out his seven-and-sixpenny manuals. They are most fit for use in the higher classes of good schools, where they may be deliberately studied through with the help of a teacher competent to expand their range of argument, to diversify their views by the strength of his own reading and reflection, and to elicit thought from the boys themselves upon events and the political changes to which they have led. Even the mature scholar may be glad to have on his shelves these elegant manuals, from which he can at a glance refresh his memory as to a name or date, and he will not use them for reference alone. He will assuredly be tempted to read them for the clearness of statement and the just proportion with which there is traced in each of them the story of a nation."—Examiner.

THE STUDENT'S OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.

From the Creation of the World to the Return of the Jews from Captivity. With an Introduction to the Books of the Old Testament. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 50 Maps and Woodcuts.

"Of our own land, as well as of Greece and Rome, we have histories of a scholar-like character; but Old Testament history has not been so carefully or so fully treated before. It is not a little surprising that a subject of such universal importance and interest should have so long been disregarded. This volume is a very able and scholarly work. As a book for Sunday reading, we feel assured it will be very welcome and widely serviceable."—Westonian Times.

THE STUDENT'S NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY.

With an Introduction, containing the connection of the Old and New Testaments. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 40 Maps and Woodcuts.

"This is another of those useful manuals of history which will no doubt obtain a wider circulation than the similar volumes on the History of Greece or Rome, as the subject-matter is of wider interest; at the same time, it will be more closely scrutinized. We are glad to say that it will endure this scrutiny, and will satisfy the more it is examined. Its tone is eminently reverential."—Churchman.

ANCIENT HISTORY.

THE STUDENT'S ANCIENT HISTORY of the EAST.

From the Earliest Times to the Conquests of Alexander the Great, including Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Media, Persia, Asia Minor, and Phœnicia. By PHILIP SMITH, B.A. With 70 Woodcuts.

"'Ancient History' used to mean Greece and Rome and 'sacred history' only. These are all separately provided for in this Student's Series, and there still remains matter enough in the domain of ancient history to fill this closely printed and tersely written volume. Our admiration of the mode in which a difficult task, involving great research, has been performed is cordial, and we may be permitted to express surprise that a history of this nature, crammed full of unfamiliar names, and of necessity abounding in names rather than in facts, can prove such attractive reading."—Saturday Review.

GREECE.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF GREECE. From the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L. With 100 Woodcuts.

"We have much satisfaction in bearing testimony to the excellence of the plan on which Dr. Wm. Smith has proceeded, and the careful, scholarlike manner in which he has carried it out. The great distinctive feature, however, is the chapters on literature and art. This gives it a decided advantage over all previous works of the kind."—Athenæum.

ROME.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF ROME. From the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By Dean LIDDELL. With 80 Woodcuts.

"A lucid, well-marked, and comprehensive view of the progress and revolutions of the Roman State and people. The course of the history is distinctly mapped out by broad and natural divisions; and the order in which it is arranged and presented is the work of a strong and clear mind. There is great skill as well as diligence shown in the amount of facts which are collected and compressed into the narrative; and the story is told, not merely with full intelligence, but with an earnestness and strength of feeling which cannot be mistaken."—Guardian.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY of the DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. Correcting his Errors, and incorporating the researches of recent historians. With 200 Woodcuts.

"The best popular edition of Gibbon extant. It is pervaded by all the warmth, life, and power of the celebrated original; and is just such a volume as Gibbon himself would have issued had he deemed it proper to send forth a digest of his own immortal performance."—Christian Witness.

EUROPE.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF EUROPE DURING

THE MIDDLE AGES. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D.

"In this edition the principal notes have been incorporated in the text, and some fresh ones added, the most important being the statutes of William the Conqueror, the Constitutions of Clarendon, Magna Charta, and some other original documents. In its present shape it will be very welcome; and the publisher confers a great boon on the public by issuing such books."—Examiner.

ENGLAND.

THE STUDENT'S HUME; A History of England. From the Earliest Times to the Revolution in 1688. By DAVID HUME. Incorporating the corrections and researches of recent historians, and continued to 1863. With 70 Woodcuts.

"The Student's Hume is certainly well done. The separate additional matter in the form of Notes and Illustrations is the most remarkable feature. Many important subjects—constitutional, legal, or social—are thus treated; and—a very useful plan—the whole authorities of the period are mentioned at its close."—Spectator.

THE STUDENT'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. From the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II. By HENRY HALLAM, LL.D.

"The Editor has aimed at giving, as far as possible, the form which its author would himself have desired had he been preparing a student's edition. We have looked through the book pretty carefully, testing it here and there somewhat minutely, and we can only say that it adds another to the many claims of the same character which both editor and publisher have established upon our gratitude."—Literary Churchman.

FRANCE.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF FRANCE. From the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Second Empire, 1852. With Notes and Illustrations on the Institutions of the Country. By Rev. W. H. JERVIS, M.A. With 60 Woodcuts.

"This History of France is the digested work of a thorough French scholar, who, having entered into the spirit of the nation and its history, knows how to generalize and knit into one pertinent whole the sequence of events. It is the best work of its kind accessible to readers of all classes."—Examiner.

LANGUAGE, LITERATURE, &c.

THE STUDENT'S ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By GEORGE P. MARSH.

"This work is one of real and acknowledged merit, and likely to meet with a wider reception from Dr. Smith's hands than in its original form. Much curious and useful information is given at the end of different lectures, including interesting philological remarks culled from various sources, portions of Anglo-Saxon grammar, and explanations of prefixes and affixes, besides illustrative passages from old writers."—Athenæum.

THE STUDENT'S ENGLISH LITERATURE. By T. B. SHAW, M.A.

"This work is calculated to be specially useful to candidates for Civil Service Examinations. Its merits, however, entitle it to a far better fate than that of being a mere cram-book for competitive examinations. It is as comprehensive, as fair in tone and spirit, and as agreeable in style as such a volume can well be; and it is impossible to dip into its pages without forming a very favourable opinion of it in illustration of the English language."—Educational Times.

THE STUDENT'S SPECIMENS of ENGLISH LITERATURE. Selected from the Best Authors, and arranged Chronologically. By THOS. B. SHAW, M.A.

"Two objects have been kept in view in making these selections; first, the illustration of the style of each writer by some of the most striking or characteristic specimens of his works; and, secondly, the choice of such passages as are suitable, either from their language or their matter, to be read in schools or committed to memory. No less than one hundred and fifty-nine authors have been laid under contribution. The whole collection seems to have been compiled with much taste."—Educational Times.

GEOGRAPHY.

THE STUDENT'S ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. By Rev. W. L. BEVAN, M.A. With 150 Woodcuts.

"A valuable addition to our geographical works. It contains the newest and most reliable information derived from the researches of modern travellers. No better text-book can be placed in the hands of scholars."—Journal of Education.

THE STUDENT'S MODERN GEOGRAPHY. Mathematical, Physical, and Descriptive. By Rev. W. L. BEVAN, M.A. With 120 Woodcuts.

"An epitome of mathematical and physical geography is given, introducing a sketch of the whole science. We can decidedly state that the book is the best we have seen upon the subject. It will entirely supersede the text-books at present in use, and we cordially recommend it."—Journal of Assistant Masters.

PHILOSOPHY AND LAW.

THE STUDENT'S MORAL PHILOSOPHY. With Quotations and References. By WILLIAM FLEMING, D.D.

"This work, from its orderly method, its clear style, its logical definition, its wide comprehensiveness, its copious fertility of illustration—in a word, that characteristic combination of fitness, fulness, and exactness which reveals at once the scholar and the master—cannot fail to secure for it the high appreciation which it deserves."—Record.

THE STUDENT'S COMMENTARIES OF BLACKSTONE. Adapted to the State of the Law down to 1872. By R. MALCOLM KERR, LL.D.

"It is impossible to speak too highly of the way in which Dr. Kerr has accomplished his delicate and difficult task, for the performance of which no one could be better fitted by his extensive legal knowledge and experience. Whether as a text book for the higher classes or for the professional student, this abridgment will prove invaluable."—Educational Times.

SCIENCE.

THE STUDENT'S ELEMENTS OF GEOLOGY. By Sir CHARLES LYELL. With 600 Woodcuts. 9s.

"This book is compendious in size and moderate in price, so that students beginning the study of this fascinating science will now have the advantage of receiving their elementary lessons from its greatest master; while even the most advanced will find advantage in a work which states first principles and indisputable facts in the light of the most advanced and accurate knowledge."—English Independent.

"'MURRAY'S STUDENT'S MANUALS.'—While there is an utter absence of flippancy in them, there is thought in every page, which cannot fail to excite thought in those who study them, and we are glad of an opportunity of directing the attention of such teachers as are not familiar with them to THESE ADMIRABLE SCHOOL-BOOKS."—The Museum. DR. WM. SMITH'S SMALLER SERIES OF HISTORIES FOR SCHOOLS.

A SMALLER SCRIPTURE HISTORY OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS. With 40 Woodcuts.

"Students well know the value of Dr. Wm. Smith's larger Scripture History. This abridgment omits nothing of vital importance, and is presented in such a handy form that it cannot fail to become a valuable aid to the less learned Bible Student. It is the best modern book on the best book of all days and all time."—People's Magazine.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ENGLISH COURSE.

A PRIMARY HISTORY OF BRITAIN. For Elemen- tary Schools. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. 12mo. 2s. 6d.

"The modest title of this history scarcely indicates its real value. While the style is very plain and simple, it does not attempt to write down to the comprehension of children. It is an admirable work, one of the best short school histories of England we have seen, and is throughout remarkably free from bias."—Educational Times.

A SCHOOL MANUAL OF ENGLISH GRAMMAR. With Copious Exercises. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., and T. D. HALL, M.A. Post 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"This Grammar is a good introduction to a larger treatment of the subject. For the information of teachers, the use of this book will render unnecessary that of many others, since it contains the grammar, analysis, and exercises. It is really a serviceable school-book."—Nonconformist.

A PRIMARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR. For Elementary Schools. With Exercises and Questions. By T. D. HALL, M.A. 16mo. 1s.

"This little book is very carefully done. We doubt whether any grammar of equal size could give an introduction to the English language more clear, concise, and full than this does."—Watchman.
